UMASS

Adam Hessler, a 19-year-old UMass student, has been arrested and charged with "possession of an explosive device and gunpowder." He has been accused of using these materials to build a homemade rocket to propel toilet paper out of his dorm window. Robert Nixon, a sophomore, was hospitalized for injuries sustained when the rocket exploded. Hessler has pleaded innocent and has been released on $5000 bail.

TRINITY

"An overwhelming majority of the students who are caught say that they were drunk at the time," complained Kristina Dow, director of Residential Services at Trinity College. She was referring to the recent increase in vandalism on campus, which culminated in the "High Rise incident" when a group of students threw a full-sized refrigerator out of a seventh-floor window. Among the other violations have been the racing of cars around campus, theft, discharging of fire-extinguishers, and public urination.

Dow believes that raising the drinking age to 20 may have contributed to the problem since most of the drinking now takes place in the dorms. "A student will probably be a more responsible drinker if he were in a public setting...but when he is cooped up in a dorm room, the center of attention is the keg on the table," she said.

looked as if the Ephs would have an overpowering 4-2 lead going into the doubles.

But five games later, Tufts had won the match, as the Tufts player's pressure game wore Rives down and captured the match 7-6 (10-8), 6-7 (7-3), 7-5. "It was a great match; you've got to like the way the Tufts player started to attack," said Sloane.

The two doubles squads then buckled down and wrapped up the match against the squad Sloane called "one of the toughest teams we'll play all year."

Two easy victories against Middlebury and Clark came earlier in the week, both 8-1 victories. In both instances, the number two doubles team split sets, then lost in a tiebreaker for the only defeat.

The team faces Colgate at home tomorrow before traveling to Amherst on Saturday to face the Little Three rival Lord Jeffs.

Baseball

showed himself to be the ace of the staff with a stellar performance on the mound, striking out 11 and allowing only three hits in seven innings of work with no earned runs.

The Ephs held only a 4-3 lead after five innings, but Morris would give up no more on this day, earned or unearned. McKone then cleared a bases-loaded situation with a two-bagger, and Garfield finished off the game for the Ephmen.

Coach Coakley sees no reason why his team can't improve on last year. "We came very close in the Little three last year; we beat Amherst here, lost by one run there, and lost to Wesleyan in a 14-inning one-run game," he said. "If we can improve on our fielding and our habit of leaving men on base in key situations, we can turn things around."

and strong, overwhelming the opponents. The line, led by Sue Babiec '85 and Emmy Olmsted '85, was unstoppable.

B-side wins 32-0

The B-side demolished the Bantam squad 32-0. In the first minute, Daisy Hagey '88 scored a try on a penalty play. Annie Cordova '88 converted the ball for two more points. Soon thereafter, Nadia Milleron 'Ex, assisted by Cordova, sped down the field to touch down another ball.

Anne Schmutz '87 gave the team four more points after peeling out of a maul and diving past the try line. Receiving a penalty play, quick-handed Steph Jacon '87 passed the ball to Katy Gerber '88, who drodged through the opponents for a try. In a flying leap to the try line, Lauren Waine 'Ex scored the final try of the half. Hagey successfully converted the ball for a halftime score of 24-0.

Williams calmed down after the half, scoring only two tries. Running twenty yards up the sideline, powerhouse Jacon burst through the opponents to touch down the ball. Anne Marie Plankey '87 made the last try in a five-yard run to the try zone for a final score of 32-0.

not able to keep up in the sprints and intermediate distances, and fell to a disappointing 98-56 loss. Clark Otley '86 had a good day, winning the 100m and taking second in the pole vault, as did Joe McGinn '88, heaving the shot 139" to take first place. Paul Toland '85 cleared 6'6" to win the high jump and Henry Jones '88 jumped 20'3" to win the long jump. In the longer distance events, John Ellison '86 took second in the 1500m in 4:11 came back to duel with Dave Grossman '87 to tie for first place in the 5000m in 15:54.

At Westfield, the men's team was especially strong in the distance events, sweeping the top three places in the 1500m run and the steeple chase, and taking two of the top three places in the 800m run. Running especially well were sophomores John Fisher, taking first in the 1500m in 407.0, and Tom Fitzgibbon pacing his way past the barriers and water jump to take first in the steeplechase. Other strong performers for the Ephmen were senior co-captain Paul Toland who went over 6'2" in the high jump for first place; Scott Purdy '88 who placed in both the 100m hurdles and the 400m hurdles and took first place in the triple jump (39'6") and second in the high jump; and Clark Otley who took first place in both the 100m sprint (11.3) and the pole vault (13").

The women's team brought together their victory (68-53) through impressive individual efforts. Senior Lindsay Rockwood was able to place in four events, taking second in the 100m hurdles and the high jump and first in both the long and triple jumps. Junior Mel Mahoney also had an outstanding day jumping taking second in the long and triple jumps and first in the 100m hurdles allowing the women's squad to control these events. Becky Conklin '87 also had a good day, first winning the 1500m and then doubling back to take second place in the 800m run.

Women's lax, 1-2, lose to unbeaten Tufts 20-5

Faith Raider

The women's lacrosse team lost to undefeated Tufts 20-5 Saturday dropping to 1-2 as the Jumbos move to 8-0. Last year the Ephwomen lost to the second-place finishers in the Northeast Intercollegiate Athletic Conference with by a more respectable 8-2 score.

Despite the efforts of senior tri-captain attack wing Allison Fuller (two goals and two assists), Tufts was able to prevent any Williams goals during the second half. With a strong passing game, the Jumbos scored four goals for every one by Williams.

Earlier in the week, the Ephs dominated Mt. Holyoke 14-8 and were beated by Division 1 Springfield. Against Holyoke, second home Laura Rogers '85 unleashed the Williams scoring machine by shooting the first of her seven goals with 16:10 remaining in the first half. Within the next three minutes, first home Lee Wierdsma '87 scored three times, twice on passes from Rogers and once assisted by freshman Julie Inferna.

Tri-captain Fuller, playing with a broken nose, scored with 1:05 remaining to close out Williams scoring for the first half. The count at the half was 7-3.

The second half was more of the same with scoring by Rogers, Fuller, and first home substitute Amy Barstad '87. Scoring efforts from Mt. Holyoke's center could not match the Ephwomen's momentum. Sophomore goalie Martha Hoopes had ten saves.

Williams will travel to Union on April 17.

Ruggers take third at Providence

by Gene Mazzaro

The Williams Rugby Football Club opened the spring season this weekend, sending the A- and B-sides to a tournament in Providence and keeping the C- and D-sides at home to play in the Commissioners' Cup Tournament.

The A-side took third place in the sixteen team tournament, finishing very strongly on Sunday with victories over Wesleyan and the Dartmouth B-side to win the Providence plate. However, the tournament did not start as well as it finished as the A's lost to UConn in the day's first game. The Huskies were well suited to the extremely wide pitch and took advantage of many Williams mistakes to post a 19-6 victory. The lone Williams try was scored by Mark Evans '85 with Bob Ause '85 adding the conversion.

The white dogs rebounded with a 13-0 victory in the next match over the University of Maine at Orono. The powerful foot of Roger Merriam '86 gave the Ephmen nine points from penalty kicks while superb line play from Ken Deveaux '85 and Ed O'Toole '85 set up a try for Marty Davey '85. Defensively, Williams played a fine game, led by the hard hitting of Jeff Lifson '86, Mike Kolster '85, and Craig Blackmore '86.

6-4 over URI

Next the Williams fifteen defeated URI in a very tight game by the score of 6-4. The Ephs dominated the first half, pinning URI deep in their own zone. Shortly before halftime, George Clemens '86 set up a John Stanley '87 try that gave Williams a lead that they would never relinquish. Another Ause conversion increased the lead to six points. In the second half a URI try cut the margin to two, but the Willliams defense held to ensure a well-deserved victory and a spot against Wesleyan in the semi-finals Sunday.

The killer B's were defeated in the opening round by a very impressive squad from Southern Connecticut. After falling behind 10-0 early in the first half. Fullback Tom Connolly '87 converted a penalty kick to cut the lead to 10-3. S.Conn, however, answered the call and scored again as the half ended. In the second stanza, things were pretty much the same as S.Conn pushed two more tries across the line to secure a 26-3 victory.

The B's then faced the Dartmouth B-side in a battle of well matched teams. Although the Ephs received strong running from Craig Kirby '86, Charlie Lazor '87, and Gary Sheff '87, they could only score three points. Their defensive play, however, was much improved from the first game. Wing forwards Mike Duncan '86 and Greg Norton '86 kept the Dartmouth runners off balance all day, but the Ephs fell short and eventually lost 10-3.

C and D action

Meanwhile, at Cole Field, the C's and D's faced North Adams State's A- and B-sides for the Commissioners' Cup. In the first game, the C's had difficulties in mounting a strong offensive thrust. Although they advanced deep into North Adams territory, they could never push the ball into the try zone. North Adams also had problems in scoring points against a stingy Williams defense, but a late try and conversion gave the visitors a 6-0 win—and possession of the coveted cup.

The D-side exacted revenge in the second game by defeating the North Adams B-side 7-0. Mark Van Norman stormed across the goal line for the only try of the day. Drew Steckler '87, Andy Anselmi '87, and Andy Harris '88 played very strong games for the Ephs to secure a win.

The traditional parties after the matches were dominated by the Williams contingent who were led by Chief Steven Troyer '86. The white dogs will host Tufts next Saturday.

Softball

by Tom R. Ewing

The Williams softball team defeated Robert's Wesleyan 8-2 on Saturday but then lost the second game of a twin bill 12-1 to Hamilton.

The winning pitcher in the first game was co-captain Karen Montska '85, who also provided much of the offensive punch for the team. Although the game was marked by disagreements over rules violations, senior co-captain Laura Napolitano said that it was a strong game for the Ephwomen team, especially after only four days of outdoor practice.

Montska was the pitcher of record in the second game as well. She said that the score did not reflect the difference between the qualities of the teams, although the Hamilton squad was clearly superior.

The squad played Smith today and will travel to St. Rose next Saturday.

Baseball, 5-6, drops two to Tufts by Dave Paulsen and John Clayton

Failing behind in the early innings to Tufts' potent hitting attack in both games, the men's baseball team fell in a doubleheader to the Jumbos by scores of 6-4 and 8-5 on Saturday at Weston field, setting their season mark at 5-6.

In the first game, the Jumbos reached junior lefthander Bob Hussey for five runs on six hits before the sixth inning. Despite home runs from junior rightfielder Dick Hollington and senior captain Mike Coakley, the Ephmen could never quite catch up.

In the second game, Tufts scored six runs in the first two innings, and another Eph comeback attempt fell short, despite a round-tripper from catcher Phil Lusardi '85.

3-4 record in Florida

After the team's trip to Florida over spring break, in which they compiled a 3-4 record, coach Bob Coakley spoke of an improved pitching staff and a veteran nucleus of position players as the keys to the team improving on last year's disappointing 5-11 mark.

The pitching staff features junior righthander Kevin Morris, who led the squad with a 3.21 ERA last year, compared to 5.45 for the entire staff. Morris is joined on the staff by Hussey, Scott Garfield '88, Seth Lawry '87, and Dave Moss '85. In a pinch, Coakley can also call on juniors Pieter Mulder and Rob Coakley.

Coach Coakley credits first-year pitching coach Carl Boteze with much of the staff's improvement. Botezc, a former pitcher a UMass who spent time in the Red Sox organization, "has been a real plus," according to Coakley.

A trio of slick-fielding sophomores will anchor the Eph infield. Rick Hedeman returns at first base after hitting .247 last year. The double-play combo of Tim McKone at second base and Steve Beisito at short will give the Ephmen strength up the middle. Both players struggled at the plate last year, but Coakley believes their averages will go up as they gain experience. With power hitters Rob Coakley '86 at third base, Mike Coakley '85 at first base, Phil Lusardi at DH, and Mulder filling in wherever needed, the rest of the infield appears set.

23-7 over Souther Vermont

That kind of offensive firepower served the Ephmen well

Pieter Mulder '86 had three homers this week, including a grandslam.

23-7 over Southern Vermont on Thursday as they crushed Southern Vermont at Weston Field 23-7 behind Mulder's two homers, seven RBI's, and five innings of shutout ball. After Rob Coakley gave up five runs (three of them unearned) in the first inning, the Ephs blew the game open with their long-ball attack. Lusardi also hit one out to go with freshman Jum Duquette's three hits, while Rob Coakley helped his own cause with a three-run shot.

Duquette's performance on Thursday gave him eight hits in the first two games, as he went five for six on Tuesday to give the Ephs a 10-7 victory over Trinity in Hartford. Morris

O'Connell nets 3 as laxmen down Tufts

by Andrew Smith and Greg Keller

Sophomore Mike O'Connell paced the attack with three goals and three assists as the Ephmen beat the Tufts Jumbos 7-5 in the lacrosse team's home opener.

Coach Renzl Lamb had expressed some concern due to the inexperience of his team, but he felt that they held up well under pressure. Said Lamb, "We were lucky; we played well but made some stupid mistakes. That's only because it was really the first game of the season." The Ephs' only previous game was a 12-7 victory over Division I Air Force in Tampa, Fla. on March 26.

In addition to O'Connell, junior goaltender Brad DuPont with 17 saves and junior attackman Chris Toll with one goal were lauded for their fine play. Co-captain Reese Hughes '85 and Steve Patterson '87 eached added a goal, and freshman attackman Russell Werkman dished out an assist. O'Connell was voted the outstanding player of the game by his teammates.

High hopes for '85

Coach Lamb has high hopes for the 1985 season, looking back upon 1984 as a building year when the team posted a formidable 6-5 record, an effort which Lamb feels they can improve upon.

The team is still exceedingly young. "75 percent of this team is either freshman or sophomore," says Lamb. However, in light of their 12-7 victory over a very tough Air Force squad, in their season opener, Lamb feels this team can win many games.

The most marked characteristic of this year's players is their age and that freshmen and sophomores are the driving force behind the team. As inexperienced as they seem, their stunning win over Air Force proves they can compete with anyone on their schedule. Lamb feels that without a doubt, this year's squad is stronger than last year's, but he is worried about the level of competition in Division III this year. He says, "The team is better, but so is the competition from schools like Middlebury, Amherst, Union, Trinity, and newcomer Hamilton. Thus it is going to be difficult to beat last year's 6-5 record, but I feel confident." He adds that Williams' late start, several weeks after some opponents, compounds the problem.

Williams, 2-0, lowered Tufts' record to 2-3 and will travel to Dartmouth this Wednesday.

Tufts, top-rated in NE, lose to men's tennis 5-3

by Cliff Peale

With a versatile squad, featuring styles ranging from the power games of seniors Craig Hammond and Tim Rives to the delicate touch of sophomore Kevin Callanan ("three players who can play with anyone in the country," said Coach Sean Sloane), the men's tennis team presents a formidable task for any opponent. They proved that conclusively this week by winning their first three matches, routs of Middlebury and Clark preceding a tense 5-3 squeaker over New England's top ranked team, Tufts on Saturday.

Doubles play provided the impetus for the big victory over Tufts, as the number two and three teams of juniors Chris Clarey and Tim Peterson and Callanan teaming with Andy Canning '85, both won to lift the squad out of a 3-3 tie coming out of the singles. Clarey and Peterson played what Sloane called a "dynamic" match to win 6-3, 6-2, while Callanan and Canning won 6-3, 7-6. The top pairing of Rives and Hammond split sets before the match was called on account of darkness.

Callanan wins 6-0, 6-1

The Ephs looked ready to take charge of the match in the singles competition. Callanan and Clarey, playing numbers three and four respectively, came off the court with easy victories, Clarey winning 6-4, 6-2, and Callanan cutting up his opponent with an assortment of spins and slices while losing only one game.

Although Peterson, at number five, and sophomore Chris Meyers, playing number six, fell in their singles matches, senior captain Hammond survived a tough second set to win 6-2, 7-5, and when top player Rives went up 5-2 in the third and deciding stanza, it

Trinity outruns tracksters 70-65, 98-56

by William Gillanders

Both the men's and women's track teams opened the outdoor season with victories over Westfield State on Wednesday, but neither team was able to match strides with a strong Trinity performance at home Sunday.

Against Trinity the women's team stayed close, but faltered in the last event when faced by a stiff challenge in the one mile relay. Tied going to this last event, the women were edged out to lose the race and the meet 70-65. Lindsay Rockwood '85 and Mei Mahoney '86 both had good days, and their efforts were rounded out by strong performances from freshman Joan Davis, Gail Henderson '87, and Beth Schmidt '85. Davis was possesed in both the 100 and 200 meter sprints, taking first in both, while Henderson threw the shot put and discus farther than anyone els. Schmidt looked smooth in the longer events, taking first in the 1500m and second in the the 800m.

The men, though winning several of the earlier events, were Women ruggers punish Trinity

by Helen Kaulbach

The women's rugby club annihilated Trinity this weekend, the A-side winning 32-6 and the B-side 32-0.

In the A-match, Mary Peterson '87 started the scoring for Williams. Just a few minutes into the game, she dodged past the confused Trinity ruggers to make the first try. Five minutes later, Peterson surprised the opponents with another try, assisted by seniors Ginger Greene and Meg Holliday.

In a penalty one yard from the Bantam try zone, Louise Hurd '85 dove past the line for the third try. Greene then blasted past the tired Trinity line with a twenty-yard dash to the try line for four more points. Peterson added two points with a successful conversion. Dorie Dewar '85 followed with another try after receiving the ball strategically passed by Sunny Edelstein '85. Peterson again converted the ball.

Determined to get a hat-trick, fullback Peterson booted the ball passed the opponents, sprinted forward to rip the ball from the fumbling opponent's hands, and then she ran fifty yards to touch the ball down. This play gave her a total of sixteen points on the game.

Unexpectedly, the Trinity team managed to score another try and convert the ball for a game total of six points. However, the Ephwomen regained the momentum. Allison Martin '85 scrambled to the try line, scoring the last four points in a line-out on the Bantam one-yard line. The final score was 32-6. Williams played a superb game with the scrum coming in low

by Mary Taylor

The Williams crew teams traveled to Lake Quinsigamond in Worcester Saturday for 2000 meter races against WPI, Connecticut, Brown, and Smith.

The highlight of the day was the success of the men's varsity heavies. The men's eight had a solid first with a time of 6:08 against an excellent WPI crew and the men's four went on to soundly defeat a Connecticut and three WPI teams.

The crews raced under mild conditions. It was sunny and warm with a slight tailwind and calm water conditions.

The other boats had disappointing results against strong Connecticut and Brown teams. The men's coach, Peter Wells, said that all the crews have a lot of work ahead and that the Williams teams have some catching up to do since they got on the water later than the competition. He was confident that the boats would get faster every week.

Next weekend the Ephs will travel to Amherst for the Little Three competition.

BBQ fires controversy

by John Schafer

A major campus controversy has erupted out of the freshmen inclusion process. Some freshmen, angry at being placed in their fourth or fifth choice, have criticized the Berkshire Quad, sparking a debate about tolerance and diversity at Williams.

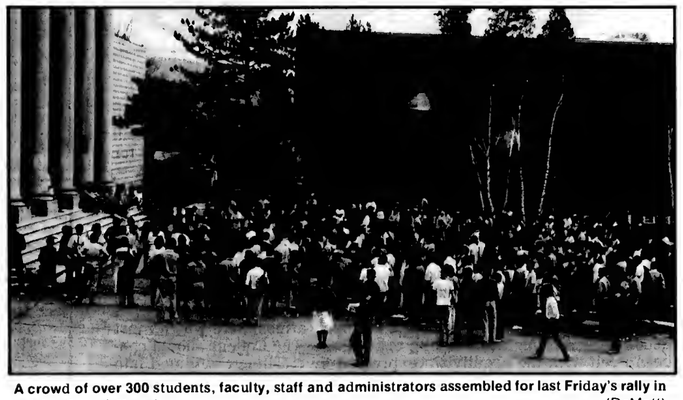
At the center of the storm is Hart Murphy '88 who addressed the College Council and the Committee on Undergraduate Life last week and circulated a petition opposing the inclusion system. In the process, he has condemned the Berkshire Quad as a ghetto for what he calls the College's "misfits and homosexuals."

Reaction to his criticism of the BQ led to a rally Friday afternoon to celebrate diversity at Williams. At the rally, Robert Lee '87, a spokesman for the Black Student Union, told a crowd of about 300, "On this campus, black men and black women are involved in the struggle against racism, fighting for the freedom to be who they are, and not what society at large, or someone in particular, wants them to be."

According to Murphy, the Berkshire Quad houses a large portion of the campus' homosexuals, bohemians, radicals and other minorities. Most of the blacks on campus live in the Quad. Eighty-three percent of the freshmen listed it as their last choice in inclusion this year, and out of seventy-one freshmen assigned to the Quad for next year, thirty-five, including Murphy, currently live there.

Tampering?

Murphy and others have accused the administration of tampering with the inclusion process, perhaps to try to change the social stereotype of the Quad. Freshmen residents of the Berkshire Quad make up approximately one seventh of the class of 1988 but comprise almost half of those headed for the Quad next year.



"These figures call the supposed randomness of the inclusion process into question," wrote Murphy in a petition that he says was signed by 119 students.

"Hart assumes that we did something to the computer program," Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta said in an interview. "We didn't do anything like that."

The debate over the inclusion process, however, is now secondary to the reaction to some of Murphy's statements. His petition goes on to say, "The Berkshire Quad represents a distinct and aberrant subset of the Williams population.

"When you force someone (into the Quad)," it states, "you are making an assault on his values...If the college's misfits and homosexuals wish to make it their ghetto, they should be

The controversy sparked last week by the release of a letter protesting the Freshmen Inclusion process and especially inclusion into the Berkshire Quad has resulted in a public response by the Committee on Undergraduate Life and lengthy discussion in the College Council.

At its April 15 meeting the CUL discussed the letter drafted by Hart Murphy '88 (see related story) and decided to meet in executive session to formulate a committee position.

On Wednesday, April 17, the committee distributed a letter which said in part that the goal of the residential house system is "to promote fairness, tolerance, and interaction among students of different nationalities, races, sexual preferences, values, and religions."

While the letter did not address Murphy's charges of unfairness in the current inclusion system, it stated that the CUL would continue to examine ways to meet these goals.

CC committee

The College Council did not make an official statement on Murphy's petition, which was read at their meeting on Thursday. President Anza Mammen '86 arranged for a subcommittee to look into the inclusion process.

Mammen reserved a portion of the discussion specifically for the inclusion process, before turning to the feelings expressed by Murphy in his statement. Murphy read the fourth version of his statement to the Council in order to address the question, "Freshmen Inclusion: Just or Unjust?"

Committee names '85-'86 JA's

by Mark Young

After spending six weeks reviewing applications, the Junior Advisor Selection Committee, in conjunction with the Dean's Office, has selected 52 members of the class of 1987 to serve as Junior Advisors for the 1985-1986 academic year.

This year, as in previous years, there has been some controversy as to whether or not the Junior Advisor Selection Committee treats all of the candidates fairly. Some students have charged that sophomores who live in the Berkshire Quad are discriminated against and denied Junior Advisor positions because of where they live.

Shannon McKeen '85, president of the Selection Committee, flatly denied the existence of such injustice. "The percentage of people who are Junior Advisors from the Berkshire Quad is proportional to the number of people who apply from the Berkshire Quad," he said. Three of the 52 future Junior Advisors are from the Berkshire Quad.

The Committee has also been accused of favoritism; some students claim that a candidate must know some Committee members in order to become a JA. McKeen acknowledged that with any selection process this can be a problem. "This is definitely an issue," he said. "When two people are equally qualified, biases may sneak in." But he added, "All (of the Committee members) try to be objective, and the system is as impartial as possible."

McKeen also explained that knowing a member of the Committee can hurt a candidate as well as help him because both the strengths and weaknesses of a candidate are brought more clearly into view.

Selection process

The Committee, headed by McKeen and Vice-president Thomas Goodspeed '86, consists of 13 seniors who were JA's last year, five current JA's and seven at-large members selected through the College Council.

The 28 men and 24 women were chosen to be JA's after a three-step selection process. This process began with a preliminary review by the entire committee of the peer references, JA references and personal statements of all the candidates. A non-binding vote was then taken.

During the second stage, each committee member carefully evaluated six candidates and presented the evaluations to the entire committee. A second and binding vote was then taken. A two-thirds majority in favor of the candidate put his name on the final ballot.

In the third and final stage, each committee member voted for the 52 candidates he felt would serve as the best JA's. The Dean's Office then had to approve the 52 candidates.

Essential qualities

Specifically, the committee evaluated the applicants in terms of the qualities it has determined are essential for a successful Junior Advisor, McKeen said. "Certainly we look for the student to be open-minded, available and approachhe said, adding that other valued qualities include sensitivity and organizational ability.

McKeen added, "Diversity is also important. We want a Junior Advisor who is well-rounded and has many interests." The Prospectives spend two days on campus

by Becky Conklin

One hundred and twenty-five pre-freshmen flocked to the Williams campus last Thursday night and Friday, and another large group of prospectives will arrive this Thursday according the Admissions office.

Students accepted into the class of 1989, which Director of Admissions Philip Smith considers to be "very strong academically," participated in the first of two special programs for pre-freshmen.

The new overnight programs were designed by Assistant Directors of Admissions Maureen Walsh and Beth Connolly and the Purple Key Society in order to alleviate the annual overflow of prospectives in late April and to encourage those accepted to take another look at Williams.

"Students have a lot more attractive options than in recent years," explained Smith. "This program was designed to help students in making their choices," he said, citing a conversation he had with one pre-freshman who had been accepted at four other schools very similar to Williams.

Ease the burden

"The main reason the program was instituted was to ease the load on the small number of people who usually host," said Tom Marshall '87, who co-organized the programs with Karen Phillips '87. Marshall said that during the decision period between April 15 and the students' reply date prospectives overwhelm the Purple Key hosts.

Representatives from each freshman entry signed up hosts in their respective entries for the two weekends. Marshall said that three or four entries showed 100% participation. Purple Key has offered a pizza and video night at the Log for the entry with the highest participation, Marshall said.

Besides spending the night in a freshman dorm, the program includes a panel discussion on Williams, departmental open houses, a Downstage theater performance, a make-your-own-sundae party and other campus activities with freshman hosts.

Both Marshall and Smith emphasized the importance to pre-freshmen of staying in freshman dorms with other accepted students who may be in their class at Williams. The atmosphere was "happy and natural," Smith said. "It wasn't forced. Students didn't feel pressured."

Applications up

The admissions office received 7.3% more applications this year and accepted 25% of those applying. Smith said that this year's applicant pool was very strong, making the decisions harder. "Academi-

Exclusion

Controversy over housing choices is a perennial problem. There will always be students who do not approve the inclusion system, and for whom the system does not work.

Certain houses are more popular than others and that, too, is a perennial problem. It is not possible for all students to receive their first choice housing, but this year's complaints have taken on a different tone from past years, singling out the residents of the Berkshire Quad, rather than the physical plant of Mission Park or the distance of Tyler, as the main difficulty.

The discrimination and intolerance expressed by some freshmen towards minorities is very alarming, and threatens Williams with a divisiveness which could eradicate the open atmosphere which must accompany any fruitful learning experience. The College should concern itself with the negativism expressed by freshmen affiliated into Berkshire Quad. The entire community should analyze what kind of prejudices—explicit and implicit—exist at Williams.

In addition to this, however, questions about the Freshmen Inclusion system have been raised. In its fervor to attack and quelch any suggestion of discrimination on campus, the administration has avioded the issue of the inclusion system itself. While these two are not unrelated issues, they are distinct and separate: one question is why 416 out of 510 freshmen put Berkshire Quad last choice; the other is why so many received it.

One factor which effects how students view their housing placements is the tight transfer system which limits movement between houses. Two years ago, in an attempt to encourage house unity, admission to Mission Park was restricted from seven to four people per group, and a tighter transfer system was installed. When the house unity idea failed, and admission in groups of seven to Mission Park was reinstated, the open transfer system was not. Possible changes in the transfer process should definitely be among the options which CUL considers as it begins to look at the Freshman Inclusion process.

While the goal of consistent house unity is understandable, the uniform homogenization of Williams would be more harmful than helpful. Unifying the campus at the expense of diversity is wrong, and discrimination, either through negative comments against a specific area of campus or through forcing students to spend four years in a place they are not happy with is counter-productive. Only through further investigation of the Inclusion system and the Transfer system can the housing dissatisfactions be allieviated, and only through investigation of the implicit prejudices at Williams can life here be ameliorated.

Letters

Random

To The Editor:

We want to address some of the questions and charges about freshmen inclusion. The process is random, but it has four constraints. Two constraints come from the students: ranked choices (the computer maximizes first choices) and variation in group size. The Deans Office adds two further constraints: determining available bed space in each house and adjusting male/female balance. This adjustment is the only "social engineering" the Deans Office does.

According to last week's Record only 10% of students in Fayerweather and East received their first choice as opposed to a campus average of 61%. Since we do not input entries in the inclusion program, we do not know if this is an anomaly or a continuing pattern. The fact that this year single sex entries did less well in first choice maximization may, in part, explain this. Certainly the troubling consistency in freshman ranking of housing choices also contributed. The charges that there is a policy to "revitalize the Quad" or to select a population already used to the Berkshire Quad are completely false.

Both the Deans Office and the CUL will reexamine the freshman inclusion process in light of this year's result. Since we do not consider not living in the Freshmen Quad a punishment, we do not consider a weighting of Freshmen housing units as approporiate. We do think two other suggestions may nave merit. First, the elimination of first choice maximization in the program might more evenly distribute people, especially if we also try to minimize fifth choice selection (something, however, difficult to do when fifth choices are so consisitent). Second, and more radical, would be the elimination of ranking a choice and a completely random assignment. We will require and look forward to student input on these and other suggestions.

Offensive

To The Editor:

On April 14, Hart Murphy '88 came to Fitch-Currier snacks and read a letter he had written to protest being included in the Berkshire Quad. The langauage of this letter was very offensive to some of us gathered there. As freshmen who have chosen the Quad, we would like to express our opinions on some of his statements.

According to Mr. Murphy, "If the college's homosexuals and other misfits wish to make (the Berkshire Quad) their ghetto they should be free to." Even if we in the Beautiful Berkshire Quad (BBQ) were all "misfits," it would be impossible for us to create a ghetto. At a college of 2,000 students, everyone has contact with everyone else, whether through classes, sports, or social events. A corollary of this fact is that, no matter how much he may try, Mr. Murphy cannot isolate himself from the groups he so despises.

Freshmen who have been placed in the Berkshire Quad as a low choice should remember that the inclusion process has been similar in recent years. A large number of upperclassmen living in the BBQ had also made it their fourth or fifth choice. This fact clearly undermines both Mr. Murphy's charge that the Berkshire Quad is a self-made ghetto where he and his friends would be unwelcome, and his fear that living in the Quad would be "an assault upon his values."

Mr. Murphy also feels qualified to characterize the Berkshire Quad lifestyle as possessing "an oppressive (if weird) sameness." Since freshman housing is designed to promote a sense of class unity, most freshmen miss out on getting to know upperclassmen. We question whether Mr. Murphy has spoken with enough Fitch-Currier and Prospect House residents to base his generalization on fact.

At the end of his letter, Mr. Murphy claims that "many of (the Berkshire Quad's) members seem to have little if any compunction against advocating crimes against both nature and the United States Government." This seems odd to us. Just what is a "crime against nature?" We must admit that the Quad does have its share of flower-pickers and grass-uprooters. The reference to the federal government leaves us equally mystified. Could it be that Mr. Murphy's distaste for life in the Berkshire Quad stems from a wish to avoid parties with under-age drinkers?

All sarcasm aside, Mr. Murphy's letter proves that there is a problem concerning the Berkshire Quad's image. We believe that the problem is not that the Quad is seen to have a large number of homosexuals and other minorities. The problem lies instead with those who cannot accept these minorities. The purpose of a liberal arts education is to expose students to new ideas and new ways of thinking. We ask for respect for the humanity of others different from ourselves. This is not a matter of opinion or rhetoric, but one of human dignity on which there can be no compromise.

Disappointed

To The Editor:

I was very dissappointed by the intense dissatisfaction expressed by students about the housing affiliation process. It does not seem like people are giving the entire system a chance. We are fortunate to be able to have some flexibility within this not-so-perfect system. Williams College, with its small enrollment, allows the housing administration to work around the computer's final placements and to temporarily move people who are unhappy with their affiliations to different housing areas that may better accomodate them.

From now until August Assistant Dean Kenyatta, Wendy Hopkins, Linda Brown, and house presidents will do their best to swap and trade positions in housing areas among the students requesting housing changes. The process is not an easy one and becomes even more complicated by the confusion and frustration it creates. All requests are usually filled by September, if not sooner.

Before any harsh judgement is passed, i think it is only fair to give the Administration a chance to supplement the computer program's jolts. I have to agree with Dean Kenyatta, "It's not a grand conspiracy, it is just a computer program."

Isolationism at Williams: partitioning the campus

by Antje Lewis

The past week at Williams has been a revelation for me, and not an entirely pleasant one. It has always been obvious that this is a fairly conservative school and that students who are different are often not terribly comfortable or happy here. But conservativeness does not imply intolerance. It never occurred to me that non-"mainstream" students would come under actual attack.

Perhaps it was only bitterness about my remaining naivete going out the window, but the events of the past week made me feel that I could no longer maintain the optimistic view that Williams students approach one another with attitudes of openness and tolerance. It is the controversy which has erupted over the Berkshire Quad and its residents which has led me to feel this way.

It is not that the Berkshire Quad seems to be so unpopular which upsets me, it is the unwillingness of certain students to live with the "type" of person who lives in the Quad which upsets me. And it is the blatant homophobia, implicit racism, and the hostility toward "misfits" which, frankly, outrages me.

> After all, I think we would all agree that a personal attack is an unacceptable instance of intolerance...

The flashpoint of all this has been the efforts of a freshman to extricate himself from his housing assignment to the Berkshire Quad. Obviously he is not alone in his efforts to transfer out of the Quad, but Hart Murphy has taken the steps of presenting his case to the Committee on Undergraduate Life, the College Council, and even Fitch-Currier itself. His petition, apparently signed by 121 other students (some of whom have since publicly retracted their signatures) calls the freshman inclusion process into question, both for its fairness and its honesty. This is an issue with which I will not deal here; doubtless the debate over freshman inclusion will continue by itself.

The petition also bemoans freshmen being "forced" to live in the Berkshire Quad. Well, through the inclusion process, everyone is "forced" to live somewhere, and everyone accepts that they may not be able to live where they would prefer to. The petition, however, claims that being placed in the Quad is a qualitatively different thing from being placed in, say, row houses, or Greylock. And why does it say that this is so? Because Berkshire Quad residents are unacceptably different and because the Quad is isolated from the mainstream of social life at Williams.

Well, it seems obvious that the unacceptability of the difference lies in its very nature as a difference. The signers to the petition say that they seek to "share...housing with people whose lifestyles will be compatible," and apparently they do not find that compatibility among Quad residents, who are, according to the petition, "misfits" (read: homosexual, black, "nerd", radical, etc.). Are we supposed to agree that these things are qualitatively different from the rest of Williams, that they are out of the mainstream, and that they are therefore unacceptable?

There is absolutely no point or justice in attacking Mr. Murphy specifically or attacking personally either him or the many students who seem to agree with his point of view. However, there is all the point in the world in confronting the sentiments which he and others express about these homosexuals, blacks, etc. Let me repeat: this is not intended as an assault upon Mr. Murphy's or anyone else's personal worth.

After all, I think we would all agree that a personal attack is an unacceptable instance of intolerance, contrary to the ideals of the liberal arts education we are all here to find. So why do people seem to be accepting and even participating in personal attacks on students who are different at Williams? It is beyond comprehension.

Perhaps at this point you are wondering, what exactly is the nature of the attack against these minorities? Here are a few quotes from the petition: "a fair assessment, in our view, is that the Berkshire Quad represents a distinct and aberrant subset of the Williams population"; "when you force someone into the B.B.Q., you're making an assault upon his values"; "If the college's misfits and homosexuals wish to make it their ghetto, they should be free to. But no one should be forced to join them". There's more, but the above should serve to make my point.

> ...people seem to be accepting and even participating in personal attacks on students who are different at Williams

The passages quoted from the petition are from the third version. An earlier version was presented verbally at Fitch-Currier's snacks last week. The statement which was read mentioned not just misfits but minorities in general, hence my claim that racism is also implicit in the third version. The statement also mentioned "crimes against nature and the U.S. government." Well, excuse my saying so, the Berkshire Quad may

Too much time on his hands

by John Clayton

I walked into the store last month and said, "I'd like to buy an inexpensive digital watch that doesn't do very much."

That threw the saleswoman. "I don't understand what you mean," she said, searching through the 50 watches in front of her, reaching for a couple, but stopping.

"I would like a watch that tells time," I said. "Maybe the day and date. Maybe it has an alarm. That's all."

"Great! Let me show you one of our wide selection of calculator watches."

"No, I already have a calculator. I don't need another on my wrist."

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

"But don't you want to know the time in three different time zones?"

"Gee, no really. But if I ever really need to know the time in Paris, I'll use my calculator to figure it out."

"Then let me show you one of our excellent collection of stop watches. Or possibly this watch with the combination cardiovascular monitoring system? How about our new line of Japanese wrist-stereo reclevers that plug into tiny stereo-quality speakers in your glasses.?"

"I don't wear glasses, and I already have a stereo."

"You know," she said, "you look like a man who would be interested in our Complete Time Management Program. Now, these watches have an hourly chime to tell you how quickly time is fleeing by. Not only that, but they tell you where you're supposed to be and when, and when you should leave so you can get there in case the traffic is bad on the Expressway; and why you'll be late if you don't stop goofing off right now."

"No," I said drily, "I don't think so."

"Let me tell you," she responded, not missing a beat, "we're very proud of our superb collection of musical watches. This Jacksons Victory Tour Official Commemorative Watch chimes the refrain to "Girl I Want Your Body." It is particularly useful for getting you in the spirit of your aerobisize class, or for throwing impromptu dance parties. And the Deluxe model also chimes the Muzak version of the song, for those moments when you just need to sit back and relax."

"It's funny," I said, "but I can't think of one single reason why I would ever want to buy that watch."

"Over here are our numerous specialty watches," she said. "This, for instance, is our patented dictaphone-on-the-go. And here we have the instant parachute in case of plane disaster. This watch here, at the press of a button when you arrive home, automatically expands itself into a grandfather clock. And we mustn't forget this baby, that gives up-to-the-minute stock information, weather reports, or racing results, and even chimes the Jacksons' "Girl I Want Your Body," when it's got a hot tip."

"I'm sorry," I said, "I guess I'm a really tough customer."

"Oh, no," she said. "I get great fulfillment out of matching each individual with his or her unique and personal wrist-portable timeplece. Every person is different, you know."

She plunged ahead. "Now, over here we have our world-famous mini-portable-telephone watch systems. This particular model even automatically dials 15 numbers for you. And it has an accompanying built-in answering machine that takes all of your messages in case you're not at your watch when someone important calls. And you can also get our Automatic Telephone Screening System, that chimes the Jacksons' "Girl I Want Your Body" to warn you that your mother is calling, and can even simulate your voice to tell her why it's been so long since you've called and that you'll call real soon."

"No," I said, when she finally let me talk. "I just want a watch that tells time."

I walked out of the store, bewildered. I went home to tell my roomates about it, but I was late for dinner.

An irreverant glance at Williams in the early days

On the Record by John Schafer

Though we like to think of ourselves as important, we are only small fish in the vast ocean of Williams history.

My life was simple and carefree until I stumbled across a book over vacation that made me realize the awesome responsibility we all have as students here to carry on the Williams Tradition. Because my calling has been so profoundly ehanged, I thought it best to share the highlights of the book rather than subject you to a pro wrestling update or an in-depth analysis of the high five as was wont. Published in 1939, the book is called Berkshire Hills and was written by the Federal Writers' Project of Massachusetts, whoever he is.

Williamstown was chartered in June 1765, which, for those of you math/science types was 220 years ago, or, for you non-math/science types was a long time ago. But nearly 40 years passed after the death of Colonel Ephraim Williams Jr. before his dream of a Free School eame into being. (Old Eph's "free school" costs $13,523.) Though Williamstown was the logical site of the school, would-be Ephmen had to wait until a border dispute between New York and Massachusetts was resolved in 1787 because Colonel Williams had stipulated that the school be in the Massachusetts Bay Colony.

Williams College was formally chartered on June 22, 1793. Berkshire Hills tells us that in one building, West College, "Eighteen gangling farm youths and two teachers began the college in October 1793, under the direct and simple curriculum devised by Dr. Ebenezer Fitch, the first president." There are believed to be no gangling farm youths enrolled at Williams today.

The teaching in the early days, was termed dry and unimaginative with the instructors "generally not much advanced over ignorant youths whom they were directing." Discipline was also a problem because those crazy gangling farm boys, who now doubled as ignorant youths, had a love of "rolstering", says Mr. Writers' Project. Doubtless a stern hand was needed to control these rable-rousers. "Smoking, gambilng, and considerable drinking forced the trustees to institute a drastic system of punishments for various breaches of behavior." Fines were leveled for specific "crimes":

- Absence from class ..... 1 penny
- Late for Prayer .... 3 pennies
- Employing a barber or hairdresser on the Lord's Day ....2 shillings
- Drunkenness .....3 shillings
- Every spot of ink in a book .....1 shilling and my personal favorite,
- Hunting and fishing without leave .....1 shilling

By 1815 the rolsterers had been put in their place, but the college declined as registration fell off and finances dwindled. The problem was that "Williamstown was considered too distant from centers of population for a college." Thank goodness that's not the case anymore.

Back then, however, this was a serious problem. The Reverend Doctor Zephaniah Swift Moore, president of Williams from 1815-21, wished to move the college to a more "fortunate" location, Amherst. Though nine of the twelve trus-

Council bookstore proposal

The College Council recently released its Bookstore Proposal, highlights of which appear below. Copies of the entire proposal can be picked up at the Council office.

In order to improve the ordering and distribution of books required for course-work, the College Council proposes the following:

- That during the first week of classes, Mr. Dewey maintain longer hours and hire more staff.
- That faculty be required to get their orders in by a certain date (negotiated between the faculty and Mr. Dewey), and that Mr. Dewey order books soon after that date.
- If a book does not come in by the day before the first day of classes, that Mr. Dewey inform professors.
- If a book comes in after the first day of classes, that he inform the appropriate professor when the book comes into stock, and that he keep that book in stock.
- That he keep all books in stock until the end of exams. If he must return the books for some reason, he must inform the professor and give the professor one week to notify his class before Mr. Dewey returns books to the publisher.
- If Mr. Dewey does not order enough books, that he order enough to accommodate the students left without books, and inform them when the books arrive.
- That Mr. Dewey extend the deadline for returns until one week after the deadline for course changes.
- That Mr. Dewey should not underorder.
- That he keep prices within the guidelines of the 1982 agreement.

Williams Bookstore: a joint responsibility

by Dan Blatt '85

Over the past few months, students and faculty have complained about the recent behavior of Mr. Dewey of the Williams Bookstore in supplying course books. While the complaints against Mr. Dewey have been many and legitimate, the College Council proposed that Williams maintain Mr. Dewey as our book-supplier for next year, provided he agree to modify his behavior in ordering and supplying course books. Soon after our proposal was passed, Dean O'Connor decided to continue to have Mr. Dewey supply our books, thus accepting the crux of our proposal.

While this temporary resolution may seem to be the conclusion of the bookstore controversy, it cannot and must not be regarded as such. Recognizing these complaints, the College Council proposal requests that Mr. Dewey act on certain grievances, or the Council would seek alternative means of supplying course books. Passed overwhelmingly on March 14 and reaffirmed on March 21, our proposal is the first piece of legislation on the issue (as far as my research indicates) to pass any recognized Williams College body since Mr. Dewey was given the monopoly in supplying books in 1982. Thus, while there have been many complaints in the past, no one had developed any major proposal, backed by a college body, to present to Mr. Dewey. The grievances this year mark the first major, sustained grievances since 1982. Had we previously turned our complaints into a proposal (as we did this year), we could present the complaints now as ones that had previously been presented and not acted upon; we could thus argue more forcefully for alternative means of supplying books. The College Council proposal represents the first student definition of Mr. Dewey's responsibility to Williams. This is not to say that Mr. Dewey was not aware of the complaints, but rather that we (students, faculty, and administration) had not informed him of the extent of them.

This year, the grievances were particularly strong, and faculty and students chose to act upon them. Professors Wendy Brown and David Booth and Dean O'Connor went to see Mr. Dewey. At the meeting between them and Mr. Dewey on April 10, Dewey presented a new book-ordering system which they revised together and outlined in a letter to the faculty on April 19. The College Council acted by setting up a committee which sought student input, researched and debated the issue, and presented the aforementioned proposal to the Council.

With this proposal in hand, I went to see Mr. Dewey, to formally present our grievances. Mr. Dewey evaluated our points, and agreed to accept them next fall. (He reminded me that the issues involving faculty negotiation had been resolved at the April 10 meeting.) He agreed to extend the deadline for book returns and to inform students when he plans to return books. Beyond this, he insisted that he had already fulfilled many of our points. However, if this were true, we would never have issued our proposal. The grievances that led to the proposal clearly indicate that Mr. Dewey must change his behavior. Simply put, he must respond to student grievances. By presenting our proposal and by obtaining his agreement to cooperate with it, we can better evaluate his behavior in the future. If this proposal is to have any effect, students must be aware of it and complain to the College Council, the Bookstore Committee, Mr. Dewey, and when necessary the Dean's Office when they feel it is violated. As Mr. Dewey has agreed to cooperate, students and faculty must also cooperate with the new system. As our proposal has been passed and presented to Mr. Dewey (and as the faculty have also presented their grievances to him), Mr. Dewey has become aware of our concerns; should he fail to improve his operation, Williams would need to search for a new book-supplier.

Despite Mr. Dewey's willingness to cooperate in the future, many feel that because of his past failures it is now time to show him the door; they must realize, however, that finding a new supplier is not as easy as needing one. Any alternative supplier would have to sell more than textbooks to make a profit, thus creating competition with Spring Street merchants. If Williams were to supply the books itself, it would have to subsidize the operation to stay in business or charge higher prices; in either case, we pay. Indeed, on the issue of prices, Mr. Dewey reaffirmed his commitment to stay within the 1982 agreement of a maximum 7% mark-up. If students have complaints, he encourages them to come see the receipts which he has from the publishers.

I am optimistic that the arragement will be successful. Dean O'Connor has worked tirelessly on the issue, talking to faculty, students, alternative suppliers, and Mr. Dewey himself. He has presented a proposal which reflects the concerns of all groups. I believe this proposal will work if all groups recognize the concerns that led to its adoption. Clearly shaken by the controversy, Mr. Dewey seems committed to respond to the grievances. The College Council proposal defines what students and now Mr. Dewey accept as necessary for the responsible operation of a book-supplier for Williams College. If Mr. Dewey does not act upon these proposals as he has agreed, it is our right to demand a new book-supplier.

Daniel Blatt '85 chaired the College Council Bookstore Committee. This article reflects his own opinions. The accompanying section of the Bookstore Proposal reflects the opinions o the whole Council.

Local Charities

An auction to benefit the American Heart Association will be held Saturday, May 11, at the Williams College Faculty Club. Judy O'Neil and Dr. Erwin Steubner are chairmen for the event, which will begin at 6 p.m.

Money raised by the auction supports heart research at both state and national levels, according to the Association.

Tickets are now on sale for the Little Red Schoolhouse Raffle, which will take place Wednesday, May 1. Prizes in the raffle include an APPLE II/c, several free dinners, and a $25 gift certificate from Mrs. Murphy's Chowder House.

Proceeds from the raffle support the operations of the non-profit nursery school. Tickets are available for $1 at St. Pierre's Barber Shop and Cibar Inc. in Williamstown; The Springs Gift Shop in New Ashford; and Gatsbys in North Adams.

Octet Victorious

The Williams Octet will be appearing in Yankee Stadium on May 29. The all male singing group won first prize in an Invitational Contest at Wellesley College, netting $500 and the right to sing "The Star Spangled Banner" before a baseball game.

The other competitors in the Westport, Connecticut, contest were the Wellesley Tupelos, Vassar's Measure for Measure, the Brown Derbies, the Colgate 13, and the Amherst Sabrinas. The groups were judged on stage presence, arrangements and musicality.

Mellon Awarded

Derede Arthur '83 has become the first Williams graduate to win a Mellon Foundation Grant for graduate study. Arthur will use the grant to pursue a Ph.D. in English. She specializes in modern literature and critical theory. The Mellon Grant is renewable for two years, and exceptional students may receive an additional grant for their last year of graduate school to write their dissertation. At last week's faculty meeting, Dean of the Faculty John Reichert urged faculty members to nominate more students for the Mellon Grants because he says Williams has received fewer grants than comparable colleges.

Faculty Honors

Karen B. Kwitter, assistant professor of astronomy, has received a $47,000 grant from the National Science Foundation's program for Research in Undergraduate Institutions.

She will use the two-year grant to focus her research on planetary nebulae and subdwarf O stars. Students will be involved in all stages of the research. Kwitter is collaborating with astronomers at Kitt Peak National Observatory near Tucson, Arizona for part of the project.

At their April meeting, the Trustees approved the Instruction Committee's recommendation that Zirka Z. Filipczak and Charles H. Karelis be promoted to the rank of full professor.

Filipczak, chairman of the art department, is currently an associate professor as is Karelis who is currently chairman of the philosophy department. The promotions will take effect on July 1, 1985.

"In addition to condemnation and stonewalling, those of us who have been victimized by this system have gotten sympathy ...and praise....Now we want action," Murphy told the Council.

Game of chance?

"If Dean Kenyatta is able to convince herself that these results look random, there are some casinos in Las Vegas that I'm sure would be delighted to have her business," Murphy said.

The CUL did not discuss Murphy's allegations about the process, except for a brief explanation of the current process by Chairman William Darrow. The majority of the time was spent on the attitude which Murphy's petition portrayed.

In introducing himself to the CUL, Murphy referred to himself as the "proud owner of the title 'the most hated man in the Berkshire Quad.'" He presented the third version of the petition, which had received 121 signatures, to the committee and said that while deletions had been make from the original for tactical reasons, he was willing to say that the deletions did represent his views.

At the College Council discussion, Gus Haracopos '85 speaking on behalf of an ad-hoc committee said, "No person has the right to say who is outside of Williams society because we are all on the inside."

"I think that this is a real slap in the face to a group of people who are not that much different from you," Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta said.

"These attacks, Hart, are very ugly," said CUL member and political science professor Wendy Brown. She added of the feelings expressed by Murphy, "I think that these sentiments, if they are those expressed by 121 freshmen who read the letter from beginning to end, would be enough to cause me and other faculty members to exit Williams."

At the end of the CUL meeting, Mammen said to Murphy, "I'd hope that between now and the next time we discuss this issue that you think about it and not try to educate us, but reflect on your own thoughts." He added, "The tone of this letter shows that you don't care about people's feelings. You don't respect people."

White '84 gives perspective on Central American travels

by Tom Ewing

The language that is used to dlscuss the controversy between the United States and Nlcaragua hides the fact that there are human belngs in Nicaragua, Mark Smith '84 told an audience of about 120 at a slide-show in Weston Langauge Center last week.

White went to Nicaragua in November durlng the MiG crisls. Because of thls crlsis, he said, the Nicaraguan people were afraid that the United States would lnvade Nlcaragua, and many of them joined the country's militia to oppose the threat.

White said that one reason he went to Nicaragua was to replace workers who had joined the Army and help with the coffee harvest. However, another underlying purpose of his visit, White said, was to deter U.S. troops and U.S. backed contras from attacking the outlying regions by increasing the number of North Americans in those regions.

White talked about the nature of the FSLN, the Sandinista party. The name and the driving force behind the party movement, according to White, came from Augustino Sandino, a nationalist leader of the 1920s who fought against the U.S. Marines then occupying Nicaragua.

White said that the Sandinistas have a nationalistic ideology and are not Marxist-Leninist or communist as they have been called by U.S. government officials. "Nicaragua ls based on El Pueblo - the people," White said.

White said that, because of contra attacks, residents of a town near the Honduran border were afraid to be out in the countryside or leave the city unarmed. Because contra attacks are often aimed at transport trucks, people are afraid to travel openly, he said.

The reality of the war in Nicaragua is kept alive by the recurring sight of graves and funerals and the memory of the 1979 war against Somoza, White said.

The people deal with this constant fear and strain by treating death almost lightly, in a way that White said seemed almost irreverent. He soon realized, he said, that this was simply the way the people had learned to cope with the ever present reality of death.

White said that he had been quite disillusioned by his return to the U.S. and the general perception of Nicaragua that is created by the government and the media.

The Nicaragua Forum, which sponsored White's presentation, will sponsor an afternoon of speeches and music next Monday to mark National No Business as Usual Day, said Carrie Parker '85. The focus of the event will be on Central America, Parker said, but other topics will include South African apartheid, feminism and environmental issues.

Through the rally, the Forum hopes to arouse student interest and connect the broader issues to the experience of Williams students, she explained.

College to open new Humanities Center

by Harwell Wells

College administrators announced at last week's faculty meeting that two proposals which had sparked some faculty opposition—the foundation of a Center for the Humanities and the continued use of The Williams Bookstore for textbook orders—have been approved.

President John Chandler announced that because of faculty support he has approved the founding of a Center for the Humanities and Social Sciences at Williams.

The Center, which provoked dissension among the faculty since it was proposed last year, will eventually serve as a center for interdisciplinary work among faculty members in Divisions I and II. It had been opposed by many Division III faculty members who felt they would not be included in the Center.

Chandler said that he had decided to give the Center a five-year trial run, with a professor of economics as director for the first two years.

The Center will have a minimal budget next year and will not have any fellows or members until the year after next, Chandler said, adding that presently there are no plans for a building to house the Center.

Bookstore policy

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor explained why, the College has opted to allow Joseph Dewey's Williams Bookstore to continue to operate as the sole distrlbutor of textbooks. "We have no good place on campus for a bookstore," O'Connor said. "(The College) ought to, in fairness, let Dewey show us what he can do."

O'Connor said, however, "We are determined to get dramatic results next fall." A rolling deadline for book orders has been established, O'Connor said, with orders handed in between May 20 and June 17 being sent the week after they are submitted. Orders made after June 17 will be sent to the publishers on August 1.

O'Connor told professors who do not get their orders in by the deadline, "I would refer you to your discussions with students on late papers." Despite some faculty questions, he told the group that objections probably will do no good.

Faculty members also discussed problems with the College's system of faculty committees. Professor Rosemary Tong, chairman of the Faculty Steering Committee, asked for suggestions about a proposed revision of the committee system.

The Steering Committee, she said, is studying the system at Williams and hopes that before the May faculty meeting it can submit a list of recommendations to improve the system.

"There is a very high turnover on the committees, so that continuity is lacking," Professor Thomas Spear pointed out. He added that some of this lack of continuity is caused by so-called designated seats, which are filled by representatives from a particular division or another committee.

Chandler said that the whole discussion might signal a swing of the pendulum from twelve years ago, when the system was introduced to allow younger faculty more say in running the College. Professor Lawrence Raab said that one problem is the size of the committees, which often have 12 or 13 members.

Professor Lynda Bundtzen, a member of the Committee on Educational Policy, complained, "One of the issues that has come up this year is that we don't talk about educational policy."

Chandler denounced the proposed Reagan budget cuts for the financing of higher education, explaining that the administration's strategy is to divert enrollment to public institutions. He warned that private colleges will experience a major crisis during the next five years because of a drop in available students of college age.

O'Connor informed the faculty that the experimental policy of extending the due date of end-of-term papers would not become school policy—though it will be permissible to continue the experiment.

Daughter of DC politico offers inside account of a Capitol life

Amanda Deaver gives impressions

by Ashley Tidey

After his nearly twenty-year association with President Ronald Reagan, Deputy Chief of Staff Michael K. Deaver will leave his White House office following the May summit in Bonn, West Germany. Deaver, entering the public relations field in Washington, D.C., will be the last advisor to leave Reagan's so-called "Troika," the President's top three aides.

While the Reagans were pleased to have Deaver in Washington, the Deaver family was not quite as enthusiastic about its move. A month after Reagan's 1981 inauguration, the family joined Deaver in their new Georgetown home—Mrs. Deaver moving from her native city Sacramento and daughter Amanda (age 10) and son Blair (age 5) leaving the school which they had attended since pre-kindergarten.

Looking back on the last four years, Amanda, during a recent interview, described the transition from Sacramento to Washington. Despite her initial unhappiness, Amanda seems as pleased with her family's move as the President was when Deaver accepted his position four years ago.

The difference between Sacramento, CA, and Washinton, D.C., is more than 3,000 miles—that is, as far as Amanda Deaver can tell from her experiences of the last four years. Despite the fact that both places are capitol cities, they have very little in common.

From the Sacramento Valley to the hills of Virginia, from fifth grade buddies to Washington yuppies, and from a small private school in California to the prestigious all-girls' school Holton Arms, Deaver's life has changed quite radically.

Indeed, not many fourteen-year-olds get to hear firsthand from Ronald Reagan about what really did happen to Bonzo from the President's film "A Bedtime for Bonzo." But as Deaver has found, many things are possible if one's father is the White House Deputy Chief of Staff, or as she calls him, "the President's caretaker," whose job entails "overseeing just about everything Mr. Reagan does," including the details of personal appearances and major events such as the Inauguration.

The Deavers' close association with Reagan becomes quite apparent upon entering the family's home, particularly Mrs. Deaver's office, which has four walls of framed pictures—Mr. Deaver with the President, Mr. Deaver with the Pope, Mr. Deaver with a few horses.

Upstairs in her room, Deaver also has a display of pictures, including very old ones with the President at Rancho del Cielo, the Reagans' Santa Barbara ranch, as well as more recent scenes of the January Inaugural Youth Ball, which she attended with her two best friends, who she noted are "both strong Democrats."

Visiting the Reagans

Although Deaver does not feel that she herself is particularly close with the Reagans, she sees them fairly frequently, not only at the White House and Camp David, but also at their Santa Barbara ranch. Deaver said she especially enjoyed her June birthday at Camp David.

Describing Camp David, she said that in addition to the main house, there are two larger guest houses (where Sadat and Begin stayed), five smaller cottages, a golf course, tennis courts, and a pool. Deaver and a friend were in one of the cottages while her parents and Sen. Paul Laxalt (R-Nevada) were in the larger houses.

Deaver noted that the only problem with a birthday dinner party having a guest list that includes the President, his closest aide, and a senator is that conversation centers on one subject—politics.

Taking a dive

The President's pool stunts were a notable aspect of the party. Deaver recalls, "Mr. Reagan was teaching Blair how to do a certain kind of dive off the diving board. But he (Mr. Reagan) kept diving out further and further, getting very close to the middle shallow end of the pool. I think my dad was getting a little nervous about that."

Deaver remarked that what she has enjoyed the most about life as the daughter of a prominent political figure has been the opportunity to meet people through the Reagans and her father. She has met Sandra Day O'Connor, the Bushes (with whom the Deavers had Thanksgiving dinner in Nantucket), and Jeanne Kirkpatrick, whom Deaver described as "outgoing and very outspoken." Kirkpatrick later gave Amanda, her brother, and Mrs. Deaver a tour of the United Nations building.

Deaver explained that she feels more comfortable now than in the past about meeting new people and carrying on conversations at parties and formal dinners. She noted, "I think I've gotten better about talking to people. If you're quiet and don't say anything, those parties get pretty boring."

White House X-MAS

For instance, Deaver remembers feeling much less relaxed at the first Christmas Day dinner that her family spent at the White House (they have gone for the past three years), and related the following anecdote.

"It's usually just Charlie Wick (the director of the United States Intelligence Agency), Nancy Reynolds, and the Reagans. The first time we were there, they said I should wander around. So I walked outside on the balcony and in the private bedrooms.

"Everywhere I went I kept seeing White House stationery which I would stuff into a book the Reagans had given me. But when Mrs. Reagan found me for dinner, she asked to see the book because she hadn't had a chance to look at it before. So when she wasn't looking I quietly dumped the pile of stationery into my bag."

Aside from elegant White House dinners and Camp David retreats, Deaver noted a couple of major disadvantages to having a father in the political limelight, namely her family's always being in public view and the constant worry about the safety of her father. For instance, only two months after the inauguration in Mar. 1981, Mr. Deaver was steps away from Reagan during John Hinckley's assassination attempt. And two years later in Dec. 1982, while there were threats that a "hit" team from Libya had come to the United States, all of the Deavers were assigned Secret Service agents.

Service shadows

"On the first day that they followed me to school, my mom hadn't told me. I saw these guys in the halls and couldn't figure out what was going on. They just aren't very inconspicuous in their three-piece suits and dark glasses," Deaver joked. "We'd come home from school and there were more of them, sitting in our driveway playing cards or falling asleep."

Deaver also remembers the excitement that occurred when the Secret Service agents followed her family to California for Christmas vacation. The Deavers and other friends from Sacramento had rented a house at Squaw Valley; unfortunately, the friends were unaware that the house was under the close surveillance of Secret Service agents.

"They had placed a beeper on the table which my father's friend had picked up. My dad looked at him, absolutely screamed, and told him to drop it, which he did. Seconds later, police and Secret Service agents kicked down the doors and ran in with their guns. The phones didn't stop ringing for hours," Deaver stated.

"Basically, though, they (the Secret Service) just taught us magic tricks and followed us down the ski runs. But we did our best to lose them," she added.

DC drawbacks

Although Deaver said she has enjoyed Washington, especially because of her father's close ties to the White House, she admitted concern over the effects of her father's job on the whole family, particularly on her father.

Deaver said that lately she has been especially concerned with her father's health. During the time of the inauguration, Mr. Deaver (who was General Chairman of the inaugural events) had the flu, which then developed into a kidney reaction. Although he attended the private swearing-in on Sunday, he went into the hospital on the Monday of the public inaugural ceremony.

Deaver was somewhat relieved, not to mention surprised, to hear of her father's resignation on a News Brief while watching "All My Children" over Christmas vaction.

"Luckily, my mom called about a minute later because I was a little shocked," Deaver recalls. But I was so glad. It's been hard on him and the whole family. He is always so tired and worn out. It's definitely time for him to move on....My mom and I finally won!"

She and her mother have won, Deaver explained, because the family will still be in Washington but have time to enjoy the city with a different perspective. Deaver believes that although living under close public scrutiny and hearing constant criticism of one's father can be somewhat unnerving experiences, they are ones which "you just have to take."

She gave the following example to demonstrate her point: "The other night while I was watching 'Saturday Night Live' they were naming people in some skit—Deaver, Meese, and Baker—and said, 'those slimes.' It does hurt to hear comments like that, but there's not much I can do about it."

After the past four years, Deaver, caught between a strong Republican background but with a new set of primarily Democratic friends, now calls herself an Independent.

"My dad knows that I disagree with him on certain issues but it's not something we discuss very much. When we do, like this summer when there was the issue of a mandatory drinking age—he was for it, I was against it—my mom generally stays out of it. Basically, they both support me having my own ideas, which is nice," said Deaver.

"Seconds later, police and Secret Service agents kicked down the doors and ran in with their guns."

Presidential advisor Michael Deaver confers with Ronald Reagan.

Violence and comedy highlight 'True West'

by J.B. Bird

Bill Little '85 almost got wiped out in Friday night's murder scene from True West. The production did not lack intensity. Highlighted by Little's development of Lee and two excellent visits by a "Hollywood Slick" (Peter Vincent '86), the comic rendition of Sam Shepard's play was brilliant.

The protaganist brothers, Austin (Spencer Jones '86) and Lee first appeared jagged and defensive, threatening and insulting each other. Director Chris Varrone '85 had them snowball this antagonism until the play reached its violent climax with Austin's murder attempt.

The brothers are the two poles in Shepard's symbolic structure, a story about the criminal and escapist impulses beneath our most cultural ideals: brotherly love, suburban bliss, the taming of the West, wealth, and fame.

Austin, a successful Hollywood screenwriter, is trying to finish another script. But Lee—burping, dishevelled, drunk—invades Austin's privacy at their mother's vacant house. Lee is everything Austin is not: he grew up roaming the deserts, not Ivy-League schools; he steals; he is the tough slob, Austin the mama's boy.

Varrone staged True West as a stark, linear mounting of tensions. Shepard's energy is inevitably comic, a feature Varrone did not squelch. But his interpretation traded the audience's empathy for an alienating, manic edge.

Had he gone for empathy, the "civilized" character (Austin) would have been the audience projection. Lee would have threatened the civilized audience's way of life; but the play would have thrown us a wrench with Austin's murder attempt, reversing our dramatics, not sequentially developing them.

Varrone made Austin an unlikable brat from the start. Entirely immersed in his role, Jones made it satisfying to see the pouting Austin undone. When Austin and Lee reversed roles, we witnessed Austin's despair, not his liberation from old ideals; he had been too precious to have ideals.

Austin was more likable and liberated in the toaster scene, the production's best of many intense moments. Austin comes home with a fleet of stolen toasters to disturb Lee, now in Austin's old seat before the typewriter. Little, who had excellent timing and presence throughout, beat up the typewriter, threw toast all over the room, and ripped a phone out of the wall, while Austin tried to make the perfect golden slice: "What is it with the toast? You act as if it's salvation or something."

Shepard's play became a riotous attack on Austin. The linear logic of this left a few pauses and emotional transitions awkward, and altered the subtle illogic of Shepard's symbolic and emotional designs; but the actors forged a consistent, unrelenting interpretation that really attacked the audience.

Behind the (Bacchaean) scenes

by David DeNicolo

Joanna Adler '86 and Bruce Bullock '86 portray dual aspects of Dionysos in the Williamstheatre production of Euripides' 'The Bacchae.'

An adaptation of Euripides' The Bacchae will be this semester's MainStage production at the Adams Memorial Theatre. The piece, written by Nigerian playwright Wole Soyinka, was commissioned by Britain's National Theatre in 1971. Under the direction of Micheal Knight, assistant professor of theatre, The Bacchae speaks with its own particular desperation and urgency to a contemporary audience.

Thebes, under Pentheus, is a stagnant society, saturated with fear. The ideolgy of its young, and at times frighteningly attractive ruler is that of the twentieth century extreme right-wing as it has existed and exists now in many of the world's developing countries. It is an ideology of militarism, of violent domination, and of the fetishistic love of order. Pentheus is a despot who has lost sight of his own humanity. Into this infected world comes Pentheus's cousin, the god Dionysos—and the struggle begins.

Dionysos speaks for the passion of liberation, for creativity, and for exultation. Where there was oppressive order, Dionysos creates disorder; but it is a disorder of grand purpose for through it Thebes will be purged and, by the end of the play, a new order will be created.

According to Knight, Dionysos is capable of overcoming Pentheus's entrenched systems of domination through the way the God embodies and employs worldly dualities. The God is capable of seeing order in chaos; the God understands human frallty and limitation and yet constantly pushes humans to the limits of their abilities; the God comes from the past and brings with him the spirit of the future. This idea of duality is so central to the play for Knight that he has cast two people, a man and a woman, as Dionysos.

With a cast of thirty, The Bacchae is a large and extremely complex undertaking. There is an impressive number and variety of professional collaborators on this project—even by Williamstheatre standards. Aside from Knight, faculty participants include: Sandra Burton, dance coordinator; Arden Fingerhut, associate professor of theatre; and Bruce Goodrich, theatre instructor.

Burton has choreographed the frequent and large-scale dances while assisting in the coordination of many of the other aspects of staging. She has worked to bring the actors to a level of proficiency in the use of physical expression throughout the play. Burton has opted to include a number of the techniques of African dance in her work—finding its style

TA's go to the head of the class

by Martin Hildebrand

For roughly 95 students, academics here at Williams has included not only doing their own coursework, but also helping fellow students through the sometimes rewarding, often frustrating, process of learning. These students worked as teaching assistants [TA's], serving in paid positions in 14 departments last fall [figures compiled by Dean of Faculty John Reichert; figures for this spring are unavailable]. The departments with the most TA's were biology, chemistry, mathematical sciences (which includes computer science), and physics and astronomy.

The duties of TA's vary. Astronomy TA's help run observing sessions, computer science TA's are available in Jesup to answer questions, psychology TA's grade progress checks, science TA's help run labs, and other TA's may lead review sessions or run conference sections.

Ideally, TA's make strong contributions to the courses in which they assist. Chrissy Radloff '86, a TA for Psychology 101, believes TA's are a good alternative to asking questions of professors. "Some psychological theories are abstract and psychology TA's are more approachable when you don't have an idea of what's going on. Especially for freshmen who are not used to talking with professors, a TA can be less intimidating," Radloff noted. William Schoenfeld '87, a TA for Philosophy 101 last fall, agreed. Schoenfeld views his role as "getting the students to think more about the topic and helping their understanding."

Physics professor Fielding Brown finds that TA's can help professors too. "Occasionally TA's will catch mistakes in the professor's solutions to problem sets, and that's useful," said Brown. "There have been occasions when TA's have recognized features of an experiment being done that are not in procedures or professor's instructions and that enhanced the value of the lab."

Student responses to TA's are also positive. Valerie Maston '87 thinks that physics TA's are "more than necessary in the lab." Added Karen Goldstein '87, who took Physics 100 last fall, "They seemed to take a lot of time grading problem sets and writing helpful comments." And Beth Ebel '86 refers to her lab TA from freshman chemistry as her "mentor."

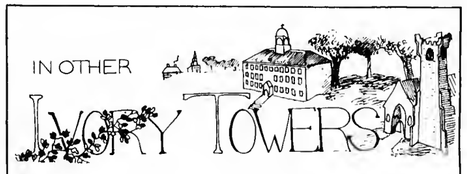
Commitment

The role of a TA at Williams has some limits. Reichert notes that the only grading TA's are allowed to do is on "objective tests." Radloff believes, "One of the good things is that TA's are not too involved. We have our roles, but the professors have their roles too. I think that set-up works very well here."

Professor Brown stresses the importance of a TA's involvement as a crucial factor. "It is essential to the success of a TA that the TA want to do it and is willing to make some commitment to quality work."

According to TA Dominic Kulik '86, such is the case for Sociology 488, the student-initiated Nonviolence and Social Change. "We [the TA's] have tremendous interest in this particular course because we are the organizers," he explained.

By becoming involved in classroom instruction, TA's get some idea of the challenges and rewards of teaching. Holly Kulka '85, who was a TA in computer science last fall and is currently a TA in economics, finds both trials and tribulation to being a TA.



"There are days when I think I get across and some days when I don't. In computer science, it's always one-on-one, and I get across pretty well," she said. "It's very rewarding when someone sees the light, but it's frustrating when you can't get a point across."

Kulik finds that being a TA gives him better perspective on a professor's tasks, noting, "I have new-found respect for the responsibilities of teachers on campus." Schoenfeld added, "It gave me a tremendous perspective on how hard the professor's work is. I had thought being a professor was being on a long vacation filled with respect and a pipe, and that's not quite the case."

Lip-service

TA's tell of a variety of lighter incidents. Schoenfeld, for instance, recalls good-natured toying with naive freshmen. "I abused freshmen when they would come to me and ask what's on the exam. I would say 'Plato's Idea of the Forms,

HARVARD

The adventures of the Harvard Lampoon's Sacred Ibis came to a close last week when its abductors, members of the rival Harvard Crimson, returned it to its perch atop the Lampoon building. The five foot-tall copper bird was allegedly stolen by 11 members of the Crimson, who scaled their rival's building with mountaineering equipment. The "birdnapping" was in retaliation for the alleged stealing of a set of caricatures of the Crimson's past presidents.

Before the bird was returned, the Crimson culprits paraded their prize around Harvard Square, took it to a meal at a campus dining hall, visited Harvard Stadium, and had it photographed with the Dean of Students. In one of the last ceremonies before its return, the bird was blessed by the minister of Harvard's Memorial Church.

The emotional return of the Ibis was not entirely peaceful, however. Lampoon editors refused to come out of their office for a half hour, and nested in the building while the Crimson contigent was pelted with eggs by an amused crowd. The charges against the alleged birdnappers—two Crimson editors—were eventually dropped, but the school may still take action.

The last time the bird flew its coop was in 1953 when two Crimson members stole it and gave it to the Soviet delegation at the UN in New York, hoping that the bird would be placed on top of a Moscow University building. But the Soviets (perhaps Yale fans) declined the offer and returned the bird to the Lampoon. (Globe)

Although Spring Break '85 is now over, the memories linger on. According to a recent Globe article, the Universities of Maryland and Michigan shared the dubious distinction of having more students jailed in Fort Lauderdale during Spring Break than did any other college. Nine students from each school spent the night in jail, learning the difference between a night at the bars and a night behind bars. Tied for second place in the unusual contest were Ohio State and the U.S. Naval Academy, with six "all-nighters" each. (Globe) objectively be to the left of campus, but no one is plotting the overthrow of the government. And homosexuality is not a "crime against nature." The petition has become progressively milder in tone, but it is crucial to recognize that at the root, attitudes of intolerance motivate the criticisms of the housing process, the Quad, and its residents.

The problem here goes beyond statements and petitions. The problem is in evidence on this campus and in the "real world" every day. I'm talking about homophobic "jokes", about JA's telling freshmen not to go to BSU meetings, about attitudes of condescension and contempt toward those who don't fit the Williams "image." The problem here is that people are being hurt, and they are being excluded.

That so many students here could be complicit by their silence or by their participation in this defining of what does and does not constitute Williams both dismayed and frightened me. Mr. Murphy's petition struck a note of fear in me because it made me think that there must be a consensus agreement for his opinions on this campus in order for it to have been so bold. However, the rally last Friday should stand as an assurance to anyone who felt the same, that there is no consensus here for the ugly attitudes evidenced in the petition. The rally affirmed that the Berkshire Quad is very much an integral part of Williams College and that students of all kinds can and do make up what we call the Williams community. Contrary to the petition's assertion that "the greatest diversity is to be found not within the Berkshire Quad, but between the Berkshire Quad and everywhere else," diversity is everywhere on this campus. Differences should not be endured or contained in ghettos. Differences need to be encouraged to promote understanding and interaction on this campus as well as elsewhere. We as students at Williams need to speak up to contradict the rightness of the Williams "image."

For the Record

tees agreed with him, the three who clung to Williamstown, the good guys, won out. The Reverend Doctor Edward Griffin took over the helm in 1821 and got the school back on its feet, as the nefarious Dr. Moore went on to some insignificant pursuit. (My theory is that anyone named Zephaniah has got to be either a pyscho killer or a founder of Amherst College.)

If it's easy to get into a rut in Williamstown these days, imagine life at Williams in the 1820's. First of all, all the professors were ordained ministers. Also, the working day began at half-past five in the summer and at six in the winter—their version of winter study, I guess. At the first warning bell, the student, ice cold, hopped out of bed into the pitch black. "If the oil in his lamp had not frozen during the night, he lighted it; the fire had to be started in the potbellied stove, and water drawn from a common well. At six came a second bell, a prelude to morning services." Harsh.

Of course, that's not the end of the story. The rest, as we know, is history. But it's interesting to see how things have changed: women are now admitted; with the emergence of Pownal to our north, Williamstown is no longer considered too distant from centers of population; and the fine for hunting and fishing without leave has been raised to a quarter to keep up with inflation.

Murphy

free to. But no one should be forced to join them."

Least diverse

Murphy asserts that the residents of the Berkshire Quad have created their own haven because they have rejected the Williams mainstream. For this reason, he claims it is "less diverse than any other place on campus and by a hefty margin."

"In rejecting their uniformity," he said, "I am asserting diversity."

Murphy's petition closes, "What the Berkshire Quad represents is a sub-culture, a system of values, an outlook with which we unequivocally refuse to be, in any way, shape, or form, 'affiliated'."

In an earlier version read to residents of Fitch/Currier Sunday at their house snacks, Murphy said, "Criticism of the Berkshire Quad is one in the same with praise for Williams College as a whole. The passion with which we hate the former is the same passion with which we love the latter."

Asked by the Record whether he would transfer to Amherst rather than live in the Berkshire Quad, Murphy replied, "Yea."

Recantations

College Council President Anza Mammen '86 and others have suggested that the students who signed the three-page petition had not read all of it. Henry Jones '88, a resident of East who has been placed in Fitch next year, originally signed the petition, but when he learned its full content, he told Murphy to erase his signature.

"He's voicing a prejudice," said Jones, "and I don't want to be any part of it."

At the rally, Lec referred specifically to Murphy's petition and said, "If we (black students) appear to be outside the mainstream, it is because we choose not to sacrifice ourselves and our identities for this elusive ideal, which by nature, must be white." He added that some members of the College community are "forcing an exchange of blackness—black beauty and black pride—for the dubious acceptance of the Williams community."

Gus Haracopos '85, speaking for the Gay and Lesbian Union, declared that since everyone's perception of the mainstream is not the same, "no one has the right to decide who is outside of the Williams community."

Misrepresented

Murphy claims his position has been misrepresented. Saying the issue of tolerance has been fabricated by special interest groups, he termed the rally a "purely cynical effort on their part to establish a platform for their interests by misrepresenting what I said."

Additionally, he said, the administration is delighted to have the complex issue of freshmen inclusion neglected. "The ulterior motives of the administration and the various special interest groups in clouding the issue have happily coincided," he told the Record.

Murphy claimed opponents have criticized him but still have not addressed his complaints about the inclusion process. "They want to create a bigot where there isn't one," he said.

Describing himself as a Democrat, Murphy said that he sees the Williams atmosphere as much more tolerant than that of his home state of Texas. "Down South, the special interest group is the Fundamentalist Christians who would be rallying to my side," Murphy claimed, adding that his values are not influenced by religious convictions.

He said that he personally rejects homosexuality but explained that "people have a right to have those lifestyles."

Intolerance

"I value very highly the family," he said. "They (his opponents) are saying that there is no place on this campus for those who hold those beliefs. That's intolerant."

To Kenyatta, Murphy and his supporters are the Williams version of a national trend. "(His petition expressed) a set of values that people on this campus and people nationwide hold that gay people have no right to exist," she said.

"Hart verbalized what other people were unwilling to say," Kenyatta said, explaining that she believes Murphy articulates values held by many people.

Murphy admitted he made a tactical error in denouncing the BQ so strongly because his critics have responded to his words, not his message.

His only intention, he said, has been to call for a revamping of the inclusion process. "All I want is a freshmen inclusion process that you won't have to try to outsmart."

Mills' Principle of Utility, and Kant's Teleological Imperative.' They would nod and look blank, and then I would say Kant didn't have a Teleological Imperative."

Kulka, too noted amusing incidents, saying, "In computer science, I was helping one person after the time I was scheduled, and when he realized this, he came over and kissed me on the forehead. It made my year."

Many TA's find that their role helps them to learn as well. Kulik believes, "It forces me to really work with the academic material closer than before," and Radloff finds that "It's educational for us [psychology TA's] because we're forced to review and remember the 101 stuff." Ebel, a TA in both chemistry and physics said, "I've really liked TA'ing for the most part. It's a good way for me to learn the stuff, and it's a good way to meet people in other classes."

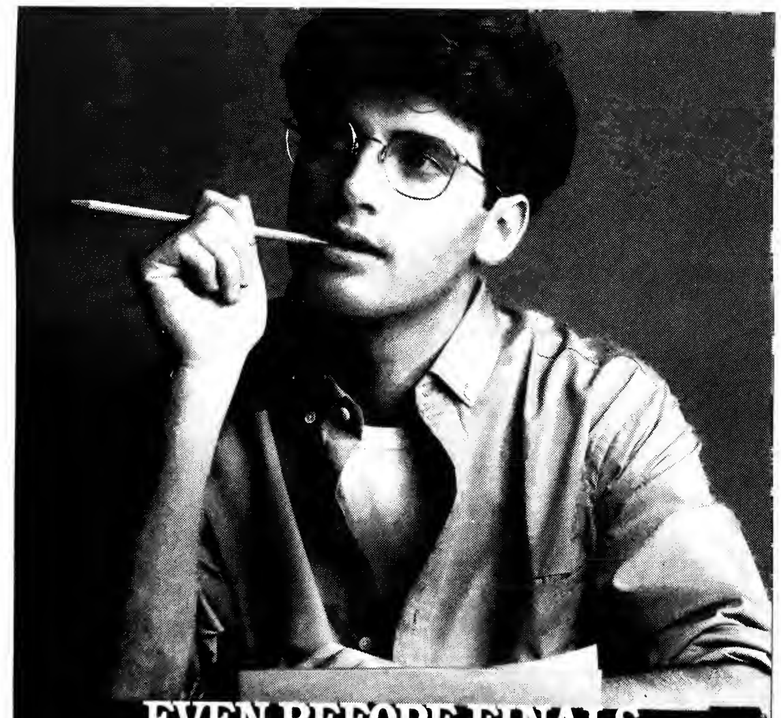
cally, this was the most difficult year we've had," he commented Smith attributes the increased number of applications to improved searching processes, better Williams admissions literature, and more follow-up on specific applicants.

"We try to show that Williams is the best of the small college options in the country," Smith said. He said that it is too early to detect any trends in the personality of the class of 1989, but he said that the students represent a broader geographic spread than usual with 50 percent more students from California than from Connecticut.



In addition, Smith noted an increase in minority applications. Smith said that although recent publicity about federal financial aid prospects did not affect this year's admissions figures, he fears that in the future many people who need financial aid will not bother to apply.

Committee hopes that the JA will translate high involvement in the school to the freshmen in the dormitory, McKeen explained.

The only regrets that McKeen has about this year's selection process are that the applicant pool was limited to about 150 students. He feels that there are many students who would have been excellent JA's who did not apply. On the other hand, McKeen said that there were many candidates who would have been excellent JA's if there were enough positions for them to occupy.

Laura Napolitano '85 slides into second, but she was out on the play, as were the Ephs on the afternoon. Smith won 11-4 in extra innings. (Scheibe)

Softball

Despite a well played game, the women's softball team lost to a tough Smith squad 11-4. The team now stands at 1-3.

The Ephs took the lead in the third inning when senior Karen Montzka hit a triple to bring in a runner. In the top of the fourth, Smith's Elaine Bernaski belted a grand slam to give them a 4-1 lead.

Williams responded with a run in the bottom of the fourth by Tory Ballard '87 and added two more by when Darca Boom '87 and Teresa Gaims '85 crossed the plate in the seventh to tie the game and send it into extra innings. In the eighth, Smith wasted little time, scoring seven unanswered runs to take the win.

Montzka pitched the whole game for the Ephs and chipped in a triple, a single, and a sacrifice fly. "I was very pleased with the team's performance today," said coach Harry Sheehy. "Karen pitched a great game, but we were just two errors away from beating them."

Golf

by Rick Orluk

Avenging last year's loss to Colgate, the men's golf team took advantage of 76's from senior Mike Hennigan and sophomore Chas Foehl to push their record to 2-0. They finished with a combined total of 396, nine strokes ahead of Colgate, at 405, and clearly outclassing an undermanned Vassar squad, who scored 448.

Balanced scoring propelled the Ephs to the win, as Brian Benn '85, John Kucich '88, and Chris Harned '85 scored 79, 82, and 83, respectively to balance 78's from two Colgate players.

Williams also entered a "B" team which finished at 218. Randy Rogers '85 played an almost perfect front nine with a 33, and an 18 hole total of 76.

The Ephmen played yesterday at Trinity against Trinity and UConn.

Riding

by Frank Huyler

The Williams riding team had an especially strong spring season this year, sending four riders to the regional championships and nearly sending one to nationals.

At the regionals on Saturday at Colby Sawyer College, Tina Brown '85 just missed qualifying for nationals with a second-place finish in open equitation over fences. Kate Elliot '85 placed fifth in intermediate equitation on the flat and eighth in intermedite equitation over fences, while Frank Huyler '87 placed eighth in novice equitation over fences. Sue Michalski '86 also qualified for the regionals.

Several other meets highlighted the riders' season. On April 6 at Tufts, freshman Jill Smith took first place in beginner walk trot, thereby advancing to the next division; at the University of Lowell, Huyler qualified for regionals with a first place in novice equitation on the flat.

At Newbury junior College, Brown was named high-point rider for her first place finishes in open equitation. Team captain Elliot took two third places at Newbury.

Coach Sherron Knopp was pleased by the team's performance this year and noted that despite a lack of college transportation and enough funds, Williams has held its own against schools with far larger riding programs.

Track 5th in NESCACs

by Will Gillanders

Sunday, the track team travelled to Amherst to compete among the other schools in the NESCAC championships. The men's team tied for fifth overall with 59 points behind Trinity and Amherst, who scored 107 and 106.5 points respectively. Senior co-captains Kevin Jenkins and Paul Toland led the tracksters, Jenkins taking a second place in the 800 meters in 1:55.1, while Toland skied 6'2" in the high jump to take third place.

Junior John Ellison might have been a little wet after clearing the first water jump of the gruelling steeple chase, but that did not stop him as he went on to race past a nine-year old school record by 17 seconds, missing a national qualifying time by tenths of a second with a time of 9:18. Freshman Joe McGinn heaved the hammer 146'4" to take second, while in other weight events Dan Root '87 gathered fifth place in the shot put, as did Bill Leininger '86 in the discus.

Freshman Scott Powers, a new member of the team, held his own in the long jump, clearing 20'7.5" to take third, and also moved past several competitors to take an impressive fourth in the 200 meter sprint against a strong field with a time of 22.9 seconds. Finishing a busy day, he also helped the 400 meter relay team take third, along with fellow sprinters Kevin Jenkins '85, Henry Jones '88, and Clark Otley '86. Otley also distinguished himself in the open 100 meters, taking a fifth place, while Jones also jumped 20'0" to place fifth in the long jump.

For the women, Chinyere Uwah '85, running her first 800 meter race ever, paced her way to first place in her heat, second overall in an outstanding time of 2:20. Sophomore Becky Conklin ran well also, taking fourth in the 1500 meters in 4:57, while Beth Schmidt '85 making the transition from nordic skiing took sixth place in the 3000 m. run in 10:40. Senior co-captain Lindsay Rockwood took sixth in the high jump, and the 400 meter relay team rounded out the women's effort with another sixth place.

Next weekend the track team travels to Wesleyan and the tri-meet will determine the Little Three Champions. The men's team faces a very strong Amherst squad but another Williams upset is not entirely out of the question.

"It's something that I've always wanted to do. Besides, I still have to beat Amherst." With these words, senior Debbie Wickenden describes the genesis of the Williams women's golf team.

As the driving force behind the college's latest effort to introduce coeducation into all aspects of Williams life, Wickenden has drawn together a diverse and talented squad of 13 women, and with four matches already looming on the horizon, she anticipates a competitive and fun-filled season.

In addition to Wickenden, this fledgling squad features seniors Marcy Rubinger, Susan Knapp, Bea Bast, Caroline McNerney, Lindsay Rockwood, Anne Redfield, Liz Mangee, and Jonna Kurucz; juniors Sally Hard, Carin Cataldo, and Barb Chalfonte, and freshman upstart Joey Akhtar.

Wickenden admits that this will be a season for building. "We have some members on our team who have never golfed before, and others who should probably never golf again," she smiled, "but we'd be happy to welcome any additional players. It's really an open team."

Following a strenuous practice schedule which begins this week, the lady linksters will play matches against a select group of seven women from the Taconic Golf Club; a Sadie Hawkins match, where they will each pair up with a member of the men's team; an intra-squad match; and of course, the classic battle for the Little Three Championship against arch-rival Amherst. All of these matches will be played on the greens of our own Taconic.

The team also looks forward to a successful recruiting campaign. With nine members being lost to graduation, Wickenden hopes that the performance of this year's team will attract many new underclass members.

WUFO

by Hans Humes

The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization emerged as victors from this weekend's Hampshire College Tournament. The squad won all three of their games to take first from a field of eight teams including Hampshire, the Visitors from UMass, Harvard, Boston College, Brown, and Clark.

The first game was played against the Visitors, a team that WUFO has played frequently this year. Although Williams has a winning record against them, the Visitors have defeated WUFO in some crucial contests. Although there was some apprehension about playing the Visitors squad in the first round, then, there was a definite desire to win.

The game marked by some outstanding play over-all. There were few turnovers by either team. The most consistent scoring connection in the game for Williams was, as so often has been the case, a freshman Chris Jones pass to senior co-captain Phil Lohre. Other notables in the game included last year's President Mystur Syk '84, co-captain Scott Tully '85, John Berton '85, and Darryl Walsh '87.

The game started slowly for WUFO who fell behind 6-3. However, they came back to take the half at 7-6 and to win the game in an intensly played second half 13-10. The second game's opponent was played Boston College. While Williams may have been a bit over-confident and committed a few too many errors, the score was never closer than two points and WUFO won 13-10. This game was indicative of the depth of WUFO, as strong first-tournament performances were shown by Dave Mochel '88, Paul Vignaux '88, Ted Lange '88, and Coleman O'Connor '85, who showed that he could be a star without skis. WUFO went into the finals against Brown, who had demolished Harvard in the first round and defeated Hampshire handily 13-9. The boys from Brown earned the designation "the Immortals" for playing the entire tourney without substitutes. While this tired them out, it also resulted in smooth, cohesive playing by Brown as they read each other well on the field. The game proved to be well-matched.

For the first time, Williams lost the first half, which was worrisome but also gave the squad a clear-cut goal for the second round of play. So they gathered their psyche and stormed back to put the score at 10-9, one short of victory. But Brown held on, through defense and errors by WUFO and took the game into overtime. Finally, however, Lohre pulled down a floating pass to cap off an outstanding day of play and so clinched victory in the game anmd the tournament. Credit for the victory must be shared by Chris Mullin '85 and junior Sebastiano Pugliese who after fulfilling "previous obligations" showed up to play in the final game in front of the eyes of adoring spectators.

Fingerhut has designed a set that communicates the clash of ancient and modern structures while it defines the boundaries between the infected stone world of Thebes and the hills and meadows outside the city.

Goodrich has designed costumes that display a definite B.C. spirit, with a number of modern variations of structure and color scheme.

The guest artists include Kweyao Agyapon, who has composed and will perform music for the play that helps define the spirit of rejoicing in Soyinka's adaptation, and Tyrone Mitchell, who has sculpted a series of performance masks based on African prototypes.

This ambitious and eclectic production of The Bacchae will be performed on April 25-27 and May 2-4 at 8 p.m. on the AMT MainStage. Reservations can be made at the AMT box office (597-2425), open 12-5 p.m. Monday through Friday. Tickets are $1.50 or 50¢ with a Williams ID.

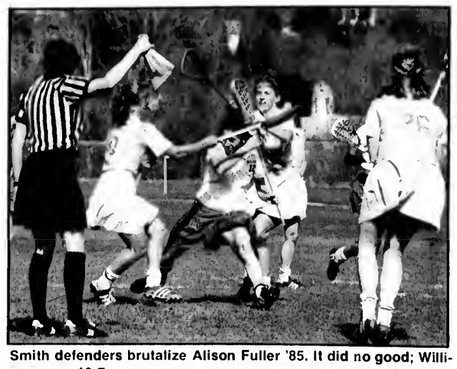
Wesleyan strands baseball 4-2

by Greg Norton and Rob Coakley

Despite stellar performances by senior Mike Coakley with the bat and sophomore Seth Lawry on the mound, the baseball team fell to Little Three rival Wesleyan 4-2 on Saturday. Coakley paced the team with four hits, twice driving junior Dick Hollington across the plate, while Lawry went eight and one third innings giving up only three runs to a potent Cardinal offense. The loss was the Ephs fourth in a row.

Wesleyan, utilizing timely hitting, scored in the first on back-to-back hits, and again in the fourth. Williams responded by rallying in the third and the seventh to tie up the game. Both teams played outstanding defense sending the game into the ninth inning tied 2-2. Wesleyan's Joe Grasso then doubled to centerfield scoring John Miechkowski with the winning run off Lawry.

Junior Kevin Morris relieved Lawry, giving up one run before ending the inning with a double play. Williams could not produce in the bottom of the ninth, dropping their record to 5-8. "I was terribly disappointed that we weren't able to hit with men in scoring position," said Williams coach Bob Coakley. The Ephmen stranded ten runners on base in the game.



The large Weston field crowd not only enjoyed a close, well-played baseball game, but also a good old-fashioned jaw-to-jaw confrontation between the umpire and the Wesleyan coach, leading to his ejection.

10-6 loss to RPI

Last Sunday the Ephs could not mount an offensive attack and played suspect defense in falling to RPI 10-6. Williams dropped behind quickly as RPI erupted for five first inning runs.

Capitalizing on a series of walks, wild pitches, and two consecutive hit batters, the Ephs stormed back with five runs of their own behind just one hit. But RPI wrapped up a victory by scoring three runs in the sixth and added two more in the eigth mostly do to Eph errors. Williams committed five errors on the day.

The Ephs, 5-8, continue Little Three action on Tuesday, traveling to archrival Amherst.

Laxwomen down Smith

by Faith Raider

Coming back in the second half with a 13 goal blitz, passing Smith with relative ease, and cruising to a 16-7 victory at Cole Field on Saturday, the women's lacrosse team ran their season record to 3-2.

Only senior tri-captain Allison Fuller and junior Laura Rogers were able to score in the second half against a strong Smith defense. But trailing 4-3 at the break, the Ephwomen exploded. Rogers led the scoring onslaught with four additional goals, while Fuller ran her game totals to four goals and one assist.

Other scorers were Gigi Madore '87 and tri-captain Jill Leet '85 with two goals and one assist, and Lee Wierdsma '87, Jane Reeh '85, and Julie Infurna '88 with one apiece.

That kind of explosive offense served the Ephwomen well on Wednesday as they squeaked out a 10-9 victory over Union. After being tied at the half 6-6, Williams spurted to a 10-8 lead, before a Union score with only 58 seconds left pulled them to within one, but the Ephwomen held them off for the one-point win. Fuller again led the scoring with three goals and three assists while Infurna had two goals and two assists. "Union played a hard fast game; they gave us a fight. We struggled but managed to win," said Coach Chris Larson-Mason.

Top ranked in NE, tennis beats Jeffs

by Cliff Peale

Looking defeat straight in the eye and never flinching, the men's tennis team used pressure doubles performances to beat the Amherst Lord Jeffs 5-4 on Saturday. The win boosted the Ephs to the number one ranking in New England.

After gaining a 3-3 tie coming out of the singles against the Jeffs, the Ephmen had every reason to be confident, since doubles had pulled out earlier matches against Tufts and Colgate. "I thought we had the match," said coach Sean Sloane, "but Amherst played better in the doubles than I thought they would."

The Jeffs shocked the entire Williams team by taking the number two Eph pair of juniors Chris Clarey and Tim Peterson 7-6, 6-3. And when the number three pair of Kevin Callanan '87 and Andy Canning '85 fell behind 4-1 in the second set after winning the first, things looked fairly grim. They looked worse when the number one pair of seniors Craig Hammond and Tim Rives lost the first set and fell behind 4-1 in their second set.

Doubles teams clinch win

But the Ephs came back. Callanan and Canning rallied to win their match 7-6, 7-5 and square the match score at 4-4. Hammond and Rives then came back to win the second set, then wiped their opponents off the court in the third and deciding set to win 5-7, 6-4, 6-1.

The doubles competition followed a hard-fought singles portion of the match, in which the top three singles players won while the bottom three lost. The top two players, Hammond and Rives, both won by identical 6-2, 6-1 scores, while Callanan emerged victorious at number three 6-2, 6-4.

Clarey and Peterson fell by scores of 6-2, 7-5 and 6-3, 7-5, respectively, and number six player Chris Meyers won a first-set tiebreaker before losing 12 straight games to fall 6-7, 6-0, 6-0.

"It should have been their match," said Sloane. "We played very good doubles matches to win."

Earlier in the week, the Ephs beat Colgate 5-3, again winning two doubles matches to clinch the match. Playing freshmen at numbers one and three, the Raiders pressed the Ephmen, winning the number one match when Hammond fell 6-3 in the third set. But Rives won at number two, and Callanan survived a tough match to win in three sets at Peterson won at number five to notch a three-all tie going into the doubles. The numbers one and three doubles pairs then won to insure the victory.

This weekend the team heads to Middlebury for the NESCAC tournament, where they will be defending the titles won last year by Brook Larmer '84 and the doubles team of Larmer and Rives.

Bantams beat laxmen

by Greg Keller and Andrew Smith

Sophomore Mike O'Connell continues to lead the lacrosse teams scoring attack, but his efforts were not enough as the squad dropped two away games this week.

O'Connell opened the scoring in Saturday's game at Trinity. Sophomore Jim Sperry and freshman Jonathan Edie each contributed a goal in the third period, but a scrappy Bantam squad was able to tie the score at 3-3. O'Connell tallied again in the final period, but Trinity capitalized on two fast breaks to edge the Ephmen, 5-4.

Coach Renzi Lamb lauded the defensive effort of junior goalie Brad duPont, who made 14 saves, though he was disappointed with the team's play on the whole. "We didn't play well; we didn't run, and Trinity put in an extra effort," said Lamb.

On Wednesday the team travelled to Hanover, N.H. to face a tough Dartmouth squad. Although coach Lamb knew that the Division I Big Green was a superior team, he hoped for an upset like the early victory over Air Force. However, Dartmouth downed the Ephmen, 14-6.

O'Connell paced the Eph attack with three goals and one assist. Other Williams scorers were sophomores Sperry and Matt Salisbury and senior Dave Flynn. The major problem was that Dartmouth outshot Williams 46-25.

The Ephmen, now 2-2, look forward to tomorrow's away game against the Union Dutchmen.

Crew swamps Little Three opponents

by Mary Taylor

Winning five of the eight races run at 2000 meters, the Eph crew team competed in the Little Three regatta on Saturday, led by the performance of the men's heavyweight boat.

The boat moved their record to 4-0 while winning their race with a time of 5:47.6. The men's varsity lightweight boat fell to the Wesleyan eight, although coach Peter Wells was pleased with their effort. Wells is optimistic that these boats will improve as the weeks go by and noted that they probably faced the toughest competition of the day.

The varsity women came from behind to clinch their 14th straight Little Three victory, while the freshmen women's boats finished second and first, respectively.

The Eph teams host a regatta next week at Lake Onota, with teams from UMass, Lowell, and Tufts traveling here.

"I get by with a little help from my friends"

Playing E-side at Cole Field Saturday against Tufts, senior line captain Mark Evans prepares to pitch to Jon Stanley '87 as Denis Newcomer '87 looks on. Evans scored an early try to stake the white dogs to a 4-0 lead, and excellent second-half play led to a 10-3 victory. Meanwhile, the A-side demolished the Jumbos 25-0, as senior scrum-half Roger Merriam dominated action on the line and scored the final try on a late penalty kick. The Killer B's fell to Albany State 18-6 despite two successful penalty kicks by Tom Connally '87. The C-side traveled to RPI and suffered through a miserable first half on the way to a 27-0 trouncing. And the D-side fell to the powerful line of the B-siders while falling 22-0.

Computer randomly sorts freshmen housing choices

by Virginia Demaree and Martita Weil

Allegations of favoritism and social engineering on the part of the administration have prompted an ongoing Record investigation into the freshmen inclusion process which has determined that the computer program is random.

Describing the computer listing as "a big, hairy Fortran program," Larry Wright, director of the Computer Center, showed the Record a copy of the program used to place freshmen into upperclass housing. Record representatives found the program to be completely random.

Wright said that after the Deans' Office receives the freshmen housing forms, they are delivered to Jesup and the information is entered into the computer. Freshmen names are entered individually, alphabetically, along with student ID numbers, sex, and the size of the group with which they applied .

The member of each group whose name comes first alphabetically is assigned a random number, and others who applied with that person receive the same random number.

"The program uses a standard random number generator," Wright said. "You give the computer a number to start with, and it generates a stream of random numbers. It runs a quarter of a million or so before it repeats a sequence of numbers." Wright said that if you give the computer the same starting point it will generate the same series of random numbers.

Sara Clark, who wrote the original inclusion program in 1971, said "That (whether the original seed is random) is an irrelevant issue. If the seed is changed each year, you'd have to be omnipotent to affect the program. It's fair. It's random."

After assigning numbers, the computer sorts the names according to the random numbers, people with the lowest numbers going to the top of the list. The computer program then goes through the student housing preferences.

It maximizes first choices by trying to fit each student into his most favored house and leaving him out temporarily if that house is filled. The program then goes back through the list and does the same for second, third, fourth and fifth choices.

Almost all

In this way, the computer places almost all students in houses. "There are always a few groups left out at the end," said Wright, explaining that the Deans' Office places those groups personally. "There's a little manual pushing to place those groups in a house," he explained. "There's potential social engineering at the end, but it's only one or two groups.

The program is clean," Wright asserted. "The Deans' Office has to do the explaining."

Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta confirmed that only one or two groups have to be manually placed in a house. "This year only three males were left out of the original run of the program," she said.

The program contains a "slack factor," which allows for one or two extra spaces in each house. According to Wright, the addition of extra spaces reduces discrimination against large groups which get high random numbers and thus end up at the bottom of the inclusion lists.

The computer will look through the available beds in each house and use the slack room to squeeze in groups where one real space and two or three "slack spaces" are available. In this way, groups of three or four can be put into houses where it would appear that only one room is left. "The number one rule is that we don't break up groups," Wright said.

No switches

Kenyatta said that she also uses the slack beds to place the students left out of housing by the computer program. "I don't switch groups from one house to another," she said.

"Single groups will still have a better chance," Wright said, although the slack rooms are designed to offset that factor. "The smaller the group, the easier it is to get in."

Wright said that in the past the program has been run more than once to try to create a better statistical fit and to see if more people can be given their first choice. "It usually doesn't change the results but one or two percentage points," Wright said, adding that the program has only been run once this year.

"The problem is not the computer program. The problem is student perceptions," said William Darrow, Chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life. Darrow and Kenyatta met

Future drinking age legislation may empty out the now-crowded and popular Log. (Plonsker)

No grandfather clause in Mass., Vt. legislature is still holding out

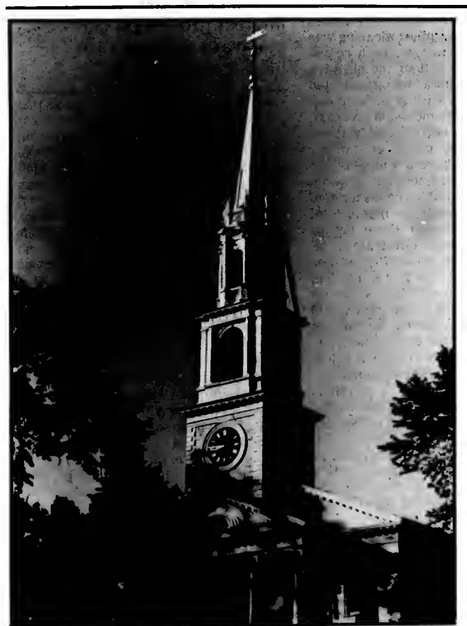
by Andrew Mayer

College authorities predict there will be few changes in enforcement of the drinking age next year despite the planned increase in the Massachusetts' legal drinking age. The new law, which goes into effect June 1, will raise the legal drinking age to 21, making most college students underage.

Some students who can now legally drink will lose this privilege as the new law has no provision for a grandfather clause that would allow people already 20 years old to continue drinking. However, people 18 or over will be allowed to sell beer and alcohol as a retailer or bartender.

The Vermont legislature has yet to increase that state's drinking age. A bill raising the Vermont drinking age to 21, also without a grandfather clause, passed the Vermont House of Representatives in March but failed in the Senate last week.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks does not plan to add any extra security when school resumes in the fall. "I don't view anything changing, except if brought about by an outside source," Jenks said. "If there are big stories about it in the Record which get the local media to raise a cry, then there will be tougher enforcement," Jenks told the Committee on Undergraduate Life at its April 15 meeting.



He also said, "There may be a lot of pressure on the law enforcement to go out there and do the job."

Williams the same

Jenks was a member of the Williamstown Police when the drinking age was 21 and says that things are no different now. "People at Williams College drink from the time they're freshmen until they graduate. They did before the age went down," Jenks said at CUL.

Chief Joseph Zoito, of the Williamstown Police, says he will enforce the law just as he does now. "The College must take

The First Congregational Church, where members voted not to support immigrations violations.

Congregation turns down offering sanctuary to aliens

by James F. Spallone

After a year of debate, the First Congregational Church of Williamstown voted at a special meeting following the Sunday service not to offer sanctuary to undocumented aliens fleeing war-torn Central America.

By a vote of 85-78, on a motion requiring a two-thirds majority for passage, members of the congregation rejected a proposal which would commit the church to active participation in a nation-wide sanctuary movement. Harboring undocumented aliens is against federal law.

Following the vote, the Sanctuary/Refugee Study Committee distributed contingency proposals which included a plan to, "offer a home in our community to one or more refugees who are considered 'documented aliens' either from Central America or Southeast Asia."

The movement has sprung from opposition to the Reagan administration's interpretation of the Refugee Act of 1980 as it pertains to the immigration of Central American refugees. The administration considers most illegal immigrants from Nicaragua and El Salvador to be economic rather than political refugees and thus will not exempt them from immigration quotas.

A motion to hold a secret ballot on the issue was defeated by a vote of 90-70. "We are a community of faith that need not fear. We can vote for or against sanctuary and still be a church, but we cannot vote against trust and love and still be a church," said the Rev. Robert Buckwalter, the Church's pastor who, along with the Conference of Ministers of the United Church of Christ, had endorsed the sanctuary proposal.

Amendments

Two amendments were presented to the congregation before it voted on the sanctuary proposal. One, which passed, was designed to allay the fears of the congregation by ensuring that their church would not become a permanent residence for refugees. The amendment said that refugees would be "housed in the First Congregational Church for as short a period as possible to protect their safety and also to address members' concerns that the church become a permanent housing facility."

An amendment that would ensure that the Congregation "secure living quarters for the undocumented aliens outside the church property" was defeated. Members of the Sanctuary/Refugee Study Committee pointed out that the federal government has yet to enter a church harboring refugees in order to make an arrest of its inhabitants.

Close Scrutiny

Responding to widespread student suspicions about the computer program used to place freshmen in upperclass housing, the Record this week gained access to the program. The method of assigning student numbers was shown to be completely random.

Names and locations generated by the program are legitimate, and if those lists match the ones posted in Baxter Hall, then the housing assignments are not socially engineered. With the exception of a few final manual placements, the Deans' only official involvement in the process is to collect and pass on information on student housing choices.

This does not mean that the issue of freshman inclusion is wholly resolved. After discovering that the program is random, students should focus their attention onto other aspects of the process. Whatever the difficulties within the system—the method of assignment, the first choice maximization, or the pervasive student attitudes—the elimination of one questionable element means only that the others now merit even closer scrutiny.

Murphy responds to "gross distortion" in Record

To The Editor:

Last week, I submitted to the Record the complete text of my letter on the housing system. It was my hope--and my expectation, given the fact that the letter seems to have become the focal point of the debate on the housing system--that the Record would print that letter in full. What I found in last Tuesday's Record, instead, was an entirely one-sided treatment of the issue. Rather than printing even a significant portion of the letter, the Record chose to take but a handful of its lines out of context, and publish an op-ed, an editorial, and three letters of response--all in opposition to the Record's gross distortion of my position. That the Record was willing to abandon the most minimal standards of journalistic fairness in order to sensationalize a complex and sensitive issue is perhaps not surprising. Misrepresentations of the kind evident throughout the Record's coverage, moreover, had by that time become a common occurance across campus; the administration and various special interest organizations discovered that it served their interests equally to cloud the real issue by hoisting the banners of "diversity" and "tolerance" over a cause to which such concepts were, in fact, completely unrelated. The Record, without explanantion, flatly declares, "The debate over the inclusion process, however, is now secondary to the reaction to some of Murphy's statements." Perhaps so, but if so only because the Record has decided, for thoroughly unethical reasons, that the latter makes a more exciting story. Some of the Record's falsehoods are so egregious that they should be noted specifically.

I was completely unaware, until the BSU and others brought it to my attention, that anyone thought the word "misfit" automatically connoted "black." Had I known that when I wrote the letter, I would never have used the word. And I continue to be unable to see how the question of race is in any way implicated in this controversy. Antje Lewis asserts that I mentioned "not just misfits but minorities in general," which is an outright lie. Although they decided not to print it, I told the Record, just as I was quoted as saying in the Advocate on April 24, "I challenge anyone to search any statement of mine, public or private, for attitudes against racial minorities." The differences I noted between myself and the upperclassmen who inhabit the Berkshire Quad are differences not of race but of lifestyle. Despite that fact, the Record interjected the issue of race no less than six times in its discussion of my letter. I demand both a retraction and an apology.

Moreover, I still have difficulty believing that anyone who read the letter in its entirety and correctly apprehended what it was saying could have taken offense. If anyone did, I apologize; it was not my intention to hurt anyone. The basis for anyone feeling insulted, I continue to believe, however, was not the letter itself, but rumour and second-hand information about it, and certain of its phrases taken out of context and twisted around until their original meaning was lost. The administration saw a convenient way to both deflect the negative attention to which it was being subjected and avoid dealing with a difficult but urgent problem (the inclusion process). And the leaders of certain highly defensive special interst goups on campus were delighted to have a whipping boy (me), the public denouncement of whom would provide a suitable means for generating support among the members of these groups. Although these groups allege that they want to eliminate prejudice, they in fact created prejudice where there wasn't any. But if they had not, in an enviroment which is as tolerant as Williams is, on the whole, they would perhaps have little excuse for holding rallies, forming ad hoc committees, etc. What happened, in short, was a calculated attempt to misdirect the community's attention through a ruthless campaign of lies and distortions. As the Record correctly points out, I revised my statement before reading it to the College Council. I explained this revision by saying, "...just as it is a mistake to talk before you think, so, too, it is wrong to stop thinking as soon as you start talking. The only way to approach an issue as serious and as complex as this one is with an open mind, with flexibility, with willingness to listen--and reflect carefully on what we hear. Now that I hope I've made it plain that I have, I hope my opponents will be encouraged to, as well." Apparently, they were not.

According to John Schafer's article, "Murphy and others have accused the administration of tampering with the inclusion process." To make any accusations based upon the scant information so far made available on exactly how that process was conducted would be utterly irresponsible. For Schafer to allege that I in fact have not is even more so. To quote directly from the letter which Schafer received: "...to let me state in the strongest possible terms that all we know at this point is that these results look non-random. They are not, in themselves, incriminating. I believe in the presumption of innocence. In addition, I am convinced that Dean Kenyatta, Professor Darrow, and all other persons involved in the operation of the inclusion process carried out their duties conscientiously, honestly, and without deliberate bias or malicious tampering of any kind." I did and do feel, however, that the computer program which is apparently responsible for the severely disproportional results of this year's inclusion process should be released for public scrutiny. I trust that Dean Kenyatta intends to comply with the resolution to that effect which we passed unanimously by the College Council last Thursday.

> ...the leaders of certain highly defensive special interest groups on campus were delighted to have a whipping boy...

But making the program public is only a first step. Freshman inclusion, the reform of which has all along been by sole objective, is clearly a shambles. I suggest four partial remedies, two short-term, two long-term. First of all, freshmen living in the Berkshire Quad should, upon request, be given transfer points for their sophomore year equal to those which sophomores living in their fifth choice housing group receive for their junior year. The status of such freshmen as the the only ones who already live

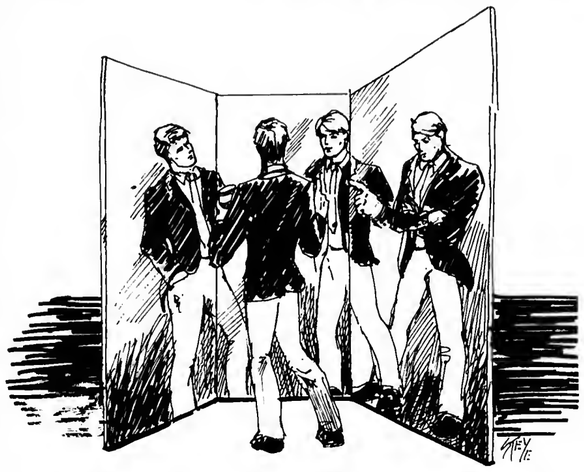
Examining our fears and relationship with the BQ

by Vernon Squires

Maybe you're tired of hearing about the Berkshire Quad. Maybe you think the issue is stale and stretched beyond interest. Maybe you'd rather read about a shiny new problem, and prefer to shelve the diversity issue alongside stress and divestment. But maybe you agree that there's still something a little funny about this latest controversy, something that flickers dimly and asks attention.



The Berkshire Quad has taken much heat--both flagrant and disguised--during the past several weeks. A now-famous letter shared feelings of contempt and hatred toward the alleged "misfits" who live in Fitch-Currier and Prospect houses, and freshmen overwhelmingly rejected the Quad in the inclusion process. Indeed, Williams now seems to have its very own "wrong side of the tracks."

Why the uproar? What is it that targets the Berkshire Quad for overt censure, for implicit prejudice, and for dinner-table ridicule and cut-down? Why are Berkshire residents labeled "Driscoll whack-outs" and "60's relics?"

The chief problem is the attitude of the non-Quad students, who do not feel themselves to be affiliated in any way with the "subculture." But what makes them so incompatible with Quad members that they--the majority--feel they must grant special license for the others to be different? Is it the snow-white virtues of the "non-deviants"--their superiority of values and posture? This justification is a scary one, because historically it has known such patrons as Hitler, Stalin, and McCarthy. Perhaps the analogy is extreme, but the attitude is frighteningly similar.

However, such an analysis rings slightly hollow, since it avoids the deeper problem: fear. Why is it, after all, that persons with "mainstream" values and traits feel so comfortable with each other and so uncomfortable with deviants? The answers lies in the question--because Jack is like John is like Jim is like Joe. It's as if they're opposing wall mirrors, reflecting the same scene and giving visions of eternally handsome virtues which ultimately lead nowhere. Is this righteousness?

Some people claim that the solution to the Berkshire Quad's problems is to attract those students who reject it, perhaps by opening the "subculture" to all, by throwing a "normal party" and inviting the blue-blazer WASPs and future NYC bankers. But this answer overlooks a crucial question: maybe they find them yawningly homogenous and shallow. As Robert Lee, a spokesman for the BSU, said at the diversity rally, the minorities want "the freedom to be who they are, and not what society at large, or someone in particular, wants them to be."

Being a deviant has never earned many high-fives or backslaps in the Western world. Jesus Christ learned this. So did Mahatma Ghandi and Martin Luther King. But standing up for one's values and daring to resist the socialization that proves so comfortable is a strength that commands respect.

Maybe there is a problem in college housing at Williams. Maybe there is a population that inspires uneasiness and provocation. But maybe it isn't in the Berkshire Quad.

with upperclassmen must be recongized. Kenyatta and Darrow's explanation that such a change would require that "not living in the Freshman Quad" be considered "a punishment" would be laughable if it were not so disturbing to hear such fallacious reasoning from two of the college's titular leaders. All that would be required, rather, is that we acknowledge that simply because incoming freshmen are unable to express specific housing preferences does not mean that such preferences do not exist or develop. As I have asked repeatedly, why should anyone who has already had to live for one year in what he considers the most undesirable housing group on campus be forced to spend a second one there (for a total of one-half his college career)? And, as I put it in the letter, "Most of those who have chosen to live in the Berkshire Quad have done so because they reject the lifestle found throughout the rest of the college. Those of us who have never had a chance to live anywhere else simply ask for an opportunity to sample that lifestyle before we are asked to join those who have rejected it." And if it is considered undesirable to have the Berkshire Quad in any way singled out, a similar arrangement could be worked out for the residents of Lehman with regard to Dodd.

Second, the priority of the computer program's goals should be changed. It should be designed to minimize fifth choices rather than maximize first choices. Approval of this proposal seems imminent. As I stated in my letter, "If the intent of the inclusion process is to accomodate preferences, and if there are preferences this intense which have not been accomodated, then the process has failed."

Both of the long-term proposals which I endorse involve changes which are far more radical. First, I see considerable merit in the proposal presented to the College Council by Rob Chase and Tobey Wheelock which would turn Mission Park into freshman housing and move upperclassmen into Fayerweather, East, Lehman, Morgan, and Thompson Infirmary.

Finally, I believe that a completely random process is the only satisfactory means of disolving the undesirable social stratifications which have developed around campus. Although freshmen should be allowed to apply in groups, the college should eliminate ranking of choice, as well as prohibit trading and transfers. Once such a system is in place, the first of my short-term proposals would obviously have to be abandoned.

Contrary to the mischaracterizations of my position expressed in some quarters, not only do I not wish to isolate myself from anyone; I also consider it unfortunant when anyone feels that he can live comfortably only in isolation with those with whom he shares some insignificant arbitrary characteristic (e.g. sexual preference). Sadly, most of the residents of the Berkshire Quad live there in order to achieve just such isolation. I find it quite telling, for example, that several of the seven Freshmen who signed a letter to the Editor attacking me in last week's Record (7 of the 8 freshmen who put Berkshire as their first choice) are openly homosexual.

Nowhere have I recommended the segregation of any segment of the Williams population. Not once have I even implied that groups which have made the questionable decision to segregate themselves, to establish a ghetto for their group willfully and freely, are therefore any less human, any less entitled to be a part of Williams College. I have nothing per se against living with any member(s) of any group, even in a situation which would place me in a minority. The differences which motivate my refusal to live in the Berkshire Quad are much more a difference of values than anything else. The residents of the Berkshire Quad and I subscribe to radically different visions of what "the Williams experience" can and should be. While it is acceptable , even laudable, that the college contain a plurality of such visions, ours are completely incompatible. And I fail to see how "tolerance of diversity" enters into it. Every individual is unique: absolutely diverse. Hence, it is ridiculous to call any house "more diverse" than any other. What the residents of the Berkshire Quad seek is not tolerance and diversity but intolerance and conformity. They have not established what Anza Mammen called a "haven" in order to enjoy the company of people different from themselves, but to be with people who are, in some superficial way, similar to them. They apparently feel comfortable only among individuals with whom they share some minor characteristic which becomes the basis for group solidarity. This represents a failure of courage, an insecurity, more than anything else. It is my hope that Williams can be a community of individuals, not an aggregate of groups, a place where each person can express his own lifestyle irrespective of his proximity to an enclave of people whose lifestyles resemble his own. There is no room for such a hope in the Berkshire Quad.

The Gaudino Forum: a better education

The following article was written collectively by the members of the Gaudino Committee. The actual proposals of the Committee are covered in a separate article (see page 4).

Do we talk, contend, and disagree out in public with our peers and our professors? Are we equipped for a dialogue in which the participants push their insights a little farther in answer to each other's questions and criticisms? Are we able to bring our observations together to arrive at a greater understanding? Has our education even addressed these questions? In short, are the sensibilities and passions of our mind being adequately nourished at Williams?

These are the questions posed twelve years ago by the late Professor Robert Gaudino. Last September, President Chandler charged the newly formed Gaudino Committee with addressing these issues and designing proposals aimed at enlarging and enriching the intellectual life at Williams College. Recently, we issued our first report, a document stressing the desirability of viewing education as an integrated experience, a process in which new ideas and challenges are taken on by students both inside and outside the classroom.

The Committee's proposals reflect our conviction that such a process emphatically does not mean simply an increased emphasis on academic coursework. The businesss of "getting the work done" can often block the free play of the mind, discourage critical inquiry, and hamper intellectual and personal growth. If the educational process is seen merely as a mad race to read "x" many pages in order to write "y" many pages in order to get "z" grade, then much of the value of education is lost.

Instead, the Gaudino Committee seeks to put forth a complete vision of a Liberal education, a vision that transcends the artificial barriers between the "academic", the "social", the "artistic", and the "intellectual." Such an education would engage all aspects of personality and would assert the importance of integrating ideas from the classroom with other elements of life. Students would be encouraged to examine continually their fundamental ideas and values, to re-evaluate them in light of experiences from all facets of their lives, and to act on them. Intellectual growth would be seen as personal growth, a process of self-realization. The aim of our proposals is to set the stage for students to become the motivating force in their own education.

The recent Berkshire Quad controversy reveals how far away we are from this wide vision of a Liberal education. The stereotypes and cliches that emerged tell us that, too often, we do not listen to each other or engage ourselves with the worlds which others inhabit. To a disturbing extent, our social life has become merely an escape from academic pressures, rather than a central part of our education.

An integrated view of a Liberal education presupposes that we seek the excitement of serious discourse based on a mutual respect and appreciation for the ideas and feelings of others. Rather than seeing each other as co-conspirators in a flight from intellectual and emotional commitment, or as competitors, or as strangers to be ignored, achieving a full education entails seeing each other as precious resources in a joint educational venture.

The proposals of the Gaudino Committee are aimed at counteracting the tendency of Williams students to compartmentalize their lives into various spheres which are walled off from each other. These proposals are the beginning of an effort to make education a continous process that takes place on the sports field, in our Houses, in our grappling with career choices, and in our partying, as well as in the classroom. By enhancing the opportunities for meaningful discoursc, the proposals stress student-student interaction as the core of the educational journey of self-realization and self-discovery.

The Gaudino Committee will hold an open meeting on Wednesday, May 1, at 7:30 pm in Greylock D to discuss the Gaudino Report and related matters. Everyone is invited to attend. The Report is available in the Sawyer reserve room. In addition, these proposals will be discussed in open forums in the fall, and the Gaudino Committee will continue to consider new ones.

Gaudino Comm. releases report on integration of intellectual life

by Steven Theodore

The year-old Gaudino Committee released its report on "Intellectual Life at Williams" this week. President John Chandler formed the committee last September to formulate ideas "designed to enlarge and enrich the intellectual life on the Williams campus."

Chaired by Gaudino Scholar Kurt Tauber and consisting of four professors and nine students, the committee consulted with faculty, students and administrators from Williams and other schools.

The committee's report emphasizes dedication to the liberal arts and "a vision of a Liberal education as an active process." Students, the report continues, should be encouraged "to examine continually their fundamental ideas and values," and "to act on their ideals."

The greatest obstacle to intellectual life at Williams is the way in which students compartmentalize their lives, according to the report. Additionally, the report states that by isolating academics, social life, cultural pursuits and extracurricular activities from one another, students fail to appreciate the full potential of their education.

Frosh housing

The report addresses four groups of proposals, one dealing with freshman year, one with upperclass housing, one with the creation of a new student activity coordinating post, and one concerning student work study groups.

"Freshman year," states the report, "serves as a cruclally important introduction to Williams life." The present housing system provides a close knit and supportive group for freshmen. It does not, however, capitalize on the opportunities for encouraging discussion which freshman year provides, according to the report.

The report notes three proposals designed to integrate intellectual and social life into freshmen housing. The first would establish a system of freshman "colleges" similar to that in use at other schools. The "colleges" would be physical, social, and intellectual units, with freshman in a given college taking an interdisciplinary seminar together. Faculty members teaching the seminars would act as advisors to the colleges.

Two other proposals one by Professor Steve Fix and another based on a study done by Professor George Marcus in the early 1970's are discussed.

The Fix plan assigns students to course sections on the basis of their entry, while the Marcus plan suggests coordinating freshmen housing assignments with course registration.

J.A. selection

The report asserts that the J.A. system is a vital part of freshman life. However, it criticizes the present J.A. system for failing toencourage J.A.'s to respond to the diverse interests of their entries. "A J.A. who is excited by particular interests is somehow not open-minded enough to be a J.A.," says the report.

In conjunction with this, the committee urges that the ability and willingness to foster intellectual inquiry be a factor in the J.A. selection process.

Regarding upperclass housing, the committee suggests the college create "interest houses". These houses would be organized around a particular topic, and residents would engage in activities centered on that topic which would involve the whole campus.

The report also recommends the creation of a "Student Activites Intern," a student volunteer who would coordinate the activities of the various extracurricular groups on campus. Part of the SAI's duties would be to publicize activities through J.A.'s and house snacks.

The committee's final proposal encourages the use of student work groups. Some professors already assign students to groups to study together and discuss their work outside of the classroom. The report claims that these groups stimulate intellectual discussion on many topies.

Copies of the report are on reserve in Sawyer Library.

Carol Cable workers walk

About 75 union employees of Carol Cable Co. walked out last week in protest of what they call company violations of the language of their contracts.

Officials of the International Union of Electrical Radio and Machine Workers, Local 299, refused to cite specific complaints in The Transcript last week, but union members said that preferential treatment of a non-union employee had been "the straw that broke the camel's back."

The dispute arose, The Transcript reported Tuesday, when John Wright, a non-union employee in a management position, wanted to return to a union-represented position on the shop floor. The union leadership protested because it says the company wants to move a union employee to the night shift so that Wright can work a day shift, according to The Transcript.

Union Vice President Robert Sweet told The Transcript that workers are also upset about the terms of the contract signed last summer just before Carol Cable Co.'s purchase of the Water Street plant. "We took a (lousy) contract because of the situation around here, and we wanted to work...but the company has been treating people badly and going against the contract," Sweet said in The Transcript.

Although union officials had planned a meeting with management to discuss worker complaints, when they arrived they were told the meeting would not take place. According to The Transcript, plant manager James Reilly told union members that the company would not meet with the union until everyone had returned to work.

The Transcript reported that the union had not taken a vote to strike but would continue the walkout until the company agrees to address the workers' concerns.

The cable company is Willlamstown's second largest employer.

This Saturday REM will be performing at the Lansing Chapman Rink. The performance marks the opening of its 1985 summer tour and promotion of its new LP, Fables of the Reconstruction, set for release in the early summer.

REM (Rapid Eye Movement) initiall, released the EP Chronic Town in 1981, just after its independent first release, "Radio Free Europe," was voted single-of-the-year by the Village Voice critics poll. The well-recieved Chronic Town was followed up by its stunning first LP, Murmur, which won the Rolling Stone critic's poll and in the process sold about 200,000 copies, a respectable showing for a debut record. Fables of the Reconstruction follows the highly successful Reckoning, REM's best-selling album to date.

The Athens, Georgia, group has a rich, melodic sound, with instrumentals—Peter Buck on guitar, Mike Mills on bass, and Bill Berry on drums—intermixed with lead singer Michael Stipe's vocals. This interplay between the band members gives the group its trademark sound, a sound that prompted one reviewer in Britain's New Musical Express to write, "(This is) one of the most beautifully exciting groups on the planet."

Earlier this month, Record op-ed editor Joe Ehlers and WCFM disc jockey John Booth interviewed group members Berry and Mills by phone.

The Record: How did REM begin?

Berry: Actually, we met at a party in 1979, just decided to get together, and play parties—just what everyone else was doing at the time. We had no aspirations at all, it just kept going, like a snowball. Here we are.

The Record: Your first LP was very well received. The only criticism from some listeners was that the words were rather indecipherable and distant. Your last LP was praised by some as being much more open and direct. With those two albums in perspective, what can we expect from Fables of the Reconstruction?

Berry: it's probably step three in a progression. It's very sensible, very outfront lyrically. The songs are all brand new—we wrote them literally days before we went in to do the record. We were also working with a new producer and a new studio. It's good—the songs have a kind of immediacy to them.

It's also quite different, though. The stuff is so new to me, that I have a hard time objectively saying, "Does this sound like REM a whole lot?" or are people going to say, "Wow, they really went over the deep end on this one."

The Record: I saw you in concert in Minneapolis last year. You brought Paul Westenburg of the Replacements up on stage with you. You have a reputation for supporting local bands—is this where you see the major push and changes in rock today in America?

Berry: I think it's finally starting to happen, although I wish the Replacements were ten times more popular than they are. You know, it's kind of frustrating, because you see this surge in the media and in public awareness towards these American bands, and while that's a good sign, there are still so many great bands out there that don't get the recognition they should—The Neats, The Replacements, Husker Du—the list goes on and on.

Business is a lot to blame. They sink so much money into the huge acts. You know, record companies want to sign bands to sell records. The mentality of the record company executives, is, well—I just don't think they have the capacity to appreciate as much as they should what's going on right here in America, even in a business sense.

The Record: How do you feel about Top 40 music today?

Mills: The trouble with listening to the radio these days is that so much of it is bad, it's hard to wait for the good stuff. Top 40 is doing all right, though. I think "Night Shift" by the Commodores is a great song. Contrary to popular culture, I like Cyndy Lauper. I think her stuff on the radio is real good.

The Record: What do you hate?

Mills: It's mostly this trademark, churned-out, semi-disco, or the love ballads that are just all over the place. They're sappy and they all sound the same.

The Record: Speaking of commercial success, a lot of people are looking at this new album as being the make or break album for REM. What does commercial success mean to you, and are you expecting that, or do you even want that?

Berry: Commercial success is not going to happen until we have a hit single. This new record is not unlike the other two in that there's no real obvious hit singles. There is one chosen now that's probably the most commercially sensible one to push as a single, but it's not going to be in the Top 10, it's not going to be in the Top 20, because it's not going to be a big hit.

We don't set out to do that in the first place. Our record is strong enough. We put more pride into the making of an entire record rather than a song, and it's paid off for us. Our success has been slow, but it actually has the impetus now where if we would put out a bad record, our careers are going to end. This record isn't bad—I think it's very good.

People perceive us as a live band that puts out records, rather than a hit band that they go out to see live. I think the fans are going to determine what happens to us, and that's why I feel so good right now, because I feel a lot of support from the fans.

Mills: There's no way to (predict success). I don't really care. As far as I'm, concerned, having a hit is irrelevant to anything else.

The Record: You obviously commit a tremendous amount of time to touring—you toured in Japan recently, you even once showed up to play at a fried chicken restaurant in Nebraska. hy all the trouble with touring? Is that what you want to be, a live band?

Berry: That's pretty much what we are. It's fun to go in and do records, and that's part of the game, but we've always been a live band, and that's what we enjoy. It gets a little hectic when you travel around like we do, and that's been a little taxing, but it's been for the better.

Touring is something we look forward to—hell, I'm ready to go right now.

The Record: Is there any chance of REM doing a live album, and releasing it in the United States?

Mills: I can see us putting a live album out sometime down the road—it sounds kind of funny, but I can see it happening. It wouldn't be for a while.

The Record: A lot of people complain about Michael Stipe's voice and the difficulty in understanding some of the lyrics from REM songs. Are you planning to enclose any lyric sheets in albums in the future?

Mills: I don't think so—they're pretty understandable. I think everyone will be surprised when they hear this record. When you take the lyrics out of context, you know, they sound funny. They're not meant to be taken as poetry. There's just no point in a lyric sheet—I think it kind of trivializes the words.

The Record: It seems to me and to a lot of other people that you've started a whole new type of music, an American rock-and-roll. Do you feel any pressure in being almost the leader in your type of music?

Mills: That's interesting. We don't feel that way, but then again, when you're on the inside, you can't really see out.

Had we not come along, this same thing pretty much still would have happened. If anything, the only thing we've proved is that you can go ahead and be successful and do it on your own terms. You don't have to do everything the show business-types tell you.

responslbility," Zoito said. "They know it. Bartenders know it. They better cheek I.D.'s."

Zoito said that he wants to be helpful but he commented, "You're going to have to put some responsibility on the people who supply it. The guy who goes to the package store for the house had better watch himself. He's liable."

Committee on Undergraduate Life chairman, Professor William Darrow said that he also sees liability as the main issue. He recognizes that the College is liable for the Log and feels the liability will increase when fewer students are legally allowed to drink.

Darrow, who was once in favor of keeping beer and wine at the Log, said that he finds it hard to justify continuing beer sales if only one-quarter of the students can legally drink. He predicts problems in trying to justify maintaining a liquor license and does not agree that traffic to Vermont will decrease if the Log still serves beer.

Darrow said that he sees the need for a full-time Log manager, hired by Food Service. This person would oversees the daily activities of the Log and enforce the drinking laws. He added that he also sees a place for a student manager who would book acts and assist the manager.

Zoito would like the College to move the Log on to the campus. "I am greatly in favor of moving it and putting students back on campus," he said. He said that he worries about students making noise on Spring Street and crossing Route 2 at night.

A campus committee headed by Shannon McKeen '85 investigated the possibility of moving the Log. Although McKeen says now that moving the Log does not seem feasible, he felt moving the Log on campus would make it more accessible to students, and make other ideas for improving it easier to implement.

Last November, McKeen received what he called a "rough, rough estimate" of $50,000 for moving the Log from Spring Street to the empty lawn between Lehman and Park Road.

However, when Larmen House Movers of Schylerville, New York, made an official estimate, the cost was $250,000. The Log could be moved to the Lehman lawn only by dividing it into three pieces and destroying and rebuilding the chimneys.

In addition, McKeen learned from Building and Grounds that the proposed new location was part of Mission Park (the state park containing the Haystack Monument), and therefore can not be used as a building site.

Moving the Log is still not totally out of the question, according to McKeen. He thinks, as in the case of the Mission Park dormitories, that it must be possible to build on a state park by securing the proper permits.

Darrow has also not ruled out moving the Log. He feels the building is too important to leave alone and sees moving the Log as a way to increase activities there.

However Darrow doesn't see the Lehman lawn as a viable place anymore. "I am not convinced that the location behind Chapin is a suitable location as I used to think," Darrow said. He added, "It may be difficult to justify to the state opening a tavern as a suitable memorial to the Haystack Movement."

The committee also discussed how to keep the Log functioning as a social center in spite of the higher drinking age. Among the ideas discussed were stepping up the hand stamping policy, and enlarging the Log by knocking down the south wall and enclosing the porch on that side, making it more attractive to bands and comedians.

The possibility of eliminating beer entirely was rejected by the committee. "A Log with no beer wouldn't last a semester," McKeen said in his report on the Log. Two previous attempts to step up the hand stamping or eliminate pitchers caused attendance to drop almost 50 percent, according to McKeen.

At the College Council meeting last Thursday other options such as a seniors' only room and a two drink limit were discussed. The possibility of a full-time Log manager, already addressed by McKeen in his report, was also suggested.

There will be an all campus meeting at the Log, this Friday, at 7 p.m., to discuss possible future options for the Log.

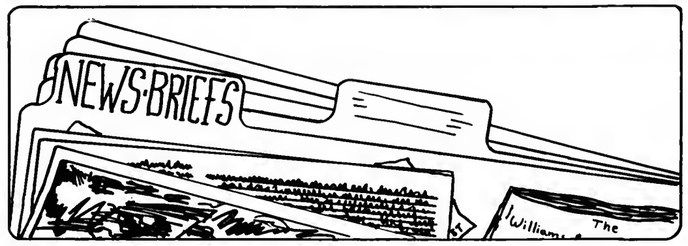
bottom of the sixth in their most productive inning. Freshmen Mo Brand had the biggest hit of the inning, a shot into center field that was misplayed by the outfielder. Brand was waved home by coach Harry Sheehy, but she was tagged out on after a lightning fast relay by the shortstop.

Sheehy expressed satisfaction with the play of his team, although he conceded that Williams was slow in starting to play their game.



Shutout by Holyoke

Against St. Rose on Tuesday, Williams could only muster six hits. St. Rose took an 8-3 lead by the third inning, and held on for the victory. Sheehy said that the team had not played up to their potential. On Saturday, Williams played a superior team from Mt. Holyoke and was thoroughly outclassed. Mt. Holyoke's pitcher, Laurie McClain, gave up only three hits to Williams hitters and no runs. She also provided offensive punch to back up her pitching, recording one triple and two doubles.

"Mount Holyoke was just a very good team," commented Coach Sheehy. "We were out of it from the beginning, although we hit pretty well. We made a few errors and they played pretty well."

Williams plays four games in the coming week: R.P.I., Trinity and a doubleheader on Saturday against Wesleyan.

College Council...Econ. lecture...SDC...Tutorials ...Student honors...Peters' lecture

College Council

The College Council has endorsed a letter drafted by the ad-hoc Student Diversity Committee, asked that the College include a clause about sexual preference in its official statement of non-discrimination, and given its backing to a proposal by Christopher McGuire '86 to encourage other colleges to join Williams in protesting the proposed cuts in federal financial aid in its first meetings under the new administration of Anza Mammen '86 and Amy Jeffress '87.

In a close vote, the addition of the sexual preference clause was recommended after lengthy discussion at the last meeting. The ad-hoc committee letter was endorsed at the same meeting and the committee appointed by Mammen to look into the freshmen inclusion process distributed proposals to be discussed this week.

Two weeks ago, the Finance Committee presented three requests for funding to the council. After Council Treasurer David Applebaum '86 explained that the council has only $3,000 to get through the year, the council voted $556 to the Outing Club to pay a debt inеurred by a party, and $200 to Adam Ruderman '87 in order to bring the band Mondo Boffo to campus.

The request to fund a recital by flautist Akel Dev Khalsa was rejected, by a vote of 14 in favor and 5 against with 10 abstentions, when a majority did not approve the expenditure.

The council also decided to change the selection criteria for the Grosvenor's Cup award. In the future, the cup will be awarded by only the senior members of the council.

Ad-hoc Meeting

The ad hoc Student Diversity Committee, formed in the center of the controversy surrounding attitudes toward the Berkshire Quad, met last week in the Makepeace Room to discuss further plans to generate acceptance of diversity at Williams.

The committee, which organized a rally held two weeks ago to protest the attitudes expressed in the letter which Hart Murphy '88 wrote in response to his placement in the Berkshire Quad, had a turnout of thirteen for its meeting last Monday.

Committee members decided to commit their resources to educational progams designed to promote diversity and acceptance of diversity on campus. They will look into Junior Advisor training and selection, and plan freshman workshops on issues such as homosexuality and racism.

The Committee also discussed plans for a Progressive Alliance information board in Baxter Hall to notify students about activities being sponsored by the GLU, the BSU and other groups.

"I think the committee as it is will probably dissolve by the end of this year," said committee member Antje Lewis '86, "but it's important to get people involved for next year."

Lewis also said the committee has the support of the Deans' office. "Dean O'Connor supports what we're doing. The deans are concerned with the same things we are," she said.

The SDC planned to run workshops on No Business As Usual Day yesterday.

Economics Lecture

Amartya Sen, Drummond at Oxford University, will present a lecture on China and India tonight at 8 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers.

This is the second of two lectures Sen is giving as this year's Henry George Lecturer. Sen has written about economic development, poverty and income distribution, social choice and welfare economics, utilitarianism, and capital accumulation.

Sen's lecture tonight will compare the economic achievements of India and China. Sen is a native of India.

The Williams Henry George Lectures are funded by a gift from the Schalkenbach Foundation, an organization which finances research on the ideas of Henry George, the 19th century economist and political reformer.

Oxford Tutorials

Some of the students who wished to have science tutorials in the Williams-in-Oxford program next year will not be able to do so, according to President-designate Francis Oakley. "We couldn't get the organic chemistry or physics tutorials, so they're out," he said.

Oakley said, however, that he has arranged lectures and laboratory sessions for the two students who want to take physical chemistry next year. He has also found one tutor to teach physical chemistry and is hopeful that he will find one more.

"I'm encouraged about the results," Oakley said. "It should be much easier in the future for science students (to go to Oxford)."

Student Honors

Three Williams students have recently received national recognition. Two juniors and a sophomore were recognized for independent accomplishments not directly related to their Williams coursework.

Martin Hildebrand '86 recently placed among the top 100 finishers in the 45th annual William Lowell Putnam Mathematical Competition.

Hildebrand, who was taking the test for the second time, received a rating of 93.5. More than 2000 students took the six-hour test which is sponsored by the Mathematical Association of America.

"You have to be clever to work the problems," Hildebrand said. "They're based on calculus, matrices and other things."

Monica Fennell '87 was awarded a National Endowment for the Humanities grant to study "Oriental Influence in the Transition Period: Links between Van Gogh and Pound."

Fennell's project is designed to connect Eastern influences with the art and poetry of the Transition Period. "I was interested in poetry and painting, so I picked a period I was interested in," Fennell said.

Williams was one of only a few colleges from which more than one student received an NEH grant. The grants are worth $2200, $400 of which goes to a project advisor. Timothy Walsh '86 was the second Williams recipient.

NEH only gives about 40 of the grants, which are for summer studies, each year.

Peters-Israel

Arab claims that Jews displaced an ancient Palestinian community when Israel was founded in 1948 are inaccurate according to Joan Peters, author of From Time Immemorial.

Peters delivered a lecture last Tuesday in Brooks-Rogers describing the research that led her to the arguments she made in her book about the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the Middle East.

Peters cited historical evidence which she says proves that Palestinian claims to Israeli territory are unfounded formulations made by Arab leaders. These ideas are designed to lead to the eventual destruction of the state of Israel, she explained.

"The evidence I used had always been around," said Peters, who studied British immigration records filed during the British mandate in the area, as well as records in Beirut and at the U.N. "The Arab claims are an example of buried and muted history," Peters told the audience. "The truth is painfully logical."

with Wright last week to anaylze the program after hearing charges of conspiracy against certain individuals or groups. "All the questions we had were satisfactorily answered," Darrow said, adding that he did not believe there had been any secret manipulations.

One proposal currently before the College Council asks the Deans' Office to change the computer program so that it minimizes last choices instead of maximizing first choices. That, according to Wright, would not make a big difference in the number of people who receive houses low on their list.

"We would have to find anybody who wanted Berkshire or whatever the last choice is anything but last and put them there," Wright said. "It wouldn't take into account whether they had ranked it first, second, third or fourth.

"If everyone puts the same ranking, there's nothing wrong with the computer program," Wright said. "Nothing makes much of a difference except the way people select things."

Scoville lectures on nuclear freeze

by Tom Ewing

The United States must seriously address the issue of nuclear disarmament according to Herbert Scoville, the president of the Arms Control Association.

Scoville told a crowd of about 50 students, faculty and townspeople last week that he is pleased that the U.S. is now talking with the Soviets about delivery vehicles and space weapons, but he said, "Arms control has been essentially prostituted as an excuse for buying new weapons...this is a sorry state of affairs."

Scoville told the audience that the most important element of the arms control issue is the Strategic Defense Initiative, the Star Wars program. President Reagan's goal in proposing this system, said Scoville, was to make nuclear weapons obsolete and therefore eliminate mutual destruction as the only deterrent to nuclear war.

Scoville believes such a defense system is completely impractical because for a defensive system to work effectively against a nuclear attack it must be 100 percent effective the first time it is needed. The small number of warheads that would get through if the defense system did not work perfectly would cause substantial and unacceptable amounts of death and destruction, according to Scoville.

The recent developments in the U.S. nuclear arsenal, such as the MX missile and the Trident-II submarine, are inherently destabilizing and contribute to the likelihood of a nuclear war, Scoville said. He explained that since these systems are vulnerable to a Soviet first strike there is incentive for the U.S. to launch a pre-emptive attack or to remain on hair-trigger alert.

The strategy of the Reagan administration, according to Scoville, is to put pressure on the USSR. "We want to persuade the Soviet Union that they should give up their offensive weapons...never in this world would they do this....The Reagan administration's wish is a pipe dream," Scoville said.

The reaction of the Soviet Union, explained Scoville, would be to increase their nuclear capability. "As they (the leaders of the USSR) see that system (the Strategic Defense Initiative) coming down the road, they certainly aren't going to stop building offensive systems."

Scoville criticized the Reagan administration for rejecting a recent offer by Mikhail Gorbachev to freeze deployment of missiles in Europe. Scoville conceded that the proposal itself was not a major Soviet concession, but he argued that by turning down the proposal only six hours after it was offered, the U.S. government made it apparent that the proposal never received serious consideration.

"There is a tendency on the part of the United States government," said Scoville, "to turn down Soviet proposals automatically on the premise, if it is a Soviet proposal, it cannot be any good."

Scoville concluded with a strong criticism of the general strategy in arms control pursued by the Reagan administration. "You don't reduce the threat of nuclear war by buying new weapons or through technology. You must reduce the threat of nuclear war through arms control....The situation is totally gloomy."

The only bright spot Scoville sees is the American public opinion. "There is an increasing understanding on the part of the public, and the goal of the public must be to educate leaders and representatives and convince them to stand up and not to give in to the blackmail used in the MX vote," he explained.

The JA experience: entry-level positions considered re-freshing

by Gwen Garcelon

As another spring semester winds to a close, this year's group of Junior Advisors are faced with the end of their nine-month tenure in service. During recent interviews, several JA's reflected on both their individual experiences and the JA system in general.

One of the common sentiments that the JA's expressed was that this year the freshmen had the benefit of an interactive group of JA's. While Becky Haile of Sage C explained that is is normal for JA's to lose touch with their classmates, she also found a new peer group among the JA's.

"You do lose contact with your own friends," said Haile, "but this year there was a good close-knit group of JA's to meet."

Making the grade

A difficulty sometimes linked to being a JA is the problem of maintaining good grades. But Ed Santella and Rob Park of Morgan Midwest found this worry to be hollow, saying their grades stayed pretty much the same as last year.

"It's important to set an example for freshmen that it is possible to be successful academically as a JA," explained Santella and Park.

Santella also got some help from his freshmen. "They helped me find some good guts, and they even helped me with them," he joked.

JA's on the Quad: Junior advisors Ann Regan, Paul Boocock, Rob Park, and Ed Santella demonstrate the technique of "hanging out" to freshmen. (Scheibe)

Paul Boocock of Lehman East stated that his grades have actually improved this year as the result of more efficient study-time. While he recognized that there were inevitable interruptions inherent in "JA'ing," he felt these interruptions forced him to use free time better.

"I wanted to set an example that you can be loose and still get the grades by being more efficient," said Boocock.

Broadening experience

On the subject of whether to be a JA or to go abroad during junior year, most JAs agreed that there was pressure at Williams to do something different. Boocock found that being a JA was a good alternative to studying abroad, although he noted, "If I didn't get accepted as a JA, I probably would have taken off."

Libby Hoffman, JA to the East 3 women, did not really consider studying away, but found that being a JA put Williams in a different light.

"I didn't want to go abroad; now I feel more of an identity with Williams," she said, adding that she found the interaction with the entire entry to be a special part of her junior year.

Parent or pal?

During the course of the year, the JA's learned that a certain amount of give-and-take is necessary. Ann Regan, a JA in Williams B, found that flexibility was crucial so far as establishing good relationships.

Berk. Symphony plays eclectic Bazelon piece

by Christian K. Howlett

True to composer Irwin Bazelon's promise, no one fell asleep Friday night as the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra performed his Symphony Concertante for clarinet, trumpet and marimba. The world premiere performance took place in Chapin Hall before a large Parents' Weekend audience.

Symphony Concertante, written in 1968, fits many people's conceptions of "modern music." Instead of strict form and melody, it employs varying rhythms and sounds seemingly for their own sakes. The overall feeling is disjunct and eclectic.

As Bazelon stated Thursday afternoon in a lecture on composing, his piece also contains certain jazz and twelve-tone elements. The former are most notable in the solo trumpet and clarinet passages.

The clarinet, played by Berkshire Symphony principal Susan Martula, provided the continuity to Symphony Concertante, returning to the same wailing theme after intervals of percussion experimentation. The marimba, played by Richard Albagli, was certainly the most interesting of the solo instruments, particularly in its several virtuoisic passages.

On the whole, the orchestra performed very well in this unusual and demanding work, although the audience's reaction was understandably

Faculty associates do housework

by Joe Thorndike

Williams is a school that prides itself on its faculty. The guidebooks used by prospective students praise the low student/faculty ratio, the quality of instruction, and the interaction between students and their teachers. The last of these three is a topic with which the college itself is quite concerned; for years efforts have been made to increase the contact between students and professors. One such effort—dating back to the establishment of the Residential House System—is embodied in the Senior Associates System.

The Senior Associates Program consists of professors who have agreed to serve as advisors to a student house for each academic year. Some associates stay longer while others opt for a one-year commitment. If their opinions on the program are any indication, the associates are as varied as the houses with which they work.

One associate with an emphatic viewpoint is Professor Lee Alston of the economics department. Having been an associate for three years (two at Dodd and currently at Pratt), Alston feels quite positive about the program. "It's important that students know the faculty care about other aspects of their life than the classroom," he said.

Alston perceives the program as being a "two-way street" in which students and faculty "have to be able to open up a bit." For his part, he has enjoyed being an associate, explaining, "It's fun—I enjoy meeting students in a non-classroom situation."

Although becoming a parent hasn't diminished Alston's enthusiasm for the program, it has changed his role slightly. "Things are a little different now that we have kids. We used to go to parties but you can't really do that with kids," he said.

Noting that the college community's perception of the program has changed in the time since he first became an associate, Alston said he is "very pleased to see renewed interest in the faculty at large in revitalizing the associate program." That interest has taken the form of studies probing the associate program, particularly the Darrow Report of the Committee on Undergraduate Life published last December.

Alston remains strong in his support of the program, commenting, "I think it's healthy for us (the faculty) to see the social side of students and for them to see faculty outside the classroom."

"We have a lot of good ideas but making these things happen is harder than just brainstorming at snacks."

Math professor Gary Gordon, also a house associate, has a different opinion of the program. He sees the job of the associate as primarily "initiating contacts with students and stimulating more academic discussion, both among students and between students and faculty."

Having been associated with Armstrong for two years, Gordon has striven to establish "a natural, nice setting where students and faculty can talk about not necessarily academic, but intellectual issues." He sees a series of short films, panels, and lectures as being a means to this end.

Gordon, however, has encountered mixed success. His attitude toward the program has changed over the year and he describes himself as being "not nearly as positive as I was at the beginning of the year." Gordon stated that he has doubts about the realistic value of an associate program, saying, "I'm not at all sure the house is the right setting for this. It's a little bit arbitrary to force it into the house."

A third associate, Professor Gail Newman of the German department brings a third perspective to the topic. She is an associate-in-residence who lives in Gladden. In her efforts to be "a liason between faculty and students," Newman finds that she is "positive about the idea but I get frustrated sometimes."

Newman became an associate because "sometimes I get discouraged that students don't bring more of themselves to the classroom." By being an associate, Newman believes that she can get to know students better, "which in turn would help me in my teaching." Her efforts often take the form of trying to "tap into what students are already doing."

Like Gordon, however, Newman sometimes finds her job as an associate difficult. Some of her efforts to plan events for the house have been succesful, such as a faculty/student dinner earlier this year. Others, however, are occasionally frustrating. "We have a lot of good ideas but making these things happen is harder than just brainstorming at snacks."

Newman asserts that faculty/student interaction must be partially initiated by the students. Although she believes that such interaction outside the classroom is important, she is unsure of the house's role in that relationship. Asked if she felt the house were the best route, Newman replied, "I'm beginning to doubt it."

The differing feelings of faculty senior associates concerning the program might be explained by the lack of a definite job description. Alston sees the role as depending "on the house and the relationship with the house president." Newman also views the program as being one without clear definition. "The role seems to be very loosely defined. It's pretty much left up to the house and the individual associate," she commented.

Gordon agrees and suggests that the program could be improved by having "a set of guidelines or suggested activities." He attributes some of his problems to the lack of such guidelines, saying, "We've been kind of groping all year."

"It's a little awkward," commented Regan. "You don't always know when to draw the line between being a friend and being an authority figure when freshmen overdo it."

One problem the JA's faced in particular this year was the issue of alcohol use by freshmen. This fall, in a break with tradition, alcohol was not served during Freshmen Days functions. Thus the JA's had to find other ways to "break the ice" and enliven things.

Hoffman believed that the alcohol issue has no definitive answer, saying, "You have to know when to be firm, and when to let them learn the hard way."

Santella and Park called on "common sense" as their guidelines on this front. But they, like many of the JA's, felt that their training should include more specific advice for dealing with the alcohol situation.

This complaint—not knowing exactly what was expected of them—was a frequent comment from the JA's. Since there are few rules or guidelines that the JA's must follow, they must define on their own to what extent they should interact with their freshmen.

"Sometimes I felt like we were deserted by the administration," noted Boocock. "We were left wondering if we had any duties. Finally, you just go with what you feel."

Regan echoed his words, saying, "There are no set rules as a JA. Knowing what to do is your own game. You play it by ear." She also said that the diversity of each entry and each class might make it difficult to establish adequate rules.

Time-sbaring

One duty the JA's all agreed upon was the need to spend as much time as possible with the freshmen. Most JA's said the need was stronger during first semester, however, and found that during the spring they wanted to renew their own old friendships.

"Freshmen need to be matured when they come here," suggested Santella and Park. "And we're the guys to do it!"

Hoffman, who lived in Sage E freshman year, noted that being a JA changes one'ssocial life and demands certain sacrifices. "It's not really a social thing, wherever you are. It takes a lot of effort to integrate the freshmen with other 'froshes.' Not just Mr. or Mrs. Williams would be good JA's."

Most JA's stated that their largest responsibility was to set a good example for the freshmen and encourage them to get involved with campus life.

"You watch out for yourself," said Park. "The freshmen need to see that you can be a normal person, and not just an extension of the entry."

IN OTHER IVORY TOWERS

YALE

"I don't see it as an ending but as a beginning...of my next adventure" said A. Bartlett Giamatti of his decision to leave his post as president of Yale University. After seven years he decided that he had accomplished as much as he had hoped to and added, "I have a horror of staying on too long at a job."

Giamatti wanted to leave his post in a strong position and with a produetive record; he noted, "I don't want to quit after I've gotten to that point when I can't get that fly ball in deep center field." His decision provoked shock and surprise among the faculty and students at Yale."I'm dismayed,"said one freshman. "It's especially upsetting coming on top of the (10-week food service) strike. It's like, what more can happen to us now?"

Regarding his future plans, Giamatti smilingly said, "The president of Yale doesn't go out looking for a job." He plans to leave his post in June, 1986 and take a year off to travel and study. (Globe)

FRANKLIN AND MARSHALL

"A college is a fragile thing," said Ron Potier, director of admissions at F and M, and he went on to say that public relations are easily hurt because college guidebooks say what they want to and sometimes fail to double check their accuracy, as was the case recently with Barron's Profiles of American Colleges.

Barron's listed F and M as "Very Competitive" rather than "Highly Competitive" in its most recent edition. F and M has always been "Highly Competitive" and according to Potier's calculations, nothing has changed. The college gave Barron's statistics on student SAT scores, but Barron's made their own calculations, which later proved to be inaccurate.

Twelve other colleges were also misrepresented, and many threatened to sue. Among them was Haverford, which dropped a notch from "Most Competitive." Barron's failure to notice a misplaced decimal point resulted in a Texas college's having 14,000 applications one year and 1,400 the next.

Potier compared Barron's method of assessment to Kentucky Fried Chicken in that they both use a secret ingredient. Not surprisingly, F and M will be listed as "Highly Competitive" in Barron's next edition.

High Mass to be sung

by Martita Well

In celebration of Bach's 300th birthday, Williams Choral Society will sing the "High Mass" this coming Sunday at 8:30pm in Chapin Hall. The two-hour work is often considered Bach's greatest choral piece, and will be performed with members of the Berkshire and Albany Symphony Orchestras.

"It's a damn hard piece, very challenging and very demanding," said Helen Mango '85, first soprano. "I'm really glad I got to sing it before I left." The piece will be sung by 40 members of the Choral Society, chosen from wthe total group of 85 for their experience and devotion. "The people doing it are having a good time. It's a real group effort, and we're a very dedicated bunch," she added.

There are five soloists for the work, including Terrence Dwyer who teaches vocal technique to Williams students. In addition, there are three trumpet parts which will be performed by doctoral students in the Chestnut Trumpet Program at UMass Amherst. "The piece has everything," said Mango, "from booming D Major trumpet passages to very soft moments. It expresses all moods."

According to Lisa Leonard '86, a former Choral Society member, the group has been working on the piece since early February. "It's going to be brilliant," she said of the performance.

tentative.

Bazelon said Thursday that he believes "a composer should be seen as well as heard, if only to take responsibility for the notes he writes." He lived up to his words Friday, coming forward from the audience to take a bow after Symphony Concertante. Regardless of one's feelings about the piece, one could not help feeling good for Bazelon, who seemed so unabashedly happy to have heard the piece performed after waiting 16 years.

Indeed, conductor Julius Hegyl should be applauded for undertaking the piece, and for his continuing commitment to bringing new music to his audience. Unfortunately, few composers are willing to take the risks involved in performing important and interesting, but possibly unpopular, modern works.

Friday's program was an intriguing one, with the Symphony Concertante sandwiched between a late Classical symphony by Bizet and a Baroque masterpiece by Handel.

An extremely creditable performance of Bizet's beautiful Symphony in Copened the evening. Written when the composer was only 17-years-old, the symphony shows Bizet's already rich gift for melody, which would become so evident in his greatest work, Carmen.

The Berkshire Symphony's performance, while not polished, was expressive and even moving at times. The piece was transfigured during the adagio movement by the marvellous haunting oboe playing of principal Carl Jenkins. It is a delight to have this wonderful musician back with the orchestra after his notable absence last concert.

The concert ended in grand style with Handel's magnificent Music for the Royal Fireworks, written originally in 1749 for a grand outdoor performance by brass and woodwinds. The orchestral version, well played and well received Friday night, made one long to have heard the brillance of the original.

This was a bright and energetic performance throughout. The brass section, somewhat weak during the Bizet, came through in this piece, with the french horns especially outstanding. The audience and perhaps the orchestra seemed to feel rewarded in this piece for their patience with the Bazelon.

Indeed, never has this reviewer heard the orchestra so let loose as it did in the closing minuet, with percussion as most people like it best, booming away behind a grand crescendo.

Tracksters second in Little Three

First defeat in five years

by William E. Gillianders

At Wesleyan Saturday, the men's track team lost the Little Three Championship for the first time in five years.

The men were unable to stop a talented Amherst team who won convincingly by a score of 83-66, with the Wesleyan Cardinals trailing behind with 43 points. Although Wesleyan was hardly a faetor in the competition for the title, they did play an important role in the distanee events where Williams is especially strong.

The women's team was unable to match the depth of a tough Wesleyan squad that virtually controlled the competition. The Ephwomen took second, with Amherst in a distant third, 104-53-21.

The men, led by strong individual efforts, were able to hold their own in several events. They excelled in the sprints, with freshman Ken Alleyne taking first place in both the 100m and 200m, while Andre Lopez '87 was able to take second in both events. Alleyne also looked impressive in the long jump, soaring 20'8" to victory, while Scott Powers '88 and Henry Jones '88 took third and fourth respectively.

Williams also seored heavily in the high jump and the 800m run. Senior co-captain Paul Toland and Brandt Johnson '87 each cleared 6'4" to claim the top two places. Kevin Jenkins '85, also a co-eaptain, ran an Impressive 1:58 half-mile to take first, while Tom Pingree '86 eompleted the Williams effort with a third place. In the weight events Joe McGinn threw the hammer 154', good for first, but Amherst took first in the javelin, shot, and discus. Amherst, with the exception of the 500m run, which Weslayan won, was dominant in those events where Williams was weakest, especially the pole vault, triple jump, 40m and 110m hurdles, and surprisingly enough, the 1500m run.

For the women, senior captain Lindsay Rockwood was a force, scoring almost half of the women's points. She took first place in the long, triple, and the high jump, and placed in the 100m and 40m hurdles. Junior Mel Mahoney was also impressive, taking two seeond places, in the 100, hurdles and the triple jump, and one fourth place finish. Other shutouts for the women were freshmen Joan Davis, and sophomore Becky Conklin and Gail Henderson.

Both losses were disappointing but especially for the men who have alrcady seen other winning streaks ended this year, esppcially during the cross country and winter traek seasons.

Purple Valley Classic

In other running action this weekend,the eighth annual Purple Valley Classic 10 mile road race drew more than 120 competitors despite a slight drizzle.

The conditions were ideal for a fast race, and Pete Farwell, the coach of the men's cross country team, took advantage, pacing himself away from the rest of the field, winning the race by almost three minutes with a time of 52:52. Among the students competing were Fred Eaton '86, who was ninth (59:23), and Sarah Bates '85, who was ran the course in 69:50 to be the fourth female across the line.

The significance of seams

There are 30,000 fans in the stands. There are 500,000 watching on TV. Millions will read about this baseball game in tomorrow's newpapers.

And so much depends on one little seam?

With these numbers, one would expect games of epic proportions. Basketball players, for instance, are of epic height. Boxers are of epic fighting ability. Football players hit each other with epic foree.

Cap'n Crunch by John Clayton

But a baseball pitcher holds the seams crosswise instead of vertical, and changes the whole game. His pitch dips instead of shooting, or swerves instead of sliding, or rises instead of falling. And the batters can't hit it, so the pitcher wins the game.

But you can't tell me seams are of epic proportion.

Seams are about as insignificant as you can get. I'll bet when Abner Doubleday invented the baseball, he just happened to have two of whatever he made the ball out of, so he sewed them together.

But why should Abner's sewing ability (or maybe his wife did it, not knowing that her act would cause millions of husbands to abandon their wives for weekend TV. . . but then again, with a name like Abner, maybe she wanted to get rid of him), why should these stitches be the key to entire ballgames, and thus the happiness of so many people?

The experts will now tell me about all the physics behind seams and rotations and speeds and the way balls curve. They will tell me that if the ball had no seams, the pitchers couldn't throw all of these fancy pitches, and could never get anyone out.

Well, the experts have also told me that it is physiologically impossible for a batter to see the ball actually hitting the bat. That's the problem with experts, they keep mucking up good sports with silly laws of science.

So I'm not going to listen to the experts. I'm just going to say it's unfair for a bunch of little stitches to determine the fate of a game, of a whole season. Especially the Cubs.

Just so long as nobody asks me about that sticky stuff on the pitchers' fingers.

The second game marked the B side's best effort of the season with their 10-0 victory. The Killer Bees controlled play throughout as the outcome of the game was never in question. The white pack, led by juniors Greg Norton, Pete Dawson, and Geoff Kass, pushed Albany's scrum all over the fieid, while the running and tackling of the line was just as impressive.

In the first half, the Bees took a 4-0 lead as Greg Rubinstein 'GR scored his first try of the season. The play was set up by marvelous squib kicks by John Dagnello '85, Tim Latimore '86, and Gary Sheff '87. Sheff's conversion attempt, however, was clearly the most pathetic moment in the history of the WRFC, as the half ended with the 4-0 Williams lead.

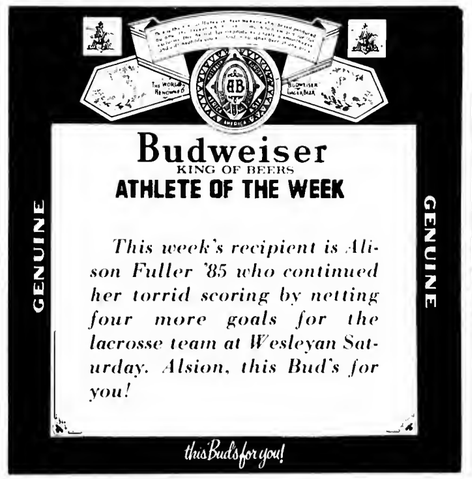
The second session brought more of the same type of play as Bob Iseley '85, Charlie Lazor '87, and Craig Kubmastro '86 kept the Albany runners offbalance all day. The Ephs scored their second try on a gorgeous run by Mark Tompkins '87 to increase the lead to 8-0. The conversion was added by Latimore and the game ended 10-0. Excellent play by John Conlon '85, Tom Dumphy '85, and Bill Mead '88 was also instrumental in the victory.

C's win 14-10

The final match of the afternoon pitted the C side of Albany Law against a combination of C's and D's from Williams. The quality of play was extremely high as both team executed very well. Williams jumped out to an early lead as Sheff and Drew Steckler '87 gave Andy Anselmi '87 the first try of the match. The Ephs quickly increased the lead to 10-0 when Barton George '87 galloped twenty-two meters to paydirt. Sean (Sugar Bear) Brennan blocked a kick deep in Albany territory and Evan Zahner '87 picked the ball up and gave it to George for the score. Sheff redeemed himself as his conversion attempt was true. Albany scored a try as the half came to a close at 10-4. The second stanza was as hard-fought as the first with each side scoring a try.

Andy Harris '88 cashed in on a long run to score the third Williams try of the game to increase the lead to 14-4. Albany, however, answered quickly as they pushed a try across the line in a strong scrum run. The rest of the game was dominated by Albany as they desperately drove to score the equalizing try. The Williams defense, however, led by Greg Bronson '86 and Ross Gianette '88, held fast and the Ephs won 14-10.

Softball downs Jeffs



by E. Tom R. Ewing

The softball team came back from two defeats early in the week to record a satisfying 11-5 victory over Amherst on Sunday. Williams lost to St. Rose, 13-6, on Tuesday and to Mt. Holyoke, 15-0, on Saturday.

Williams shook off these two losses on Sunday, just in time for the big Williams-Amherst showdown. Playing in a gentle spring rain that only slightly dampened the spirits of the crowd, Williams played a good game against the Lady Jeffs. Senior co-captain Karen Montzka pitched a solid game, continuing her excellent year. She gave up only three hits and five walks on the afternoon, and was especially strong in the second half of the game, gaining strength and showing more control.

The Williams scoring was provided by Darca Boom '87 (two singles and two runs scored), Montzka (two runs), and Tori Ballard '87 (one double and two runs). Williams scored four runs in the

by Greg Keller
and Andrew Smith

The men's lacrosse team upped its record to 4-2 this week with two comeback victories, a 14-8 win over Wesleyan and a 7-6 thriller over Union.

On Saturday, the Ephmen scored 11 goals in the second half en route to the 14-8 victory over the 3-5 Cardinals. Chris Toll '86 and Reese Hughes '85 each contributed three goals and an assist in the winning effort.

After trailing by three at halftime, the Ephs came alive with six tallies in the third period. "We began to play with intensity," said coach Renzi Lamb. "We controlled the ground balls and were able to keep the ball in the offensive end of the field."

Wesleyan scored late in the period but Williams silenced any hopes of a comeback with a well-executed fast break. Eph defenseman Jamie Gallop '87 cleared the ball to fellow sophomore Jim Sperry who hit still another sophomore, Mike O'Connell, as he broke toward the goal. O'Connell drove and faked a shot but dished to Hughes who netted what would prove to be the winning goal.

Other Eph scorers were Rob Miller '87 and Jonathan Edie '88 with two each, while O'Connell, Sperry, Steve Patterson '87, and Mike Greeley '85 all added one apiece.

Thriller at Union

On Wednesday Edie led the Eph attack to a 7-6 victory over the Union Dutchmen, dishing in three goals, including the game-winnner, in the double-overtime battle.

At the half the Dutchmen led by three, and they were to up that margin to four before the Ephmen began their comeback. "Our offense was non-existent throughout the first half," said Lamb.

Sperry sparked that offense at 5:45 of the third period by scoring the Ephs' first goal. Williams netted two more goals in the third but trailed 5-3 going into the final quarter.

Edie tallied early in the fourth but Union countered midway through the period to maintain their two-goal advantage. With less than three minutes remaining, O'Connell assisted Edie's tally to cut the lead to one. Thirty seconds later, Rob Miller provided the gaol that sent the game into overtime.

With 1:02 left in the second overtime, Edie, the game's MVP, drove to the net and fired in the winning goal.

The team looks forward to a an important home contest tomorrow against arch-rival Middlebury at 4:00.

Baseball slumps to 5-12

by Rob Coakley
and Greg Norton

After losing three straight during a trip to Maine, the baseball team continued their mid-season slump last week, dropping their record to 5-12.

Amherst beat Williams on Tuesday 2-0 in a classic pitching duel. The Ephs then traveled to Maine, falling short to Bates on Friday 16-6, and dropping two to Bowdoin on Saturday by scores of 6-2 and 7-6.

Junior Kevin Morris pitched an outstanding game against Amherst, giving up only four hits to a potent offensive team. However, the Jeffs' Paul Nimens pitched nearly a perfect game, giving up only one hit and striking out 16. The only Eph scoring threat came in the seventh inning when Nimens walked three to load the bases, but he got himself out of trouble with a strikeout to end the inning.

Friday's game in Maine became a slugfest as Bates utilized the long ball, scoring nine of their sixteen runs on homers. Junior Jeff Lilley and freshman Chris Pacchus connected for round-trippers for the Ephmen, while sophomores Rick Hedeman and Steve Belsito had three hits apiece. Sophomore Seth Lawry took the loss on the mound.

The frustration continued on Saturday as Williams couldn't capitalize on several good scoring opportunities against Bowdoin. In the first game, freshman Scott Garfield pitched very well until tiring in the sixth and giving up three runs. Senior captain Mike Coakley homered in the second, but the Ephs continuously stranded men in scoring position, which would prove to be the key to the loss.

Freshman Jim Duquette, playing shortstop, scored the Ephs' second run when he stole home in a double-steal engineered with junior outfielder Dick Hollington.

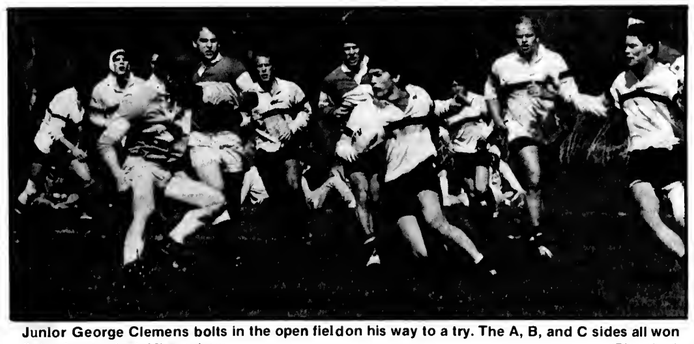
The second game was played down to the wire as Williams mounted a good comeback in the seventh, scoring two runs, but again came up short.

Duquette scored Williams' first run in the first, crossing the plate on freshman Steve Hoisten's single. Sophomore John Shaw scored on a bases loaded walk to Hedeman in hte fourth. Shaw and Duquette each scored again in the sixth with Hollington and Hedeman getting the RBIs. In the seventh, Shaw and Duquette did the knocking in, scoring freshman shortstop Lewis Collins and Pieter Mulder'85. Junior Bob Hussey took the loss on the mound.

The team will travel to Middlebury tomorrow before hosting Amherst for a doubleheader on Saturday.

Ruggers maul Albany Law

by Gene Mazzaro



The Williams Rugby Football Club celebrated Parent's Weekend by crushing Albany Law in three matches on Saturday afternoon. The A side won by the score of 19-7, while the B's shut the visitors out 10-0. In the final game of the afternoon, the C side completed the sweep with a 14-10 victory.

In A side action, the Albany club controlled play throughout the first half as the Ephs played with a stiff wind in their face. Albany kept the ball deep in Williams territory and eventually managed to score a try to take the lead 4-0. Following the score, Albany applied more pressure but the Eph defense held until the half ended.

The Ephs turned it around in the second stanza, dominating the rest of the game. The line exposed gaping holes in the Albany defense while the scrum continually won the ball from the opposing pack. Early in the half, George Clemens '86 scored the equalizer, combining an Albany error with a brilliant individual effort. Clemens chased down a dropped kick, and carried it five meters with two men on his back to score the try.

The Ephs never slowed the pace and scored again as senior Marty Davis' spectacular run set up Ed O'Toole '86 for the second try and a Williams lead. Roger Merriam's '86 added the conversion and a penalty kick to increase the lead to 13-4. An Albany kick, however, closed the gap to 13-7. As time was running out in this bitterly-fought contest, Mike Koister '85 pushed one more try across the line. Steve Troyer '86 advanced the ball to the Albany goal line before being tackled by the Albany fullback. As he fell to the ground, he passed the ball to Kolster who sprawled across the line. Another Merriam conversion brought the final score to 19-7

Graduation speakers named

by Martita Weil

Stephen Jay Gould will be the Commencement speaker, and Ernest L. Boyer Baccalaureate speaker at this year's graduation on June 9th. In conjunction with this year's emphasis on education and educators, both men are distinguished scholars in their fields.

Gould, 43, is the author of three books on evolution, one published earlier this year. He has won many prizes for his writing, and is currently the Agassiz professor of Zoology at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts. He will receive the honorary degree of Doctor of Science from Williams.

Gould is highly controversial for his arguments on evolution. According to his books, Gould believes that traditional theories of gradual evolutionary development in species are wrong, and instead advocates the idea that sudden changes take place in a species, and that there are no slow transformations.

Boyer, 56, is a former Chancellor of the State University of New York. In April, 1977 he became U.S. Commissioner of Education, and in 1978 was named one of America's two outstanding educators by U.S. News and World Report. He is currently President of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Education. Boyer will receive an honorary Doctor of Laws degree.

Committee selection

The speakers were selected by a committee of current seniors, faculty members, and Trustees, along with Williams President John W. Chandler. "There were a lot of Trustees on the committee, and they're a powerful lot," said committee member Suzanne Graver, Professor of English.

Students on the committee submitted self-nominations and were elected last spring, simultaneously with the College Council election. "We held many meetings, made suggestions, and discussed them," said Graver. "We attempted to get a balance in the fields represented, but there was a very elaborate give and take."

Due to an oversight, the seniors on the committee were not invited to the meeting which announced the final selections, but the students who will be on next year's committee were present. According to Tara Kazak '86, a newly-elected member "The committee sort of had an idea who they wanted, but they definitely wanted student input."

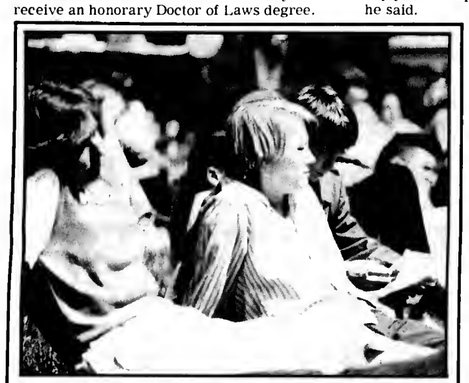
"I wish we could have had more input," said commmittee member David Shedd '85. Shedd said that the students were not familiar with many of the candidates, but that he had still enjoyed the experience. "I found it a lot of fun," he said.

Alcohol dispute

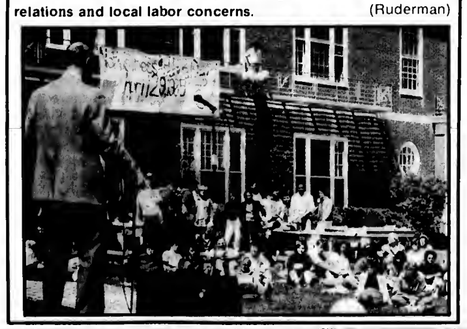
Log decision debated in college community

by Andrew Mayer

While the Massachusetts drinking age will rise to 21 in less than a month, the status of the Log still has not been decided. Although the College Council, the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and an informal meeting of students and administrators all voted last week to support keeping beer and wine at the Log, opinions are sharply divided on the issue.



Last Monday, the CUL heard James Hodgkins, Steve Chick and Karl Kowitz, all from Food Service, give their opinions on the future of the Log. All three expressed interest in removing alcohol from the Log and adding various foods and more entertainment.



Their main objection to keeping alcohol at the Log is liability for the College. Hodgkins worried that eventually a student would leave the Log drunk, cause a car accident or damage private property and involve the Log and the College in a lawsuit.

"Nothing except dumb luck can protect us from criminal suits," Hodgkins told the CUL. "We will not go on turning our heads anymore. The risk is just too great." On July 1, the Log will lose its liability insurance, which has been withdrawn by the insurance company.

However, neither Hodgkins nor Chick want to abandon the Log. Hodgkins said, "The Log's social value is far greater than its value as a drinking place."

300 people, including Angie Bottum '85 (top), gathered on Baxter Lawn last Monday to attend the "No Business as Usual" rally, which encouraged students, faculty, and staff to forego their normal activities and focus their attention on combatting oppression. The day-long event included speakers and performers who addressed a variety of issues, including Central American—U.S. relations and local labor concerns. (Ruderman)

Carol Cable Co. fires 123 strikers

by James Spallone

One hundred and twenty-three striking workers at the Carol Cable Co. were fired last week. The strikers received letters from the company's management informing them that they would be fired and lose all employment benefits as of May 1.

The letters came in the second week of a walkout by members of the International Union of Electrical Radio and Machine Workers Union (IUE) Local 299. The workers allege that the company showed preferential treatment for a non-union employee.

As reported last week, the dispute centers around foreman John Wright, a non-union management-level employee who wanted to return to a union-represented position on the shop floor. In order to make room for Wright a union employee was moved to the third shift. The union members walked out on April 23, and company officials have refused comment on the issue.

"If they move the guy off the first shift we'll all go back to work," Local President Norman Estes said Tuesday.

Last week the Advocate reported that State Representative Sherwood M. Guernsey, D-Williamstown, retained the help of a state mediator, at the union's request, in order to help get management to the bargaining table. On Thursday management met with the moderator and the union for the first time. Nothing was resolved, and talks resumed yesterday.

Labor rally

On Tuesday a rally sponsored by the Northern Berkshire Labor Coalition was held on the grounds of the Water Street plant. About 130 people, including several students and professors from Williams College, were present to support the strikers.

Later strikers and supporters formed a picket line along the street in front of the parking lot and sang "Solidarity Forever" as company officials crossed the line on their way home.

"The workers were very pleased with the rally," said Professor David Fairris, a member of the Northern Berkshire Labor Coalition. "The support they received was very important to them. They continue to sing and cheer every day in front of the plant," he added.

Carol's management maintains that the strike is an "illegal work stoppage," according to the letter sent to the strikers. In the letter Carol's Executive Vice President Samuel W. Perelman said that "We cannot allow our employees to repudiate our contract whenever they feel so inclined."

The union agrees with the company that there is no stipulation in their contract regarding moving a non-union employee into a union job, however members feel that this is an unfair practice, according to the Advocate.

No union help

The Advocate reported that the strikers are ineligible for union strike benefits since the international union leadership regards the strike as illegal. In response a support group has formed and started to raise money on behalf of the strikers.

Fairris said that the Coalition is looking into several ideas including holding a fund raising dinner on behalf of the strikers, holding another rally, and making a formal presentation of petitions signed in support of the strikers to Town Manager Steven Ledoux.

"Were not just a monetary support group, we're here to lend emotional support as well," added Fairris.

In November the union voted to accept an unfavorable contract when the company threatened to move out of the area. Concessions made by workers in November included a substantial pay cut, a no-strike clause and major reductions in health care benefits.

Students, residents risk arrest in government protest

by John McDermott and R. P. Demott

PITTSFIELD, MASS—This morning at 11:15 a group of 14 demonstrators entered the federal building in Pittsfield and announced their intention to turn it into a federal education center for the day.

Seven of the group organized by White and David Yaskuika '84 are Williams students. They are Chris Mullen '85, Antje Lewis '86, Sara Bolton '87, Elaine Freedman '87, Carrie Parker '85, Seth Rolland '86, and Jim Lanza '86. They were joined by several area residents in the demonstration.

The protestors began by covering the name of the building with a protest banner, and proceeded into the building, which is US government property, and spoke to the recruiting officers of the armed services. According to Yaskuika, raising the banner and entering the building, along with lephleting inside the offices, are technically illegal acts possibly punishable by jail.

Susan Gordon of Pittsfield said she feared that since these are federal crimes the protestors might be taken to Springfield if arrested. The students said they would be willing to spend 7 or 8 days in jail, but several of the others said they hoped to avoid being jailed. As of this printing, no action had been taken by federal or local authorities, although according to Yaskuika "there will be some form of confrontation."

"No Idea"

Asked by a demonstrator "Can you tell me what's happening in Nicaragua?" Marine Recruiter Donald Dobos responded "we have no idea." No official statement was released.

"We may happen to feel personally that what you are doing is the greatest thing in the world, but as employees of the government we cannot make a statement," said Navy recruiter Tom Augustine.

"The US is sliding into a war driven by nothing but communist paranoia," said Mullen. Marine recruiter E.A. Lodge commented that "it's better to fight wars in a foreign country than to fight them here."

According to Freedman, one Marine recruiter told the women to "go back to your kitchens and have babies." Freedman also said that the Air Force recruiter was very responsive and said he would offer his recruits the possibility of viewing the slide show.

Extracurricular Activities

This past week, three incidents have attempted to get those here to consider the world beyond Williams. The "No Business as Usual" rally attracted a large portion of the campus and urged those at Williams to focus on worldwide political problems of oppression; Sandra Burton proposed that Williams participate more openly with the other colleges in the Berkshires; and the strike at Carol Cable elicited sympathy and donations from students, faculty, and staff for the striking workers.

All of these suggestions aim to counteract a troubling trend within the Williams community towards isolation and separatism. While the problems within our immediate sphere merit attention, those outside should not be ignored. It is crucial to our educations—and to our lives—that situations somewhat removed from our own get the consideration that they deserve. If what we learn here is restricted to this time and place, then it will be useless anywhere else, and part of our experience at Williams must be to look beyond our ivy-covered walls.

Zoning

To The Editor:

It may be somewhat irrelevent to all the issues raised by the proposal to move the Log, but I would like to set everybody straight on Mission Park—the park. It is not a state park nor is it zoned in some mysterious way by the Town. It belongs wholly to Williams College but was given to the college over a hundred years ago with a restriction in the deed—namely that it be held in perpetuity as a park to honor the American missionary movement, in particular the Williams men who were founders and participants in it. That may seem kind of quaint in 1985, but you can't just brush those things aside.

The college can petition a Massachusetts court to permit appropriate uses of the land. Mission Park, the building, encroaches somewhat on the Park land, and court approval was obtained to do that.

Common sense suggests however that the Log, however admirable a building it is, would not be thought an appropriate stucture in a memorial park of this sort.

Townspeople

To The Editor:

All of us (especially seniors at OCC) half jokingly discuss our worries about what will happen to us when we leave Williamstown and enter the "real world." We tend to forget that we are always part of the real world, as members of this community. We are townspeople—by the churches and synagogues we attend, the stores we shop in, and all the other services we enjoy (and support) in Williamstown.

As members of this community we should share our fellow townspeople's concern at the disturbing situation at the Carol Cable factory on Water Street. Most of us drive or jog past it often—no more, to us, than one of the less picturesque aspects of a typical New England town. But just a few blocks from our dormitories and dining halls, 120 men and women of our town are trapped in one of "real life's" grimmer struggles.

In the 18 month period since the Carol Cable company added the Water Street plant to its network of factories, tension has mounted between workers and managers. The present strike was touched off by the company's attempt to erase any semblance of democratic input from the workers into the choice of work assignments. But the roots of this problem go much deeper. Increasingly bitter struggles over safety, reinvestment, and health benefits have arisen since the change of ownership. For the workers, some of whom have worked at the factory for over 30 years, this strike represents a last, desperate attempt to have their grievances heard. Carol Cable has responded by firing the striking workers and has threatened to hire a new workforce. Tentative attempts to negotiate the problem have begun, but in the meantime the workers have no wages and little savings to draw upon. Since this is technically a "wildcat" strike, the workers are ineligible for government benefits or payments from their union's international.

While waiting for progress in the negotiations, one thing they can count on is a sympathetic outpouring of support from the townspeople, as well as from workers all over New England. Remembering that we too are part of their community, Williams students can help these 120 workers and their families as they live through a difficult and frightening time. The campus community has already begun to help by donating to the strike support fund at the "No Business as Usual" rally last Monday. Nonetheless, the result only came to about one dollar per worker. Let us show generosity and concern. The Williams Student Strike Support Fund is helping to organize contributions. Donations can be sent to SU 2505, made payable to IUE Local 299.

Clarification

To The Editor:

Last Friday a letter was sent out to the Williams community requesting support for the workers on strike at Carol Cable. The letter was hurriedly drafted by a newly formed student committee whose names appeared at the bottom. Although Professors Fairris, Tauber, and Hoppin were listed as supporters, they did not participate in this appeal. It was wrong of us to translate their concern for the workers into participation in our project.

Acceptance & forgiveness: qualities missing at Bitburg

by Joe Ehlers

There are times when political situations develop into moral tests of national conscience, and President Reagan's visit to the Bitburg cemetery last weekend was one of those times. No one can deny that it was a pathetically planned visit, and many can argue that there were better ways in which Reagan could have addressed reconciliation while appealing both to the Germans and the Americans. I find the opposition to the visit upsetting, however, because it reveals a frightening void of forgiveness in this nation, a very selfish morality.

Granted, it's very easy for me to lecture on what a truly moral reaction should be, but we are talking about a horribly immoral act in history. And I am not Jewish, I am part-German; this is a definite disadvantage. As one student said to me earlier, "Try justifying the cemetery visit to someone who watched their parents herded in cattle cars by German soldiers." I can't, and I don't intend to.

At the same time, however, I am bothered by the way in which many of those opposed to the visit justify their beliefs. Too often we fall back on the theory of collective guilt as a reason for not visiting the cemetery. This is fundamentally wrong! Who are we to judge just who is guilty or not guilty of the crimes during World War II, especially when we know so little about most of those buried in the cemetery? Reagan's critics would respond that they are not using collective guilt as a rationale, that the presence of 47 Waffen SS stormtroopers at Bitburg is justification enough to have stopped the visit. Their point on the SS is well-taken; it is that part of Nazi Germany that is responsible for many of the ghastly crimes committed.

The presence of the SS should not have stopped the President, however; to say these 47 speak for a cemetery of over 2000 is incorrect, and is in itself the use of collective guilt all over again. Reagan's critics would respond that the SS are symbols that the President accepts by participating in the ceremony at Bitburg. I can't deny that there might have been a better cemetery to visit, a better ceremony to preside over, but that is irrelevant here. The President's critics seem to say that he justifies the actions of the SS by the acceptance of their symbolism at Bitburg, but this is not a "collective whitewashing" that Reagan presided over, as one commentator aptly stated, and I find the use of symbols here over actions disturbing. Reagan's presence at the cemetery will not erase the memories of the Holocaust, nor will it exonerate the SS. The horrid result of the Holocaust is more than a symbol, it is the loss of over 12 million human beings, and the cavity that was created by this loss is in itself far greater than any symbolism of action that any politician can ever achieve.

German Chancellor Helmut Kohl expressed what he hoped the Bitburg visit would accomplish at the post-ceremony speeches at Bitburg Air Force base Sunday. He looks at Bitburg as the start of "a reconciliation that does not forget the past but tries to overcome it." The time has come for the world to respectably carry on from the Holocaust, holding it in our memories but starting anew. Forty years will never erase the Holocaust, and we should hope that four centuries will not, either. But the Germans, the Jews, the allies, the veterans, and all of us who were in some way permanently touched by this must forgive all but the truly guilty, and not use their guilt as an obstacle in the path of acceptance of those less horribly involved. After all, in the end, the resolution of the Holocaust was a triumph of life over death, and we must make Bitburg a triumph of acceptance over assigned guilt.

Administration limits alternatives to future Log location

by Dave Schelbe with John Clayton

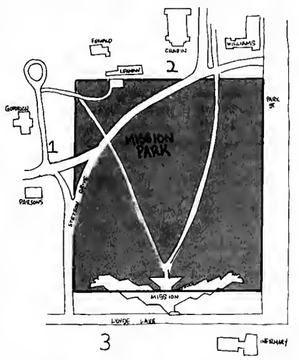
Meetings held last week (College Council, CUL, and a CUL-sponsored open meeting) showed student support for the Log as a multifaceted social center serving alcohol, even though restrictions were imposed on the discussion before it began. More important than the discussion, however, were the decisions made beforehand, limiting the student choices to restricting or eliminating alcohol at the Log. The most hindering restriction presented was that the Log will not be moved.



There are many problems with the Log's current Spring Street location. It does not make sense to have the College's central social facility not centrally located. The use of the Log with its new alternative activities will depend on its accessibility.

Spring Street merchants and residents already resent it as a dangerous nuisance in the central business district. Moreover, restricting or eliminating alcohol at the Log will not solve the problem, because noise from entertainment at the Log will still disturb residents and students will still be forced to go through Spring Street on their way to or from the Log. In addition, local law enforcement officials have already indicated they would prefer the Log be on campus.

The administration seems to have abandoned the idea of moving the Log with the appearance of the Mission Park map. This dismissal is premature.

The Log could go in a number of locations on campus (see map). The building would fit between Mission Park and Stetson apartments (3), behind the Greylock quad, or in two locations near Lehman that would not infringe on the property reserved to memorialize the Haystack Monument. The park's boundaries leave room for the Log behind Chapin parallel to Lehman (2) or on the grassy space between Lehman, Goodrich, Fernald and Parsons (1).

The latter two options are the strongest because of their central location on campus. Additionally, the location near Goodrich would eliminate the problem of noise near Chapin, and the white-shingled Log would fit well visually in the Dodd area. It might be necessary to slightly adjust the driveway going to the cul-de-sac between Sawyer and Stetson, diverting traffic coming from the library slightly to the right to clear the front of the Log in this location.

Concern over liability has rightly been expressed. But, contrary to a statement by Director of Food Services Jim Hodgkins, "dumb luck" is not the only way for the College to reduce its chances of becoming liable. The location of the Log near concentrations of population on campus in combination with the inaccessibility of parking space around this location would create a disincentive for students of any age to drive to the Log. If students thus had an incentive to avoid drinking and driving, the likelihood of a liability-producing incident would be significantly reduced.

The major objection the College has raised to moving the Log is the cost of relocation. The administration says that there is no room in the budget for the $300,000 needed to move the building and make it re-operational. However, student and alumni support for the move could be translated into monetary support that would substantially defray, if not completely cover, the cost. Such support would not likely be generated by trying to build a new campus pub, or convert Thompson Infirmary.

Suggestions to create another pub ignore the fact that the Log is a proven success as a gathering place. When such viable options exist for moving and using the building, it does not make sense to trade this excellent facility for options that would be (at best) satisfactory. The Log as an institution has very few drawbacks, and by not moving it we are guaranteeing that it will not be as strong.

...it does not make sense to trade this excellent facility for options that would be (at best) satisfactory. The Log as an institution has very few drawbacks, and by not moving it we are guaranteeing that it will not be as strong.

A central location where students could "drop by" the Log for a half-hour study break was the central theme of the Log Committee's recommendations. The atmosphere, ambience, and attractions of the Log may not pull students down to Spring Street, and there are distinct disadvantages to having students downtown late at night. A central location creates a greater incentive for students to go to the Log and fewer problems once they do.

Recent legislation has made it necessary to make changes in the Log immediately. It makes sense to make this Redesigning J.A. selection to reflect a diverse campus

by Nick Levis and Charles Goodwin

In response to complaints over student life at Williams, and in light of the more general student attitudes about housing on campus, this plan addressing Junior Advisor selection has been proposed by Levis and Goodwin.

For Consideration by the Committee on Undergraduate Life
(Submitted Simultaneously to the College Council)

1. The number of JA's will be increased to promote a greater diversity and a more equal representation of all parts of campus, owing to the major role JA's play in influencing freshman perceptions of campus.
2. Starting in academic year 1986-87, all freshman entries shall be assigned approximately six advisors, such that approximately 25% of all persons living in freshman entires shall be upperclassmen. (Please note: 6 and 25% are by no means sacred numbers. What is important is that we support any increase in the total number of JA's.)
3. Applications for advisor positions shall be accepted from incoming juniors and seniors.
4. Those given advisor positions shall arrange themselves into groups of two that will then be randomly assigned among incoming freshman entires, three groups to an entry.
5. Upperclass housing shall be converted to freshman housing as deemed appropriate to accomodate the additon of approximately one hundred advisors over the present fifty.

There are many reasons why we feel our proposal would solve the housing problem and improve life on this campus immensely. Among them are the following:

1. The two JA's in each freshman entry tend to have a similar outlook, or they would not choose to live together. Furthermore, the individual freshman comes in contact not with all JA's but with her pair of JA's. Therefore, even if we could devise the fairest possible JA selection process, each individual freshman entry would still have only two fairly similar Williams upperclass role models. This is unfair to freshmen whether the two JA's are wonderful, mediocre, or awful. We wish to provide freshmen with several role models. With six JA's they will see a much fairer cross section of the Williams community. This will encourage freshmen to envision themselves as part of the Williams community without feeling compelled to conform to any perceived Williams standard.
2. Not all JA's are as good as they should be; it is natural that a few bad apples should get through the most perfect of selection processes. Under the current system of only two JA's to an entry, however, this can be devastating to the entries stuck with less than satisfactory JA's. With six JA's, it will be virtually impossible not to have some good JA's in each entry, and the damage caused by bad JA's will be limited.
3. The experience of being a JA will at once be made easier and yet more intense. It will be easier because each JA will no longer have to communicate effectively with twenty-four very different persons who have just started college (some of whom have never left home before). That is impossible for the best of JA's! It will be more intense because each advisor will have greater opportunity to build strong, lasting friendships with at least some of the freshmen. Almost every freshman will have at least one JA he can relate to, which is not always the case under the current system. And there will almost never be a time when all six JA's are unavailable for an entry event.
4. Because 25% of those living in freshman entries will be upperclassmen, freshmen will no longer be isolated from the rest of the college. Integration will be achieved, but not at the expense of a coherent class identity.
5. Because some upperclass housing will have to be converted to freshmen use (Prospect, West, and Mission are possibilities), the Freshman Quad will no longer be excessively central to freshman life, and freshmen living outside the Quad will no longer be isolated from their class.

We believe that in these and so many other ways, reform in the JA system will make life at Williams College richer and more enjoyable.

A response to Hart Murphy

by J.B. Bird

Last week, Hart Murphy made some relevant comments about the way the Berkshire Quad isolates itself from campus. Before I can begin to agree with him, however, I must dispense with the slippery logic of his letter.

Hart, I'm on to you. I heard you read the first letter and I've studied your rhetoric. You begin your letters indignantly, as if transgressed by abstract forces—the housing system, the Record. Very believable. Well-reasoned. But always your tone betrays the elegant facade.

When you read us the letter in Fitch-Currier, the tone was conformist, yuppy, intolerant, insulting, and intensely homophobic. (Homophobia: hiding insecurity by publicly, vehemently denouncing homosexuality. As Shakespeare says, "Me thinks't thou dost protest too loudly.") I'm talking facial ticks, vocal inflection. I can't prove this; but then, I don't have to prove anything. Your latest letter does that well enough. On the diversity rally: "And the leaders of certain highly defensive special interest groups were delighted to have a whipping boy (me), the public denouncement of whom would provide a suitable means for generating support among the members of these groups."

Let's break down the euphemisms first, then the skewed logic. I assume these "highly defensive" groups refer to the BSU, the GLU, and the BQ—mainstays of the revolution, as you might say. It must be easier—more socially acceptable—not to name your victim, not to call a spade a spade. Perhaps you do not intend to be racist, Hart, but I implore you and those who follow you to look beneath the surface of intention. When you denounce the overwhelming and historic center of the Williams black and minority population (the BQ, it goes back to frat rejection days), you perpetuate the status quo of our preppy haven.

Why do you label these groups "defensive" (in the middle of your own rather lengthy self-justification)? You think they need you to drum up support? Don't flatter yourself. You may have crystallized their anger, but its been there a long time, en masse. Often rallies come to nothing, or only divert us from the tougher, interpersonal choices we face each day. But the rally is a necessity, to confirm group awareness, to celebrate the pride of those who have been suppressed.

I can not celebrate your pride, or even your logical, housing-system indignance. Bad things happen in the world, and that five or fifty students got placed in the "wrong " house at their preppy Northeastern college does not strike me as one of them.

As for that wrong house: why are you so convinced the BQ rejects the Williams Way, seeking "not tolerance and diversity, but intolerance and conformity"? Do you have any idea how many campus leaders live in the BQ? President of College Council, director of WCFM, chairperson of Gargoyle Society (nine of 21 Gargoyles live in the BQ), editors from the Record and the Literary Review, leaders of the BSU, GLU, Feminist Alliance, Lehman Services, Cap & Bells, the alcohol awareness group, two film societies, Newman Association—excepting athletics, the BQ students make contributions to Williams which no other area on campus can touch.

You say your difference with the BQ residents is a difference of values. I got news for you: students at this school have consistently chosen their BQ peers to represent those values.

This said, I agree with you, the BQ isolates itself too much. You exaggerate the isolation quite a bit, as I hope I've just shown. But it's easy to come to Williams, get absorbed in your work, and deny the personality differences we hld in high school. A lot of us do this in the BQ. We eat in Driscoll all the time. We decide Williams is a mecca of conformists and greedy up-and-comers. We use someone like you to reconfirm our preconceptions. While Mission and Greylock generalize about us—bohos, homos, geeks—we generalize about them.

All this is really stupid. It's a problem of the whole school. In Driscoll or in Mission, it's awkward to suddenly sit with people you don't know, to introduce yourself, to meet new people. Most of us are Northeastern Americans—so by nature, we're uptight. I don't mean to ride you too hard, Hart (it's just that so many people said your letter was intelligent!). We should try to break down our personal barriers, before we assume you're the source of our problems.

Hot Dogs....Karelis' job....Fulbright Scholar

Weiner Contest

This weekend, six Williams College students will face off against a team from North Adams State College in a hotly contested eating competition.

The hot dog eating contest to see which college can cut the mustard will take place this Saturday at 1:30 p.m. outside Jack's hot dog shop in North Adams.

Organizers predict that more than 800 spectators will come to watch the teams consume as many hot dogs in 30 minutes as they can, according to the Transcript.

Members of the Williams team, all Club Bacchus members, are Matt Glauniger '85, Chris Acker '85, Greg Taylor '86, Peter Dawson '86, Taylor Watts '87 and David Crompton '88.

Williams initially had some difficulty coming up with a team. "I guess I talked too much," Acker told the Transcript. "I thought there would be no problem getting enough guys together. But I talked to 20 football players and lots of other guys, and nobody's interested."

Acker turned over responsibility for finding a team to Club Bacchus, however, and the team was formed.

Karelis Corralled

Charles Karelis, chairman of the philosophy department, will leave Williams to work in the Department of Education next year. Karelis, a 1967 graduate of Williams, said that he will serve as a policy advisor to William Bennett '65, secretary of the department.

"I'm looking forward to this very much," Karelis, who has been at Williams since 1972, said of the move to Washington. He added that his job would entail advising Bennett on policy decisions and also on how to present these decisions to the public.

Karelis said that he was approached by the department and would spend at least next year working with Secretary Bennett. He noted, however that he was looking forward to returning to his post at Williams.

He said that his experiences in Washington would be a plus to his work at Williams, "I'll be able to convey some of my concrete experiences."

Fulbright named

Chris Varrone '85 has been awarded a Fulbright scholarship grant, by the Board of Foreign Scholarships and the United States Information Agency.

Varrone, a political philosophy major, says he plans to use the grant to study international relations at the Institute of Politics and the Peace Research Institute at the University of Oslo, Norway, from August until May of next year. He will then move on to Cambridge University in England to continue his graduate studies.

move now. Investments in making changes to the interior of the building are needed, but should not be undertaken until the building has been moved. The College has promised the Log to groups for the summer, but these groups could be accomodated elsewhere on campus given the magnitude of the impact of any change of the Log on undergraduate life.

The administration has accurately noted the pressing necessity for a decision. It is unfortunate that they have limited themselves to the two options presented last Friday. Moving the Log to the center of campus is logistically and technically feasible, sensible, and affordable. This option has been discounted too early, but is still the best choice for all parties concerned and demands serious consideration.

Fix will be next dean

by Mark Young

Williams President John W. Chandler announced last week that Stephen Fix, assistant professor of English, has been named dean of the College. Fix will fill the vacancy left by Daniel O'Connor, who resigned his position in order to serve as resident director of the Williams-in-Oxford Program.

"I view the deanship as both an administrative and an educational job," said Fix. "I am interested in the discussion of ways to integrate student life in the classroom and out. What I hope to do as dean will be an extension of what I try to do in the classroom."

According to Fix, his role will deal with overseeing the academic and social aspects of student life at Williams while maintaining his responsibilities to the faculty. Some of the issues which may confront him next year include the freshmen inclusion process, the future of the Log, and the Williams Bookstore.

John F. Reichert, dean of the faculty, said that "Fix has the humor, the patience, the inventiveness and the good judgement that the job requires." "Professor Fix is very popular among his students," Thomas Kuntz '86 said. "The student body is happy he will be the next dean."

"He is deeply committed to the purposes of Williams as a residential college, and as dean he will shape programs that will create an even better environment for the intellectual development and overall growth of students," Chandler said.

Fix has taught English at Williams since 1979 and was recently promoted to the tenured position of associate professor. His specialties are the Restoration, eighteenth century English literature and Samuel Johnson, and he expects to teach one course each year during his three-year term

Inter-campus plan heard

by Tom Ewing

A proposal submitted to College Council last week by Sandra Burton, the coordinator of dance at Williams, calls for initiative to draw together the four colleges in the Northern Berkshire area.

The goal of the proposal is to allow students from Williams, Bennington, North Adams State and Berkshire Community Colleges to pool their resources in order to provide greater social and cultural opportunities, explained Burton. Burton said that she hoped College Council would undertake the responsibility of setting up a network among student governments.

"The possibilities are endless," said Burton. But she also warned, "This is work. It involves responsibility. It takes planning." College Council agreed to give the proposal serious consideration.

In other business, Cliff Favrot '87 reported that Lawrence Wright, director of the Computer Center, told the Freshman Inclusion Committee that it would be impossible to maximize first choices and simultaneously minimize last choices.

Favrot brought up the possibility of creating co-ed entries in East and Fayerweather in order to make the Berkshire Quad more appealing to freshmen. The reaction to this proposal was generally negative, as members felt that complaints about East and Fayerweather could not be solved by making them into co-ed entries. Freshmen housing proposals will be discussed in greater detail at next Thursday's council meeting.

Class of '89 looks big

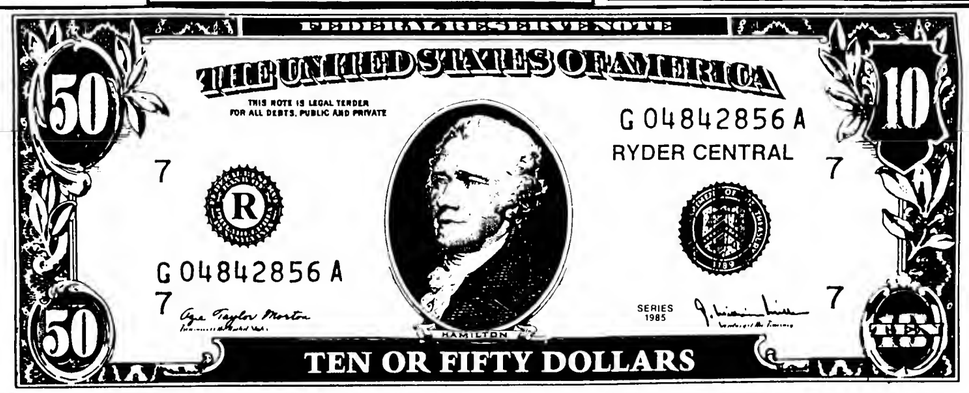
by Harwell Wells

Williams will not draw students from its admissions wait list this year, as an extraordinary response to acceptance letters has filled all the places for the class of 1989.

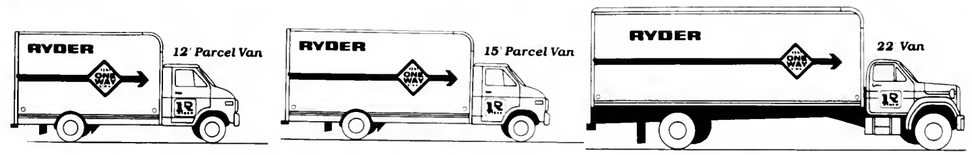
Williams accepted 1204 students out of the 4683 applicants this year. As of Saturday, 527 of these students had sent in deposits for admission, including 22 who had deferred admission from 1984. The number of people not responding was slightly less than 100, a figure lower than the total number who never responded in 1984.

Earlier, Director of Admissions Philip Smith stated that he felt an ideal number of students accepting admission to Williams would be 520,which he expected would be "melted down" by acceptances elsewhere and deferred admission over the summer into a class of 506 matriculating.

On Saturday, Smith stated that 527 was well within the acceptable number.



Smith cited an extraordinary turnout for the two prefreshman orientation weekends, over 50% of the recently accepted applicants, as a major reason for his not having to draw from the wait list this year. Over 100 attended the first weekend, and over 200 the second.



"We're sitting fat and happy," commented Smith. "The class of 1989 is just an excellent group."

Film Society provides cheap fun in the dark

by Eric Hanson

These days you can't get much of anything for a dollar. Especially a ticket to a good movie. Over the years, however, the Williams Film Society has maintained a tradition of bringing a variety of quality motion pictures to campus for the very affordable cost of $1.

Composed entirely of students, the Society sponsors the weekly showing of movies on Friday evenings (with occasional Saturday matinees) in the auditorium of the Bronfman Science Center. As a non-profit organization that is not financially supported by any outside group, the Film Society depends entirely on the income from ticket sales for its livelihood.

Recently, however, this livelihood has not been so lively. The inevitable increase in the cost of leasing movies from distributors has given the Society a newer tradition of indebtedness to go with its reputation of providing bargains for moviegoers. These costs, in addition to the existing debt that is passed on in the organization from year to year, have made it almost impossible for the Society to break even when showing an average movie unless it fills the house for each of the time slots.

In an effort to combat the snow-balling problem of debt, the Society will raise the cost of admission for most movies in the coming season to $1.50. The change is viewed almost unanimously by the members as an essential first step toward a more healthy financial status. Current Co-President Nate Lebowitz '86 stated, "It should have been changed much earlier." He sees no alternative to raising admission prices, although he admitted, "We took a lot of pride in showing good movies for just $1."

The problem does not seem to stem from deficiencies in the performance of the Film Society itself. Lesley Feltman '85, the group's treasurer, cited the increased advertising and promotional efforts of the organization in defending her view that the Society itself is not to be blamed for its financial woes. "I really don't know what we're doing wrong," she

Pub owner has tonic for all ales

by Annie Cordova

Tucked away in a little niche just off the intersection of Spring and Bank Streets stands one of Williamstown's favorite gathering places: Mary K. Michel's Purple Pub. Termed by Michel as "a place to gather for everyone," the Pub offers numerous activities appealing to drinkers and non-drinkers alike, including both Williams College students and Williamstown residents.

Not only is the Pub a place to enjoy after-work beer or cocktails on any night of the week, it's also the place to go on Fridays for a hearty sandwich and a friendly game of Trivial Pursuit (or one of the other various games that one can ask for from behind the Pub's bar). No coats or ties are required at the Pub, where attire ranges from collegiate wear to the muddy boots and Levi's worn by the construction workers from the new Williams gym site.

The Purple Pub opens its doors to properly aged mixed drinkers. (Plonsker)

Mixed drinkers

Michel's business depends on the patronage of the inhabitants of Williamstown as well as on that of the students. She has a positive attitude toward the Williams College community and believes that the townspeople mix well with the students. Michel referred to this intermingling as "a good challenge" for both parties. Michel also admitted that she has noticed a steady improvement in the behavior of Williams students over the last three years. "The students are much more reserved and pleasant to be with," she said.

Michel spends a great deal of time associating with her customers as well as dealing with the business aspects of running the Pub. Michel herself throws an annual good-bye party for seniors on the morning of their graduation. Called "Mary's Bloody Good-bye," all graduating seniors are invited to an open bar party at the Pub preceding the morning's activities.

New laws

One element that will directly affect the Pub, its patrons, and Michel herself is the new Massachusetts statute on the drinking age, which will raise the legal minimum to twenty-one. Michel is working on a policy to incorporate everyone into the social life at the Pub while at the same time respecting the law. "Liquor liability is frightening," she said. "We all have to be responsible for our own lives."

Although Michel presently possesses liquor liability insurance, which protects her from lawsuits, the increase in the

by Chris Finch

To most Williams students, Hopkins Memorial Forest represents little more than a name and location somewhere just to the west of campus. While many have intentions to visit at some point during their stay at Williams, Hopkins Forest is a destination seldom reached during most students' busy years of campus life.

To many, Hopkins Forest is the mysterious realm of "hard-core" Division III field researchers and "granolas" (a term applied to environmentalists, Outing Club members, and just about anyone else who enjoys being out-of-doors and off concrete at the same time). Yet for those who do manage the 1½-mile trek out to the forest, a new dimension is often added to their Williams experience.

Located just up Route 7 and at the end of Bulkley Street, Hopkins Forest encompasses over 2200 acres of the eastern slopes of the Taconic Range, extending from Northwest Hill Road up to the Taconic Crest and including small sections of New York and Vermont states. For the most part uncut and relatively undisturbed during the last 50 years, Hopkins Forest today provides an ideal setting for scientific field research, outdoor enthusiasts, recreationists, and people just looking for a change of pace.

Presence of past

Despite its seemingly virginal wilderness, the forest, like many of New England's woodlands, conveys to those who invade it a haunting sense of the past—an eerie sensation that someone has been there before, a long time ago.

Often these feelings of the past have a "rational" explanation. Explained Nan Jenks-Jay, the resident caretaker of the forest and assistant director of the Center for Environmental Studies (CES), "You've been walking in the woods for a couple hours and all of a sudden you come across a stone row or an old overgrown orchard and you think, 'Someone used to live around here.'"

Where trees that seem to be permanent fixtures of the land stand today, a hundred years ago one would have looked upon a much different scene, perhaps with sheep grazing in an open pasture, or a barn noisy with the sounds of farm life.

Much of the land in what today is Hopkins Forest was first cleared in the 1760's when British settlers began moving into the region with intentions of carving an existence out of the wilderness. In places that today would never be considered for agriculture, the early settlers cleared small plots of land on often steeply sloping, marginal lands and eked out a tenuous livelihood from subsistence farming, relying on small crops, sheep grazing, and game hunting to provide nearly all of their food.

"It's unbelieveable that people could have managed on some of the sites that they did," said Hopkins Forest Director and biology department Chairman Henry Art. He also explained that around a hundred different sites have been used for agriculture in the region now known as the forest.

Here's looking at ewe, kid: sheep reared at Hopkins Forest graze in front of the Rosenburg Center, the one-time carriage barn of Amos L. Hopkins. (Wang)

A forest and a gentleman

The small-farm tendency of the region was destined for change with the return to Williamstown of Amos Lawrence Hopkins, the son of famous Williams president Mark Hopkins. With money he had earned mostly by working in the railroad business, Hopkins bought up and consolidaed many of the small farms into a large "gentleman's farm," an enterprise uncommon in New England.

By 1910, Hopkins had acquired 1635 acres of land in the "forest," built a 36-room mansion, fenced the land up to the 1400-foot contour, and employed 12 regular and 10 seasonal workers annually to raise and market dairy products, wool, meat, and cash crop vegetables.

Following Hopkins' death in 1912, his widow continued operating the farm until 1924 and eventually donated it to the college in 1934. The college subsequently deeded the land to the U.S. Forest Service for one dol-

'The Bacchae' viewed as deeply moving play

by JB Bird

In Euripides' play The Bacchae, assistant professor of theatre Michael Knight tackled one of the deepest texts Williamstheatre has done in the last three years; where he succeeded, he attacked the audience on a barrage of levels: composition, symbol, character, and sound.

Knight grafted an eclectic political message onto the play, allying the evil government characters with repression, intolerance, and Nazism, and the oppressed characters with Third World liberation, sexual tolerance, and love. This framework did not free all the text's subtleties, especially toward the end, where the two major dramatic turns rang false.

But Knight's orchestration was often subtle and beautiful. He evoked personal and excellent performances from many of his primaries, who included three of our most accomplished seniors: Clark Baim, Gordon Compton, and Ana Deboo.

In the play the god Dionysos finds Thebes in the grip of Pentheus (Cam Smith '86) and his henchmen. Dionysos proclaims a new order, whose keywords are duality and circularity. Tiresias (Clark Baim '85), the seer of Thebes, and later the manifestation of Dionysos, warn Pentheus to heed the god— but to no avail. Finally, Pentheus gets his comeuppance: Dionysos arranges things so his own mother, Agave (Deboo), rips Pentheus into shreds during a baccanalian rite.

The Bacchae reaches its emotional heights when the audience sees a justly warned Pentheus—who pursues order at the expense of nature—undone as much by his inner blindness as by Dionysos. Smith gave his fiercest, most satisfying MainStage performance, achieving both comedy and pathos. Unfortunately, Knight made his fascism too automatic; particularly at transitions, the audience struggled to register the build-up of torment and self-righteousness within Pentheus.

The group scenes had similar problems. The chorus displayed certain emotions, but not always the small realizations that preceded the emotions. Sandra Burton's choreography, which combined African and American jazz styles, countered this when possible.

Knight was at his best when isolating gestures and composing individuals on another excellent MainStage set (by Arden Fingerhut). He orchestrated well— stunning entrances, Kweyao Agyapon's musical themes, the slave groups over the stage.

The Dionysian themes came out in Knight's ritual structure and his use of two actors (Bruce Bullock '86 and Joanna Adler '86) to play the god. Unfortunately, both tactics obscured the play's opening. The ritualistic invocation did not jibe with the first scenes of Thebes' enslavement. Knight had Adler and Bullock begin in monotone unison, addressing the audience, who largely missed the god's emotional involvement, the anger that drives the play.

Elsewhere, the duality worked wonderfully, as when Adler described Pentheus' death while Bullock acted it out. At such junctures The Bacchae dripped with beautiful, even moving moments: Agave's slow realization that she had killed her son, Craig Breon '87 (who with Smith and George Prescott '87 completes the triumvirate of MainStage fascists) mourning the loss of his master. Pretty hot for the school play.

Tom Vitale '86, co-president for the coming year, maintained that "$1.50 for a good movie is still very cheap." Feltman agreed, insisting, "People are reasonable enough that, if we get decent films, we'll still have a good enough crowd." Member Naomi Wolford '86 also concurred but is a little more pessimistic about the public's initial response. "I'm sure people will complain," she predicted, "but they'll realize that it's still a good deal."

Variety

Feltman even suggested that "the $1.50 price will give us a little more freedom" in choosing the films to be shown in the coming year. She believes that the small increase in the amount of money gained from higher admission prices will enable the Society to consider some newer (and more expensive) movies, which previously would have been potentially disastrous to show from an economic standpoint.

"The commitment to variety is a basic foundation of the Film Society's attitude toward choosing the movies. While Feltman recognized the "freedom" that the price increase can give the group, she is wary about taking it all too far. "Sometimes, to get a little variety," she pointed out, "it seems like we're sacrificing attendance."

Wolford agreed that the price change will limit the Society's options in some ways. "The change is not necessarily going to cut down on the variety of the films. The variety will still be there, we just won't be sticking our necks out as much," she explained, adding, "The emphasis next year will definitely be on films we know will at least break even."

Lebowitz agreed that there is a problem, but insisted, "We can't go overboard; the debt shouldn't be our main guiding point." He substantiated this belief by citing the uniqueness of the Film Society, saying, "Our job is to keep up a varied atmosphere, to appeal to all sorts of groups on campus. We're the only film organization on campus that has that broad a scope."

Since "variety" means different things to different people, debates, and often heated ones, are commonplace at the Film Society's meetings. Each member has his favorite films and will go to any length to convince the group that they fit into that year's overall collection. Lebowitz, for instance, has tried every year he has been a member to get the controversial "Road Warrior" approved, and has yet to be successful. "This year I'm going to push it through," he stated convincingly.

"You can usually tell what type of movies certain people will always stick up for," said Wolford. Usually, each film that is being considered is given a preliminary vote. If there is considerable disagreement, a discussion session follows before the final vote. Wolford has an interesting strategy in promoting her favorites. "Once everybody starts relaxing," she explained, "you just start yelling. They yell back and then you vote. It's a lot of fun actually."

Because of a clause in the property deed, Hopkins Forest reverted to the college when the Forest Service discontinued its small research station in 1968. Coincidentally, that same year, CES opened at Williams.

When Art was hired two years later, mostly for his ecology background, the college was looking towards Mt. Hope Farm as a future environmental field research location, and had planned to either develop or sell most of the Hopkins Forest property. At that time Art was the resident caretaker, and with an original intention of doing a study on aspens, he looked to the forest to do his research.

In the process, however, Art found a great amount of vegetational data that had been gathered by the Forest Service. Another valuable resource was found in Arthur Rosenburg, a life-long resident of the Williamstown area, who had worked as a farmhand for Hopkins and remained as a caretaker until the Forest Service took over.

Realizing the value of the property for scientific and historic research, Art shifted the attention to environmental education to the forest and urged, along with others in CES, that the forest land rather than Mt. Hope be used for research. By the end of 1970, President Sawyer agreed and most of the previous development plans were altered.

Since then, the property has increased through private donations, such as the Beinecke tract, and small college purchases, including the Moon-Primmer lot, which through the years had remained a private holding in the center of the property.

Next week The Record will present Part II of the saga of Hopkins Forest, featuring the research and recreational opportunities it offers today.

drinking age may cause the state to disallow this insurance, thus making each owner responsible for the actions of his or her patrons.

Even now, Michel is a firm believer that "you don't drink and drive" and sees to it herself that people who are too drunk to get themselves home stay at the Pub for a while, without drinking, to sober up. Not only is Michel worried about the legal consequences of drunk driving, she also doesn't want to see anyone injured.

The Pub also has a bouncer at the door seven nights a week who is responsible for checking identification and birthdates. This system, however, is not completely fool-proof; people do get through. Michel fears the situation of an accident involving someone who gets into the Pub using a fake I.D. Although both parties would be at fault—the Pub unintentionally—the Pub would most likely get slapped with the lawsuit. "I'm not ready to lose my house," Michel asserted.

The increase in the legal drinking age will have a direct effect on the Pub's business, especially if the Log is either not functioning or not drawing its usual crowd of people. One of the busiest times for the Pub has traditionally been after midnight—closing time at the Log—when there is a great influx of Williams students from the Log to the Pub. Also, the vast majority of Williams students who will be able to attend the Pub next year will be seniors, instead of this year's conglomoration of mostly juniors and seniors.

Michel claimed that this potential decline in business doesn't really scare her. "I'm not out to make a million," she noted. "I just want to get by, like everybody else."

Jazz Ensemble plays sr.'s thesis

This Sunday night at 8:00, the Williams College Jazz Ensemble will give its final performance of the year at Chapin Hall, playing tunes composed by Pete Anthony '85 for his senior thesis. The concert will feature straight-ahead jazz, including big band jazz and small group combos.

Anthony's tunes, which he termed as "oriented toward a commercial audienee," include: "Rustic Dusk," "Hittin," "J.B.'s Blues," "4943 Libbit," and "Mish Ma'hool."

According to trumpeter Dave Levy '85, "Most of the tunes are in the tradition of the type of music we've always played." He added that Sunday's performance, which will also include several published tunes, will be the farewell concert for the Ensemble's senior members.

The Ensemble, directed by Music Professor Dan Gutwein, consists of four trombones, four trumpets, six saxophones, piano, bass, and drums. The Berkshire Big Band, a regional jazz group, will perform during the second half of the concert.

Log dispute

Flavored Perrier

Chick proposed adding "good quality food, primo ingredients, finger foods, trendy items" to the Log. He also discussed entertainment such as open mike nights, comedy, music, continued use of the wide screen television for sporting events and movies and, perhaps, soap opera afternoons. In his proposal the beverages will be alcohol-free, non-alcoholic beer and flavored Perrier.

Log manager, Charlie Mitchell '84, is in favor of eliminating alcohol at the Log. He feels that if the experiment with keeping it fails, students will be more upset than if it was taken away at the beginning of the year. He said that he would rather have beer and wine added sometime after the Log opens in the fall.

According to CUL member Jan Van Eck '85, "A large constituency will be really turned off by the Log without alcohol." Fellow CUL member and Log Committee Chairman Shannon McKeen, '85 suggested that the administration give the students the responsibility and the chance to handle the drinking age.

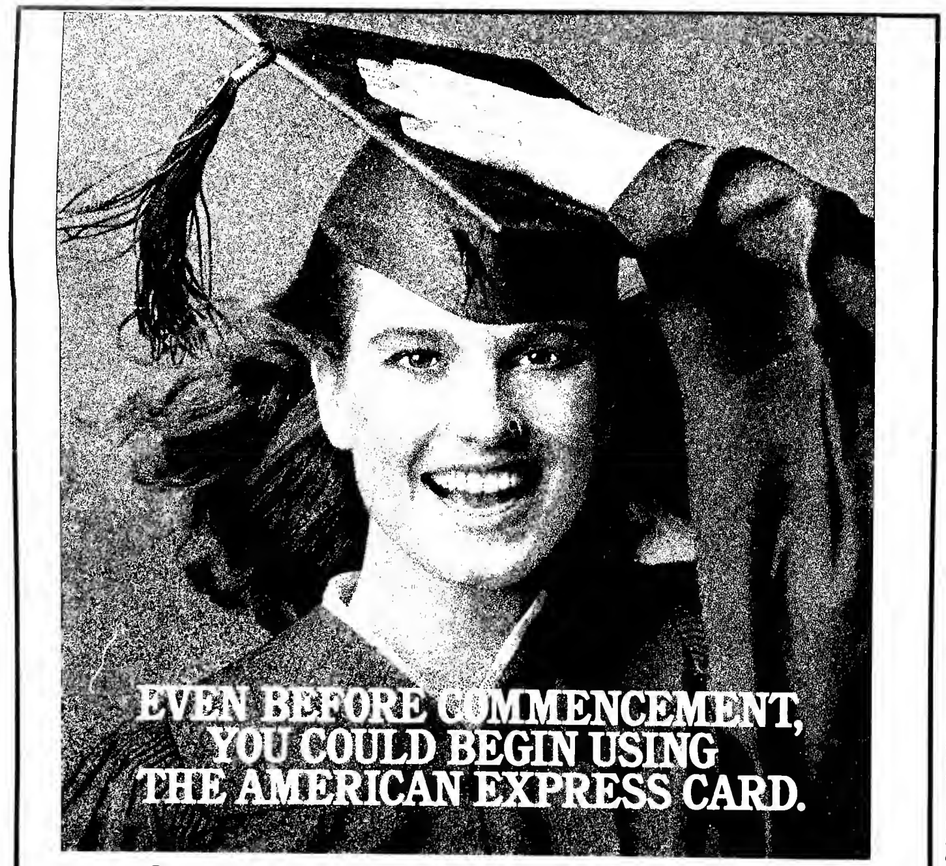
At the College Council meeting Thursday night, a resolution was passed 31-1, which recommended that the administration keep alcohol at the Log but also explore other options of food and entertainment.

Dean Daniel O'Connor met with CC President Anza Mammen '86 and said that restricting alcohol at the Log was not a step toward restricting alcohol on campus. William Valerio '85 was still concerned about additional traffic to Vermont where the drinking age remains 18. "The Log is a very, very important center on campus," he said.

Campus input

The CUL held an all-campus meeting last Friday to discuss the future of the Log. College officials present included O'Connor, CUL Chairman William Darrow, incoming Dean of the College Stephen Fix, Hodgkins and Kowitz. At the end of the discussion a straw vote was taken affirming the CC decision to keep alcohol at the Log.

O'Connor said he feels there are only two options, eliminating alcohol or limiting the sale of beer and wine to those at least 21 years old. O'Connor said he is not considering what he called "the unreal option, the impossible option, to continue as before."



O'Connor said that he sees the need for a large social space on campus but feels taking alcohol away is the safest thing to do. He calls continuing alcohol service at the Log "the risky option." I.D.'s would be checked at the bar and no pitchers would be served. In addition, the bartender would be a non-student employee.

The students present felt that they could handle the change in the Log but were also concerned about increased drinking in dorms and more trips to other bars or Vermont.

At the end of the meeting it was agreed that the changes would hurt attendance at the Log initially but in two to three years few people will remain at Williams who remember the Log as it is now. McKeen said, "The key is we're aiming long term."

Yesterday the CUL voted to keep alcohol at the Log, but, they recommended a two drink limit, and the possibility of moving the Log

The adminstration is likely to make its decision tomorrow when O'Connor, Fix, President John Chandler and others will meet to discuss the Log.

Undefeated golf 6th in NE

by Rick Orlnk

Senior co-captains Mike Hennigan and Chris Harned led the golf team to a sixth-place finish in the New England Championships on April 29 and 30. Hennigan placed third individually with a two-day total of 150, only one stroke behind the leaders, while Harned shot a 155 to earn a tenth-place finish. Williams trailed the winner University of Hartford by 24 strokes, but only seven shots separated the Ephs from the third place team.

Hennigan put together rounds of 80 and 70 for his third-place finish, earning an invitation to the Division III Championships on May 14-17 in Rochester. Harned registered rounds of 84 and 71 to place. Sophomores Chas Foehl and Guy Kurtz, along with freshman John Kucich, shot totals of 167, 166, and 171 respectively, to round out Williams' top five entries. Fochi's showing included a hole-in-one on the second hole on Tuesday. "I think the team played very well overall," said coach Rick Pohle.

Div. I teams fall

On Thursday, Harned led the team back to their winning ways, beating Divsion I powerhouses Harvard and Holy Cross in match play at the Taconic Golf Club to raise their record to 7-0.

For the third time this season, Harned gathered Medalist honors with his two over par 73. Birdies on the 15th and 18th holes sparked his strong finish. The team finished 18 strokes ahead of Harvard and 40 stroked ahead of undermanned Holy Cross.

Harned was not the only Eph golfer to score well. Hennigan and Foehl registered 75's, while sophomore Bob Sullivan shot a 77 and Kucich shot an 82. "I was tremendously pleased with the team's play today. The squad as a whole showed its fine depth and balance against two tough Division I teams. If the team plays as well as it did today, I think we can win the NESCAC's."

The NESCAC's were played Sunday and Monday, but results were not available at press time. Tomorrow the team travels to Wesleyan for the Little Three championships.

Two tracksters to Nationals

by William Gillanders

On Saturday, qualifying members of the men's track team went to Westfield to compete in the Division III New England championship. Their individual performance can only be described as stunning: three school records were broken as two qualified to compete again at the national level.

Sophomore Brandt Johnson, unable to compete earlier in the season because of a injured knee, easily clered 6'9 1/2" in the high jump, breaking the school record and qualifying to go to nationals.

While Johnson took first place, senior co-captain Paul Toland was also impressive, taking a fifth place for Williams, jumping 6'3". Junior John Ellison, competing in the 3000m steeplechase, was not to be forgotten, as he raced his way to third place. His time of 9:13.5 broke the school record, and will allow him to compete at the nationals.

Others who scored for Williams were Andre Lopez '87, who ran 49.1 in the 400m sprint and placed second overall, and Kevin Jenkins, senior co-captain, who took third in the 800 meter run with a time of 1:52.5, also a new record.

Other individual qualifiers were Ken Alleyne '88, who competed in the long jump and 200m, and Joe McGinn, who threw the hammer. As a team, the Ephmen were also able to place in both the 4x100m relay, and the 4x400m relay, taking fifth and fourth places respectively.

Crew

by Mary Taylor

The Williams crew completed their regular season on Saturday with 1800m races against Trinity, Ithaca, Marist, and Union in New Preston, Connecticut on Saturday.

The sole winning boat was the powerhouse women's varsity eight, who recorded a time of 7:25 to run their season record to 8-4. The men's varsity eight lost by inches to Trinity, after falling behind in the last few strokes.

The men's varsity four lost their first race of the season in finishing second to Ithaca, while the men's varsity heavies lost but still have a 9-2 season record.

This regatta followed the team's only home race last weekend, where the women swamped Lowell while the men's four beat UMass in a regatta at Onata Lake in Pittsfield.

The Williams teams will travel to their final races of the yera at the Dad Vail regatta in Philadelphia on Friday and Saturday.

Ruggers

by Helen Kaulbach

Saturday was a day for the Killer B's. Following tradition, Williams and Amherst agreed to bet team shirts. In a stunning victory, the Ephwomen scored two tries for a game total of eight points and fifteen shirts.

Sophomore Steph Jacon was the leader of the pack until an injury pulled her out of the game. Ten minutes into the game, Williams found themselves in a ruck ten yards from the try zone. The ball was passed to Jacon who smashed through the opponents and dove to the try line for four points.

Determined to keep Williams ahead, powerhouse Jacon scored a second try in an amazing play fifteen minutes later. The ball was passed to scrum-half Jacon from a lineout. Running thirty yards across the pitch, Jacon sprinted past the confounded Lady Jeffs and proceeded ten yards up the pitch to put the ball down in the try zone.

During the second half, Williams maintained their eight-point lead despite the efforts of the Defectors. Credit should be given to the scrum, which consistently won the scrumdowns, broke through the lineouts, and tackled the Lady Jeffs. Kerry Culien '87, Helen Kaulbach '85, and Lauren Waine 'Ex were all in excellent form. Fullback Anne Marie Plankey '87 amazed the team with her powerful kicks.

There was no reward of team shirts for the A-side women. Despite an overtime ten-minute play, the 0-0 tie could not be broken in the evenly-matched game. The line displayed perfect ball-handling and tackling technique, but this wasn't enough to score against the Lady Jeffs. The scrum was strong and right on the plays. The first half was clearly dominated by the Ephwomen, yet in the second half, Williams found themselves on defense for most of the half hour.

Softball

by E. Tom Ewing

The softball team swept a doubleheader from the Wesleyan Cardinals on Saturday, 16-3 and 21-20. The first game was stopped after six innings when Williams was up by 15 runs. Karen Montzka '85 started the game and was the winning pitcher; Kathy Oehling '87 came in to pitch the final innings.

In the second game, Williams jumped out to an early lead and dominated the game through four innings. The Cardinals came back from a 19-13 deficit to go ahead 20-19 heading into the seventh inning. Williams brought in Montzka to pitch the last two innings. In the bottom of the seventh inning, Wesleyan gave up four walks, two with the bases loaded, and Williams literally walked off with the 21-20 win.

Last Tuesday, Williams beat RPI 8-6, before falling to Trinity 3-1 on Thursday. Tomorrow they will travel to North Adams for a 4:00 contest before hosting a return matchup with the Mohawks next week.

fered a 13-3 loss to tenth-ranked Middlebury. Sophomore Rob Miller picked up two goals in the losing effort.

Coach Renzi Lamb was pleased with his team's performance nontheless. Said Lamb, "Middlebury is a national program. We played sensationally and at the top of our ability; there was quite simply nothing we could do."

The Ephmen brought themselves to within three of the Panthers in the third period. Patterson, on a fast break, laterraled the ball to sophomore Matt Salisbury who snuck it by the goalie in a picture-perfect effort. This narrowed the score to 6-3, but Middlebury was to score seven more unanswered goals before the end of the game.

Tennis wins NESCACs, Little 3

Top-ranked in NE

by Cliff Peale

All of their other goals have been realized—a Little Three title, a NESCAC championship, and victories against traditional rivals Tufts, Trinity, and Middlebury. With that in mind, the tennis team takes dead aim at an undefeated season this week.

They gained that opportunity with great doubles play last weekend to justify their number-one ranking in New England with a NESCAC title, and then played their best overall match on Saturday to take a 8-1 victory over Wesleyan, their eighth without a loss, and the Little Three crown.

In four of their matches this year, the Ephs have relied on doubles to clinch the victory. Last Tuesday they tested that theory to the limit, falling behind Albany 4-2 after the singles before rallying to take all three doubles, the last when senior Andy Canning and sophomore Kevin Callanan pulled out a 6-2 third set to win the final doubles match.

The top three of seniors Craig Hammond and Tim Rives along with Callanan have provided the strength of the singles lineup, but on Saturday the number four, five, and six players all won against Cardinal opponents to complete a sweep of the singles. Chris Clarey '86, Tim Peterson '86, and Chris Meyers '87 won in straight sets to complement easy victories by the top three. "I think this match was a turning point for Clarey, Peterson, and Meyers," said Coach Sean Sloane, "they became veterans today."

Powerhouse doubles team

In doubles, only the top pair of Rives and Hammond played their regular position. Heading for the Division III nationals in two weeks as a result of their NESCAC victory, they showed their incredible potential in spots for a 6-3, 6-0 victory. They dominated the net, using their height well, and showing their experience as four-year varsity veterans. "Tim and Craig will always play consistently well for us," said Sloane.

At number two doubles, Canning teamed with Hart Hodges '85, and they fell in a tough match, serving inconsistently in a 7-6, 3-6, 6-4 loss. Freshmen Robby Hallagan and Hoyt Ludington finished up the rout with a 6-3, 6-1 victory at number three.

"The conditions were lousy," commented Sloane. "But I think we showed the poise of a good team."

The poise of this team couldn't be denied after last weekend, when they got excellent singles performances from Callanan, Rives, and Meyers and swept the doubles to top Amherst and Tufts for the NESCAC title at Middlebury. Callanan had the best showing, reaching the finals of his flight. He had the lead in a first set tiebreaker before tightening up and falling 7-6, 6-2 in that final match.

Fittingly, the doubles teams wrapped up the tournament. Hammond-Rives at number one, Clarey-Peterson at number two, and Canning-Callanan at number three proved that doubles is the backbone of this team.

"Tough competitors"

Sloane commented on the season: "Our major ambition was to improve as players; I think we've done that." But it was left to captain Hammond to capture the sense of satisfaction that surrounded the courts after the destruction of Wesleyan. "We're not any more talented then we've been before," he said, "but we're a spirited team, we're tough competitors, and we play hard in tough matches."

The Ephs face Union at home on Thursday before facing a road test on Saturday at MIT to end the season.

Jeffs sweep baseball

by John Clayton

Junior right-hander Kevin Morris pitched a no-hitter through seven innings but was tagged with a 1-0 loss as Amherst swept a doubleheader from the baseball team on Saturday. The Ephs now stand 6-15.

"It's a crime for a kid to pitch like that and lose," coach Bob Coakley. "You can't pitch any better than Kevin did. This is the fourth consecutive game that he got no support."

Morris, now 3-5, blanked the Lord Jeffs for the seven regulation innings of the first game, but was matched by Amherst's John Nimons, who pitched two-hit shutout ball through six innings.

Morris struck out five while walking two; and Nimons had eight K's while issuing two freebies. Nimons threw a nine-inning one-hitter against the Ephmen earlier in the year.

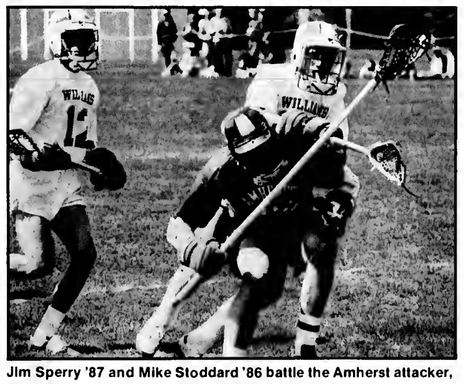
In the seventh, a blooper by senior Mike Coakley and a walk to junior Rob Coakley loaded the bases with one one, but sophomore John Shaw grounded into a double-play to send the game into extra innings. Shaw had gotten the only other hit off Nimons, an infield single in the third.

In the top of the the eighth, Jeff DH Bob Foote doubled down the right field line to break up the no-hitter. After he was sacrificed to third, Jeff Templeton's hit bounced off Morris, and when the pitcher couldn't locate the ball, Foote raced home with the winning run.

In the bottom of the eighth, freshman Jim Duquette reached on a fielder's choice and stole second. Junior Dick Hollington nubbed a ball down the third base line that never went foul, sending Duquette to third. But Rick Hedeman '87 looked at a third strike to end the game.

Second game

"The second game was a mental letdown," said Coakley. Amherst reached freshman Scott Garfield for three runs in the first inning.



Junior Pieter Mulder came in to quiet the Jeff bats, pitching five and one-third innings while allowing three runs on eight hits, striking out four. Bob Hussey '86 pitched the final inning.

Williams scored its run in the second when Hedeman reached on a fielder's choice, advanced to third on a double by senior DH Phil Lusardi, and scored on a sacrifice fly by sophomore Tim McKone. Coakley praised Mulder's relief work and the defensive play of frehman Lewis Collins at shortstop.

On Wednesday, the Ephs broke the game open with six runs in the fourth inning to defeat Middlebury 20-8. The win broke a nine-game losing streak.

Sophomore Seth Lawry (1-3) got the win for Williams. Rob Coakley led the offense with two homers, two doubles, and six rbi, and his brother Mike added a homer and three rbi; Chris Pachus was two for four with three rbi, and junior Jeff Lilley and Duquette had two hits and two rbi apiece.

Rob Coakley's three-run homer broke open a 4-1 game in the fourth, sending Middlebury down to its 15th loss against just three wins.

Amherst drops Laxmen

by Greg Keller and Andrew Smith

The lacrosse team fell to 4-4 this week with losses to talented squads from Amherst and Middlebury. On Saturday they lost to Amherst 16-8, giving the Jeffs the Little Three crown.

Freshman Jonathan Edie led all Eph scorers with two tallies. The Jeffs had jumped to a 4-0 lead before Edie netted his first unassisted marker. Amherst retaliated with five unanswered goals in the middle of the second period. Williams countered with less than five minutes left in the half when Steve Patterson '87 spun past his defender and fired a shot into the net. At 1:44 Matt Dunne '86 converted on a pass from Reese Hughes '85. Twenty seconds later Edie scored off the faceoff to cut the Amherst lead to five.

But the Jeffs silenced any hopes of a Williams comeback in the third period when they exploded with 22 shots on goal and four tallies. Overall Amherst outshot the Ephmen 42-24. Williams goalie Brad duPont '86 made 16 saves while Steve Forbes saved 12 in the Amherst net.

Rugby takes shirts of Little Three rivals

by Gene Mazzaro

The white dogs had their day as they swept Amherst and Wesleyan to capture the Little Three Championsips Saturday. The A-side defeated Wesleyan by the score of 8-0 before taking fifteen new shirts from Amherst (6-0) in the final match of the day. The B-side also spoiled a new wardrobe following their 9-3 victory over the Lord Jeffs, while the C-side crushed Wesleyan's B-side in a 44-0 rout. Finally, the D-side defeated Hotchkiss by the score of 10-0.

The A-side opened the day with a shutout over their rivals from Wesleyan. Williams controlled the play from the opening kick, constantly keeping the ball in Wesleyan territory. Late in the first half, captain Mark Evans '85 scored the first try of the day by breaking through the Cardinal line and running ten yards for the 10-0 lead. Williams seemed to break things open in the second half as Jon Stanley '87 and Steve Troyer '86 both reached the try zone. However, the referee called each try back on penalties.

Late in the game, the white pack capitalized on a Wesleyan error to score a second try. A dropped kick allowed Ed O'Toole '86 to gain possession of the ball deep in Cardinal territory. O'Toole gave the ball to Craig Blackmore '86 as the Ephs pushed forward. Finally, Mike Kolster '85 fell over the line to bring the final score to 8-0.

Battle against Jeffs

In their second match of the afternoon, the Ephs met their arch-rivals from Amherst in a fierce, but well-played battle. Williams received strong running from O'Toole, Evans, and Ken Deveaux '85 throughout the game, but could only push one try across the line.

Marty Davey '85 scored the winning try midway through the second half. Bob Ause '85 added the conversion to increase the Williams lead to 6-0. From that point on, the Ephs dominated the game as the Lord Jeffs never cleared the ball from their own half of the field as Williams secured the victory.

The B side also defeated the Lord Jeffs in a well-played contest. The white pack,led by Tom Dumphy '85, John Fetterolf '86, and Jeff Lifson '86, pushed the black scrum all over the pitch in the 9-3 victory. Dave Curry '85 scored his first try of the season in the first half to give Williams the lead. Tom Connolly '87 successfully added the conversion and a penalty kick to give the Ephs all the points they would need.

Strong play from linemen Craig Kirby '86, Mark Tompkins '87, and John Conlon '85 kept Amherst out of the try zone. Scrum-half Kurt Oeler '88 was also instrumental in the Williams victory.

C's take Cardinal shirts

The C side crushed the Wesleyan Bees in the most embarassing rout in Little Three history as Tim Latimore '86 played very well, scoring three trys and adding six conversions. The Killer C's scored early and often as Barton George '87 began the onslaught with the first try of the day. Dave Koota '87 was next to score, increasing the lead to 10-0. By halftime, Greg Bronson '86 and Latimore had each scored trys to ensure a 28-point lead.

The second session brought more Williams scoring as Bob Iseley '85, Latimore, and Bronson scored the push the count to 44-0. The match began a new tradition of lottery shirts with Wesleyan as well as Amherst and the WRFC sincerely hoping that this tradition becomes permanent.

In D side action, Williams beat Hotchkiss in a close, hard-fought game. Denis Newcomer '87 and Blake Martin '84 touched down trys against the visitors in the only scoring of the day. Pavlos Yeroulanos '88 and Mike Sullivan '88 also played very well for the Ehps as the proved victorious, 10-0.

Students arrested in Pittsfield

by R.P. DeMott and John McDermott

Police last Tuesday arrested five Williams students and nine others participating in a demonstration at the U.S. Marines recruiting office in the Pittsfield federal building. The sixteen defendents must appear in court May 23.

Charged with trespass after notice and later released on personal recognizance, the five students involved were Chris Mullen '85, Jim Lanza '86, Seth Rolland '86, Sara Bolton '87 and Elaine Freedman '87. The others arrested included Williams graduates Mark White '84 and David Yaskulka '84.

The group, protesting United States policy in Nicaragua, refused police requests to leave the Marine office, choosing instead to be arrested. The demonstration coinelded with similar civil disobedience actions in other cities.

District Court Judge James Dahoney accepted pleas of not guilty from the defendants. "You're all charged with a crime that is theoretically punishable by a jail term," bar advocate George B. Crane said. Crane told the Record that although the maximum sentence for the charge is 30 days in jail, it is more likely that the protesters would be fined instead.

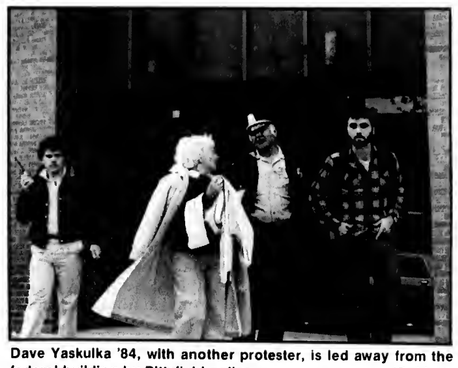
Crane also said that he was not sure whether or not the case would hold up in court because trespass in a federal facility might not be within the jurisdiction of the district court.

"Peace Education Center"

Organizer Yaskulka said that the group intended to transform the federal building into a "peace education center" for the day. At about two o'clock, the group walked into the Marine office and began to show slides from White's recent visit to Nicaragua. Marine Sergeant James Pow repeatedly asked them to leave. "It would be nice if you could just sit and see the slides," White replied.

"I hate to call the cops," Pow said, "but you know I have to." Pittsfield Police Officer James Sciola and a partner arrived at 2:50 and asked demonstrator James Moran, "You mean you all want to get arrested?"

"Yea, that's about it," Moran said, "for our lives." He and the others were then escorted to Berkshire District Court for arraignment.



"We were not planning to be disruptive," Yaskulka said, "but we were aware that we might violate some regulations.'

Day-long drama

About five hours earlier, the group met at the North Street shop of Susan Gordon, one of the those eventually arrested. "We really have not done this before. We don't know how it will work," she said. "The recruiters are very well trained. They're much better trained than we are."

The protestors were accompanied throughout the protest by a small group of supporters, including Williams students Jean Howe '85, Bill Stahl '86 and Blake Robison '88.

After arriving at the federal building, the demonstrators discussed their cause with recruiters, who listened to the protestors but said they could not discuss their opinions while in uniform. "Waste of time, waste of time," Marine recruiter E.A. Lodge said. Neither the Marine head recruiter, Donald Dobos, nor the Army, Air Force, Navy and National Guard representatives would make a statement, and some were hesitant to give their names.

Dave Yaskulka '84, with another protester, is led away from the federal building by Pittsfield police. (DeMott)

Working for Peace

"The issue is Nicaragua," Mullen said. "It's important not to get away from that." Mullen said that, while this was the first civil disobedience action he had been involved in, the decision to participate came easily. "I was glad to have the chance to do it," he said.

Like some of the other demonstrators, Mullen said that he would refuse to pay fines and told Judge Dahoney that he would choose not to be represented by counsel, making a jail sentence more likely for him. "Most people are opposed to paying money to the government for working for peace," he said.

Acker consumes 17 hot dogs in Williams-North Adams contest

by R.P. DeMott

Chris Acker '85 ate his way to victory in a contest billed as "a real dog fight" on Sunday. The 6 foot 2 inch, 225 pound Acker put away 17 1/2 hot dogs in 30 minutes to be crowned the hot dog eating champ of western Mass.

The contest was organized by Brett Warner, a North Adams State College student, who invited six Williams students to test their appetites against six students from NASC. Eagle Street was closed for a time so that a crowd could gather in front of Jack's Hot Dog Stand to view the pig out.

Williams sent Acker, Jeff May '85, Ian Brzezinski '86, Pete Dawson '86, John Madden '87 and David Crompton '88 to do battle against the team from North Adams.

At the last minute, Warner anounced that one of the NASC contestants had come down with the flu. This excuse is completely understandable given the inclement weather that plagued the weekend.

The five North Adams students brave enough to face the boys from Williamstown were Brian Black, Peter Bourne, Charlie Johnson, Jerry (the ladies choice) Ostrachel, accompanied by his manager and Wayne Soars. Ostrachel was the favorite in a poll taken at NASC.

A what?

After the Williams men were introduced, Ostrachel arrived replete with a pair of red tights and a pretty house dress. In an attempt to intimidate the Williamstown warriors, Ostrachel strutted around the street and made a display of ripping off his dress.

Madden from Williams scored first, finishing his first weiner only 10 seconds into the competition. Johnson then jumped ahead on number two and set a fast pace closely followed by Madden and Dawson.

The leader was soon challenged as Bourne started to pull out of the pack on number seven and Acker made an end run to break double digits. Johnson showed signs of having burned himself out and Bourne took the lead at the ten minute mark with 11 dogs down.

Acker had taken the lead by the half way point and given himself a two minute cushion over Bourne. With one minute left and Bourne breathing down his neck, Acker showed his kick. He quickly inhaled a dog and a half as Bourne struggled to finish 17 at the final bell.

Asked how he felt about the win Acker replied, "Full."

Ian Brzezinski '86, Jeff May '85, John Madden '87, Pete Dawson '86, Chris Acker '85, and David Crompton '88 gorge themselves in the hot dog eating competition. (LeBauer)

Log to serve beer, wine

by Andrew Mayer

College administrators decided last week that the Log will continue to serve beer and wine next year but only to students 21 years old or over. The Log will remain in its Spring Street location at least through a trial period of three semesters.

President John Chandler, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, College Provost Neil Grabois, Director of Food Service James Hodgkins, and Committee on Undergraduate Life Chairman William Darrow made the decision in a meeting last Wednesday after reviewing input from the CUL and the student Log Committee.

The administration said that the new Massachusetts drinking age and a two drink per person per night limit will be strictly enforced.

The CUL and the administration will evaluate the new policy over a trial period ending December, 1986. Continued beer and wine service will depend on the College aequiring new liquor liability insurance after the current policy expires on July first. The Log's liquor license must also be renewed at the end of the calendar year.

"I think and hope the students will accept the responsibility and cooperate. I'm optimistic things will work well," said Chandler. O'Connor agreed, saying that "We have accepted the College Council and Committee on Undergraduate Life decisions and have good faith in them."

Full-time manager

According to Chandler, how to enforce the drinking age and the two drink limit will be decided this summer by the Log manager. Assisted by a former Williams student, the new manager will probably be a full-time Food Service employee.

"Food Service will attempt to make more attractive and more diverse foods available at the Log," Chandler said. O'Connor said that the only physical change to the Log this summer will be to upgrade the kitchen, but Hodgkins foresees the purchase of more furniture, a general elean up, and possible interior painting.

Hodgkins also said that he believes the Log will continue to be a popular plaee. "We will do all that we can to make it the attractive social center that Williams appears to want."

He said, however, that he would not allow a Food Service employee to sign the renewed liquor license because he believes that the liability of the signer is too great.

"I think a two drink limit is silly," said Log Manager Charlie Mitchell '84, adding that the administration should either let people drink or eliminate drinking, not go half-way.

Shelve moving Log

Chandler, O'Connor and Hodgkins all said that they hope the issue of moving the Log can be put aside to concentrate efforts on improving the Log. "The question of moving the Log should be bracketed and energy put into making it work on Spring Street," Chandler said.

O'Connor proposed waiting until the new gym and the Baxter Hall renovation are completed before reconsidering the issue. He believes that with the completion of the new gym the center of eampus activity will shift closer to the Log.

Both Chandler and O'Connor said that putting the Log near Lehman is unfeasible because

Farewell

As John Chandler's presidency ends, it is only fitting to recall his many years of devotion to Williams, first as a professor and later as President, and the myriad ways in which they have enriched the College.

As President, Chandler has raised the Williams endowment by a staggering amount, and has remained visible on campus to represent the College to students, staff and faculty. He has travelled throughout the country speaking with Williams' alumni and friends. Most importantly, he has been an eloquent defender of liberal arts, while improving the variety and depth of facilities at Williams. His impact on this campus and on other campuses around the nation will continue to be felt as he takes on his new position at The Association of American Colleges in Washington, and his contributions to Williams will not be forgotten once he leaves.

No argument

To The Editor:

Contain your sighs of relief, I promise to shut-up after this. But for J.B. Bird's column of last week, I would have done so sooner. Bird's article, however, having some of the style and wit so lacking in the sledgehammer fusilades for which I've been target lately and, even more irresistably, offering a steady parade of fallacies, begs for a response.

Although I will never tire of arguing my case (no advocate could have an easier burden), I am growing weary of having to deal with the same arguments that I have already dispensed with over and over in both public forum and public print. Bird hasn't a single original comment on the issue. And for support, he turns to the same discredited misrepresentations and distortions of my position whose irrelevance I thought all parties had come to recognize. This calls to mind Nietzsche's dictum, "When we have to change our opinion about someone, we hold the inconvenience he has therewith caused us greatly to his discredit."

At least Bird seems willing to admit that I am neither a racist nor intended to sound like one. But he asks that we look "beneath the surface of intention" (as if intention weren't always precisely that which lies below the surface). Why? Because, he avers, any criticism of any aspect of the BQ is tantamount to criticism of the blacks who coincidentally live there. By that logic, to say that it is a little stuffy in the Notre Dame Cathedral is also to derogate its architecture.

There is a word for all such attacks: ad hominem, responses not to what is said but to who is saying it—an inherently evasive tactic. Hence, although the bulk of my last letter was devoted to four specific, constructive proposals for remedying the housing problem, all J.B. wants to talk about is things like "facial tics." An argument about the Freshman Inclusion process, the Housing System, about the whole range of issues which, to my mind, call into question just about all facets of social life and policy-making at Williams College has been reduced to a question of facial tics. I think that just about says it all.

Far from leaving me discouraged, the protracted assaults on my tone and my person have only preserved my belief in the ultimate incorrigibility of my substance. Say what you want about Hart Murphy the messenger (sticks and stones...), his message stands. But this strategy has been adopted, I am convinced, precisely because those questions are unanswerable. Sooner or later that fact will have to be confronted. In the meantime, the only oppressed minority I see consists of fourty-four Freshmen placed in their last choice housing group for the second year for reasons no one can explain, much less defend. I have been both a strident voice for this cause and a scapegoat for those who would exploit it because it is a just cause. The response of my opponents has been both vicious and personal because they have no argument.

Biased

To The Editor:

How much longer will female athletes at Williams College have to prove their existence? Take last week's sports section in the Record for example. Of nine articles, only two were devoted exclusively to women's teams. A third mentioned both the men's and women's crew teams. None of these articles were placed in the "spotlight" on the back page: they were relegated to the "Sports Shorts" section. At a school such as ours, where men and women are represented nearly equally in the classes, this blatant biased reporting is offensive. No matter what "explanations" the Record may offer, the message that unequal coverage projects is one that acknowledges the supposed "superiority" of men in our society. I, for one, cannot accept that image.

Earlier this year, members of the women's swim team asked for recognition by the Record of their accomplishments. The team's excellent record in recent years certainly justified the complaints. However, recognition of victorious achievement is not the ultimate issue. Female athletes at Williams work just as hard as do their male counterparts. Both sexes deserve equal recognition for their efforts as well as for their accomplishments.

The Record has argued that the limited number of sportswriters restricts the number of sports which can be covered. Why are they covering mostly men's sports? (Two wrote on men's lacrosse last week.) A paper supposedly interested in good journalism should feel obligated to be objective, not subjective, and cover both sexes equally. Silly me, I keep forgetting that men are inherently better athletes: their achievements are much more interesting than ours.

I'll admit that as far as women's lacrosse is concerned, coverage has improved since last year. (The Record never told you that we were fourth in NIAC then.) But the two articles were taken from a teammate's accounts to the News Office, and cannot be totally credited to the Record. Also, we were lucky that a friend on the staff was at the Wesleyan game and took some great pictures (thanks, Dave). So why not mention that we beat Amherst last Saturday and thus won Little Three? I noticed that the Sports editor, John Schafer, attended that game. Thanks for your support, John, but wasn't our 15-7 victory good enough to mention in your paper?

I don't want to focus entirely on women's lacrosse, because I think the problem is shared by most women's teams at Williams. Since the passage of Title IX, women have become increasingly involved in college athletics. The Record should realize that women, as well as men, deserve recognition for their endeavors.

John Chandler: Perspectives on Williams College

I. The National Context

The future of the 3300 American colleges and universities will be shaped in considerable measure by external forces. Among the forces that are now discernible there are three that loom large:

A. The diminishing population of secondary school graduates. The demographic slide that began to affect colleges in 1979 will continue until 1995, and the steepest part of the slope will be reached around 1990. The overall decline in high school graduates will be on the order of 35%, with the sharpest reductions projected for the Northeast. (To give one illustration of what lies ahead for colleges, fifteen years ago the Williamstown Elementary School had an enrollment of 1100; this year's enrollment is 440.)

B. Federal higher education policy. Clark Kerr is almost certainly correct in the claim that federal support of higher education has already passed its zenith and will continue to decline. The unresolved questions have to do with the extent of the federal disengagement and the policy tilt of the programs that will remain. Will they favor the public sector over the private? Will the revised financial aid programs support choice as well as access?

C. Federal tax policies. Private higher education in particular, and public institutions to a growing extent, depend upon gifts and grants from individuals, foundations, and corporations. The proposed changes in the personal income tax code would reduce the capacity and the incentives for philanthropic giving, with the prospect that gifts to college and universities would fall by at least 30%. There is a fair chance that the fight to retain the full tax deductibility of cash gifts will be won. It will be more difficult to win the fight to maintain the tax deductibility of the full appreciated value of gifts of property. In my view, educational leaders should not resist the effort to simplify the tax bracket scheme. Reducing the number of tax brackets to three and decreasing the highest rate of taxation from 50% to 35%, while it would hurt colleges, would contribute to a more equitable distribution of tax burdens among the nation's citizens.

The small number of institutions that are blessed by distinguished faculties, financial strength, and a large volume of highly qualified applicants are likely to continue to attract a large number of able applicants even in the face of an overall shrinkage of the applicant pool. Indeed, the evidence of the past three or four years suggests that the strongest institutions will become even stronger and more attractive while many colleges that are not now highly selective in their admissions will have trouble surviving. Williams, as one of the highly favored colleges, should continue to prosper.

But to prosper the College must be affordable to tuition-paying families. Williams—and its peers—must bring tuition and fee increases into closer alignment with the growth of disposable family income and the rate of inflation. While the rate of tuition increases in recent years can be justified in terms of the tuition disinflation that occurred during some years in the decade of the 70's, that rate cannot be sustained over the long term. Indeed, there are already mutterings in Washington and elsewhere about imposing on colleges the kinds of cost containment requirements that are being applied to hospitals.

These conditions point to the need for Williams to raise additional endowment capital. Fortunately, the College is in a position to devote a large proportion of new capital gifts to endowment rather than physical plant. Endowment is needed particularly for financial aid and for professorships.

II. Educational Issues

As Williams faces the future it is in a good position to take advantage of the rising tide of public confidence in the liberal arts following a period in which vocational considerations played an inordinate role in shaping undergraduate programs of study. Universities with colleges of arts and sciences often emphasize the advantage of pursuing a liberal arts education in a setting that includes graduate and professional schools. But students soon discover that rarely are there organic connections between undergraduate curricula and the programs of graduate and professional schools, and the most distinguished faculty members in a university are often only peripherally involved in undergraduate teaching, if at all. It is also often the case that the stongest and most prominent departments in research universities are those that receive support from clients and partners outside the university, especially in industry and government. Given those conditions, it is likely that the strongest free-standing liberal arts colleges, Williams among them, will retain the balance, coherence, and clarity of purpose that will make them very attractive centers of study for faculty and students alike.

But balance, coherence, and clarity of purpose cannot be taken for granted even by small colleges. Indeed, the critiques of undergraduate curricula that have appeared in recent months agree that programs of liberal study in many American colleges are seriously lacking in coherence as the result of a number of factors—excessive elective freedom for students, overspecialization and inadequate teaching skills among faculty, and overemphasis on courses believed to have vocation utility.

How well does the Williams curriculum measure up against the critical reports that have been in the news recently? Pretty well, I'd say. Dean O'Connor's suggested grade of Bx or A- sounds about right. But the Williams curriculum hasn't been throughly reviewed in the past five years, and a review is in order. There are some specific questions that need to be pursued. The major programs of most departments have fewer required courses and more elective choices than was the case fifteen years ago. Some departments have recently undertaken thorough reviews of their major programs. One good starting point for a comprehensive curricular review would be for each department to look searchingly at its major program in an effort to articulate its purpose and determine what particular courses and requirements would best fulfill that purpose.

...Williams would be a stronger community and there would be a better melding of the extracurricular culture with the College's intellectual life if faculty members were better acquainted with their students...

Another question that needs to be asked is the function of examinations in bringing coherence and comprehensive mastery into the educational experience of Williams students. The comprehensive examination for departmental majors was abandoned about a decade ago. There has been a steady decline in the number of final examinations in courses. Do Williams students have enough occasions for comprehensive review of course materials, for grasping and articulating relationships among the components of individual courses and the components of their major program, as well as materials drawn from a variety of disciplines?

It is time also for Williams to explore once again the question of the role of the study of foreign languages. Should there be a foreign language graduation requirement—as there was before 1967-68—as well as an admissions requirement?

Twice in the past dozen years the Williams faculty has chosen to retain the present divisional distribution requirement instead of adopting the more elaborate schemes of requirements that were proposed. The primary argument against a larger and more precisely prescribed core requirement was that most Williams students use their elective freedom responsibly and thoughtfully and thus don't need more requirements. The evidence gathered in 1973-75 and again in 1979-80 demonstrated that it is only the Division III (science and mathematics) requirement that is really needed. With the growth of courses requiring computer applications and statistical analysis, Williams students are undoubtedly graduating with more quantitative skills than ever before. The quantative skills testing program that will be instituted next fall will almost certainly improve that picture further.

The curricular discussion that the Williams faculty is likely to undertake in the next few years may well focus on choosing between a core curriculum similar to Harvard's and retention of the present curriculum, augmented by a better advising system. The additional guidance to students might be provided in part by more conversations with faculty and partly by additional printed materials that spell out the aims of a Williams education. In stating those aims the faculty might draw upon the two most substantive recent reports on the undergraduate curriculum, To Reclaim a Legacy, written by William Bennett '65, and Integrity in the College Curriculum, whose chief author is Frederick Rudolph '42, Mark Hopkins Professor of History Emeritus.

III. Williams as a Residential College

As a residential college, Williams augments its formal programs of study by fostering a social and residential environment in which students learn from one another and cultivate and test a variety of skills—social, athletic, interpersonal—that contribute to personal enjoyment and to the capacity to be useful in the larger society.

In recent years there has been increasingly intense discussion about the effectiveness of the residential house system in the intellectual development and overall growth of Williams students.

It is probably illusory to think that the residential houses can ever be as cohesive as they were when they replaced the fraternities almost twenty-five years ago. Today's students are racially, ethnically, and geographically more diverse, and the College has grown by 60% through the addition of women. Instead of five or six students a year, a hundred and fifty now go abroad for study. The number of students living off campus has grown from a dozen or so to about 140. Moreover, the campus has a much greater number and variety of student organizations, many of which are more fulfilling to their participants than are the residential houses.

The most sucessful residential houses are as effective as those twenty years ago. The primary ingredient for success is dedicated and imaginative teamwork between the house president and the faculty house associate. The College—through the Dean's Office—should do more to foster and encourage that kind of teamwork.

Although there are problems with the residential house system, the total extracurricular environment at Williams has never been more vibrant and richer in what it offers to students. But there are some deficiencies in that environment. The Adelphic Union, once a dynamic organization, only sproadically shows bursts of life, with the result that debate and declamation are among the weaker extracurricular activities at a time when they are thriving in many high schools and colleges.

Another deficiency of the extracurricular environment is the low level of faculty involvement. It is a sign of the energy, talent and imagination of students that they have created such a vital extracurricular culture. But Williams would be a stronger community and there would be a better melding of the extracurricular culture with the College's intellectual life if faculty members were better acquainted with their students as actors, athletes, editors, Sunday school teachers, and disc jockeys.

And yet, while I regret that there aren't more faculty members present at plays, concerts, and athletic events, I sympathize with their difficulties in balancing the many demands on their time. They have to work hard to meet the classroom expectations of bright and demanding students and the College's expectations that they be productive scholars. Many of them are involved in two-career marriages that entail geographical separation from their husband or wife. Williamstown is a wonderful setting for students, but its rural character is a handicap for many two-career faculty families.

Durable friendships between faculty and students are most likely to develop from shared work in enterprises of mutual interest, such as honors projects or theses. Some forty students spend summers at Williams working as research assistants for faculty members. I would like to see a large expansion of such opportunities, both in and out of term. From working together in such enterprises students and faculty are likely to come to appreciate one another more fully as they discover in one another personality facets, interests, and talents that are less likely to be revealed in the restricted environment of the classroom.

I want to turn back for a moment to the social environment at Williams and comment on the issues that seem to be involved in the discussion of the future of the Log with impending change in the legal drinking age.

The concern being expressed about the future of the Log has a variety of dimensions, but I believe that the root of the concern is a desire to preserve and enhance the community spirit of Williams. There is a strong sense of community at Williams, accompanied by the widespread sentiment that there should be more occasions for the community to gather for fun, entertainments, and intellectual stimulation. The Log is one setting where such gatherings occur. Chapin Hall is another, but Chapin should be filled more frequently with standing room crowds. Williams has perhaps too many public lectures, but too few of them are by controversial speakers who deal with topics of broad public interest. Let's have more occasions when Chapin is filled with faculty, students, and staff to listen to such speakers as Phyllis Schlafly, Andrew Young, George McGovern, and William F. Buckley.

New buildings can have a significant impact on a campus by providing new kinds of encounters and experiences resulting from the altered pedestrian traffic patterns. Within the past decade, the combination of Sawyer Library, the Bernhard Music Center, and the creation of a central post office in Baxter Hall caused that part of the campus to become the center that draws almost everyone together daily. When the new gym and pool are opened about eighteen months from now, the campus center of gravity will be affected as those new facilities generate use. Dance, which already draws large numbers, will probably attract even more students to the renovated studio in Lasell. And perhaps the main floor of Lasell will once again be used—as it was before Baxter Hall was built—for all-college dances.

With the southward shift of the campus center of gravity, the Log will seem much less peripheral than it does now. Despite the uncertainties about how it will function under the conditions of the new drinking age, the Log is likely to become an even more vital center of student social life.

Williams has enormous strengths as it faces the future, and just enough problems to keep it from being complacent. This is a wonderful environment for the development of interesting and consequential people. As one whose time here is coming to a close, I envy those who will remain.

Why I am not a College Republican

by B. Daniel Blatt

In my years at Williams, I have nurtured an interest in political philosophy and the American political system. In order to promote knowledge and discussion of the ideas (and ideology) which I felt I espoused, and which I felt were not well presented at Williams, I became active in the Republican Club, through which I brought speakers and films to campus and used the campus media in an attempt to present these ideas. But, as my involvement in politics increased, I became more and more disillusioned with many in college politics (at Williams and in the conservative movement) who saw it as a vehicle to blindly promote their own ideology. At this point, I chose to abandon activist politics in order to devote myself to those intellectual interests which led me there in the first place.

It seems to me that many people on the Left and Right tend to see their opponents as committed to the effects (they perceive) of their (opponents') actions and not to their motivations for action. Understanding ideas and their origins should be an essential aspect of a college education. Realizing that many of our intellectual opponents often share similar motivations (or at least have motivations that are not dastardly and mean) must become a necessary pre-condition for intellectual discourse. With such recognition, we can understand and reject (or accept if their argument is worthy) their ideas on the level of ideas rather than on that of slogans. As such, our ideas themselves become nobler because they are chosen with a thoughtful rejection of their antitheses, rather than with an off-hand dismissal.

Too often, however, blinded by their own perceptions, many students turn their own ideas into ideology. Seeing great crimes committed by right-wing regimes, many on the Left assume that all right-wing regimes are evil. They thus have turned a concern for those suffering under certain regimes into an ideological opposition to all similar regimes. The new-found ideology of opposition to right-wing regimes replaces the noble concern for human suffering. (This argument is also true if one replaces the word "right-wing" with "socialist" or "communist" and the word "Left" with "Right.") By adopting the ideology, people often dismiss their own legitimate concerns.

People are no longer concerned with tyranny and suffering per se, but the ideology they feel causes it. Yet, while we must strive to oppose tyranny, we should strive as well not to replace it with something similar or even worse. This argument, however, often accepts unfortunate conditions as necessary to prevent even worse ones, seemingly putting aside the ideal in the face of reality. Thus, as we strive for our ideals, we must recognize the condition of the world and man—recognizing that we cannot create a perfect world. Even if the ideal might not be able to be achieved in this world, nonetheless, we must work towards it, striving to prevent any suffering this ideal (in its application) may bring about. Hence, we must remain cognizant of any limitations that our ideals may involve.

In trying to work toward the ideal solution, I often find that I cannot find a means of achievement which would not significantly worsen the situation. Such is my response to the issue of South Africa. After having researched the issue, I often bragged (perhaps erroneously) that I was the most well-informed student on this issue at Williams, yet my only significant conclusion was that I was opposed to disinvestment as a feasible alternative to apartheid. While I found apartheid to be a repressive and immoral system, I found that it also maintains order (albeit tyrannical) among diverse (and often hostile) ethnic groups, preventing a bloody struggle. Wanting to avoid a violent revolution, I could not and cannot develop a "solution" to an immoral system.

Thus, when people asked me what I suggested as an alternative to their "solution" of disinvestment, I replied "I don't know." While people called this answer insensitive to the plight of apartheid's victims, it was quite the opposite—it reflected a sensitivity to this plight, yet this sensitivity brought two conflicting values that I held to light. The "I don't know" was not a cop-out; it reflected rather an intellectual desquietude caused in seeking to resolve a complex issue.

When I had attached myself to the College Republican ideology, I cut myself off from accepting "I don't know" as a legitimate response to a complex issue. Rejecting discussion, the College Republicans use their positions to insist on their ideology. Through college politics, however, we should ask questions and seek to understand the ideas and motivations of our opponents. Not only does such politics involve understanding each other's ideas, it should not let us lose our own values to ideology. Instead of ideology, we must face the conflicts of differing values. An "I don't know" coming out of intellectual discourse presents the fundamental right of a college student who does not accept an empty ideology (which pretends to answer all questions) and who seeks to continue learning and to better understand his own ideas.

Politics on college campuses has been reduced to the hurling of slogans, instead of raised to the deliberation of ideas. With this mentality, the rally has become the standard instrument of college political behavior on the Left as well as on the Right. Too often a rally presents only one side, yelling this is where we stand, this is what we want, that is what is right, period. Blinded by their own ideology, the demonstrators reduce their intellect to the empty slogans on their placards. Observing these rallies (and to my great regret having participated in a few), I now see them as inappropriate to responsible intellectual behavior, for their purpose too often is to end intellectual discussion rather than to promote it. Those who rally pretend to have all the answers to the problem they address; yes, they insist, we can make the world perfect. Pretending to have all the answers, they really have none.

Today, the leaders of the College Republicans pretend to have all the answers; indeed, such dogmatism has made them a bulwark of right-wing ideology. Rather than use their position as college conservative leaders to promote the discussion of conservative ideals on an intellectual level, they seek to use the college environment to insist upon their ideology. That is why I am not a College Republican; under the aegis of promoting political discussion, they and others like them (on both the Right and the Left) stifle it.

As we strive for the ideal (in politics as well as in our personal and intellectual lives), let us not be afraid to face reality, the limitations of our ideals, not afraid to accept contradictions in our ideals, nor afraid to say "I don't know" after we have thoughtfully considered an issue. Let us not be afraid of our ideals and values so that we can use college to both better understand and further develop them.

B. Daniel Blatt is a former chairman of the Massachusetts College Republicans.

Embargo Protest

About sixty people, including Williams students, faculty members and Williamstown residents, gathered in front of the Williamstown Post Office last Monday to protest the recent United States' economic embargo on the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

"In your own ways, you are going to fight this action," Williams Athletic Director Robert Peck told the crowd. "There are many actions like this going on all over the country at this moment. We want to keep the public eye on this illegal act that the government is putting on."

After listening to Peck's remarks, the protesters began to walk in a circle along the sidewalk in front of the post office, Williamstown's only federal facility. Carrying signs with many slogans, including "U.S. Out of Nicaragua Now" and "This Year Williams, Next Year Managua," the protesters chanted and handed out information to passersby for about an hour.

The protest, held on the day the embargo took effect and sponsored by the Williams Nicaragua Forum, took place in conjunction with similar activities across the state, including a civil disobedience action taken by several students and townspeople at the Federal Building in Pittsfield.

College Council

Last week College Council unanimously passed a proposal submitted by Sandra Burton, coordinator of dance, to begin efforts to increase interaction among the four Berkshire area colleges.

According to College Council President Anza Mammen '86, a committee will be set up next year to contact the student governments at the three other schools and coordinate events and transportation among the campuses of Williams, Bennington, North Adams State and Berkshire Community College.

In other business, Mammen updated the Council on the status of the letter being sent to Secretary of Education William J. Bennett '65 and President Ronald Reagan concerning the proposed cuts in federal financial assistance to college students. Mammen said about 27 student government presidents from colleges across the country had signed the letter, which will be sent out in the next few weeks before Congress votes on the administration's budget package.

In this week's meeting, College Council will once again take up the issue of campus housing. They will be considering a proposal to put more information about the inclusion process in the freshman inclusion packet and to have upperclass open houses during Winter Study Period.

Political Speakers

Two speakers representing opposite sides of the conflict between the United States and the Sandinista government in Nicaragua will speak at Williams this week and next.

Harry W. Shlaudeman, U.S. ambassador-at-large and the president's special envoy for Central America, and Carlos Tunnerman, Nicaraguan ambassador the the United States, are appearing in the Nicaragua Forum's final lecture series for the year.

Shlaudeman will present a lecture, "The United States and Central America: A Policy Perspective," tonight at 8:00 p.m. in Chapin Hall.

Since entering the U.S. Foreign Service in 1955, Shlaudeman has served in various diplomatic capacities, including the positions of U.S. ambassador to Venezuela from 1975-76, ambassador to Peru from 1977-80, and ambassador to Argentina from 1980-83.

Shlaudeman was executive director of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America in 1983-84, until he was appointed to his present position in March 1984.

Shlaudeman's visit to Williams is the first by a representative of the Reagan administration.

Tunnerman will speak next Monday at noon in Chapin Hall.

Vassar Sit-in

A group of forty Vassar students have non-violently blockaded the campus' main access gate in protest of the college's investment holdings in South Africa. The Student Coalition for Divestment, organizers of the protest, began occupying Taylor gate on Friday, April 26 and intend to stay until graduation if their demands are not met.

Vassar's campus is self-contained, and motor access is possible through three gates, of which Taylor is the most central. While the campus has not been cut-off, most motor traffic has been detoured to another entrance because of the protest.

The students are requesting a written commitment from the Board of Trustees that the college will divest all stocks, bonds and holdings in corporations or holding corporations that do business with South Africa, and also make available information concerning the extent of Vassar's holdings in other corporations. In addition, the Coalition has asked for amnesty from prosecution or academic retribution for the protestors.

Vassar president Virginia Smith responded to the protestors on the first day of the sit-in with a letter reiterating the college's policy of "selective and gradual" divestment, and recommending that the group utilize regular bureaucratic channels. Since then, "They've been giving us the silent treatment" said one protestor.

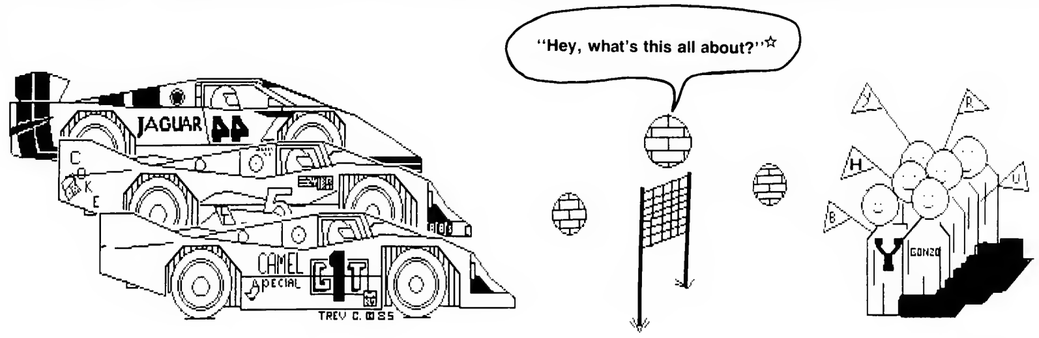
Cento Winner



Carrie Cento '86 has been selected by the senior members of College Council to receive the Grovesner Cup this year.

"The cup is awarded each year to the junior who has best demonstrated concern for the College community and beyond through extensive dedicated service and who has served with the utmost integrity and reliability," according to Sam Broeksmit '85, a committee member.

Cento is a member of the women's squash team and will captain the field hockey team next year. She has been the leader of the Ephlats and has volunteered at the Berkshire Farm for Boys.

Cento will be awarded a certificate of merit, and her name will be engraved on a plaque in the Log.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CHALLENGE©

☆It's a high-powered, thrill-a-minute volleyball tournament pitting your team of fraternity brothers, sorority sisters or college buddies against the gear heads of the Camel GT Racing Series, with a chance for you to win $500 and more —much more.

☆It means free camping at Lime Rock Park's 1.53-mile road course over the Memorial Day weekend for one last wild and crazy fling before the summer gets serious. It means tickets to 2 days of racing and a day of practice. It means a pass into the paddock so you can see the 750 horsepower Camel GT cars up close and personal, along with the men who drive those 180-mile-an-hour Jaguars, Porsches, Mustangs, Corvettes and Aston Martin race cars around the "Road Racing Center of the East."

☆Besides the racing and the volleyball, it means kicking back in the sun, splashing in the swimming hole, snuggling in a down sleeping bag. it means ANYTHING you want it to mean.

☆In addition to the $500 first place prize, there's a case of Lowenbrau and Camel GT sun visors for all those contestants accepted in the tournament and possibly—just possibly—the thrill of victory.

☆The Great American Challenge takes place at Lime Rock Park, located in the northwest corner of Connecticut at the junction of Routes 7 and 112 in the foothills of the Berkshires.

☆For a $60 entry fee, you get six players and an official into the tournament and into a weekend that can start on Thursday night and run right through Monday night. Normally, the regular single admission cost for the Camel GT weekend is $55 APIECE. It doesn't take a doctorate to figure out that the $60 entry fee means the individual cost for the weekend of racing, the practice sessions, the on-site camping and the paddock passes comes to only about $8.50. That's a whopping savings of over $360. for a team of seven.

☆If you want to be part of this Banzai party, send in your entry fee to: Lime Rock Park, The Great American Challenge, P.O. Box 441, Lakeville, CT 06039. Branching out at Hopkins Forest

by Chris Finch

Last week The Record presented an article describing the history of Hopkins Forest, a large tract of land owned by Williams College. This week, in the conclusion to the two-part series, the current activities at the forest are highlighted.

While use of Hopkins Forest was rather limited in the first years after its establishment, its uses diversified substantially with a growing interest in the science departments and the arrival of Nan Jenks-Jay, assistant director of the Center for Environmental Studies. She encouraged many new uses of the forest, as well as renovating the grounds and attempting to bring back some of the traditional flavor of the region.

The old carriage barn has been converted to an educational facility with a museum, laboratories, and classroom, while the adjacent field has recently been cleared and plowed for planting hay. Today the forest hosts several annual activities associated with the history of the area as well as changing exhibits in the museum.

The fall Harvest Festival brings back a day of old New England with cider pressing, a blacksmith, logging exhibitions and related activities. In the spring, CES sponsors an old-fashioned maple sugaring operation, run almost solely by students, with occasional help from Jenks-Jay. Several students are involved with the process of tapping the trees, collectiong the sap, and slowly boiling it down to maple syrup (sold at Hopkins Forest and CES).

Run this spring by Melinda Scott '85, the maple sugaring operation produced 35-40 gallons of syrup. "I think it's valuable in giving students a chance to learn themselves how to run a sugaring operation," said Scott, who has worked out at the forest intermittently since her sophomore year.

Several other students work out at Hopkins Forest on weekday afternoons and weekends, involved in tasks such as field clearing, fence building, sign posting, and wood cutting, splitting and stacking.

Stress relief

"It provides a great opportunity to get away from the tension of school," said Andy Cutko '86, who supervises students working in the forest. "You can take out your anxieties with an axe, sledge-hammer and chainsaw. Half the reason I came to Williams is that it is a beautiful location and it offers so many opportunities that the city doesn't have."

"It's a fantastic resource," Jenks-Jay noted, "and it makes sense to use it for many different kinds of research. I think that the college, scientific community, general community, and students can all benefit."

Hopkins Forest is somewhat unique in that it offers for scientific and historical research a large piece of land that was once much more intensively used but that has remained relatively undisturbed for half a century. According to Art, "The forest represents a typical physical section of New England and has a land use history, except for the gentleman's farm, very similar to many other areas of New England. It provides an ideal opportunity to piece together a successional view of how a forest changes and how land use has influenced succession and species composition in the forest."

Past and present research projects include archaeological digs, acid rain studies, soil sampling, and deer mice studies, along with many others.

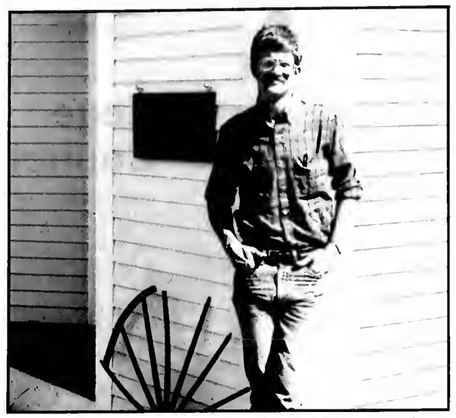
Practical research

Hopkins Forest is also used for testing innovations and research on a less strictly scientific level. During the winter, the Rosenburg Center and adjoining apartment are heated mainly with a wood-burning furnace, although an oil system kicks in during extremely cold weather. In addition, a solar heating system was recently installed and in the hope of heating all of the building's hot water during the summer and pre-heat water during the winter.

The college's Energy Committee has also contributed a system that will monitor the facility's energy use, keeping tabs on energy flows from the wood and oil furnaces and solar panels. This system should provide valuable data for assessing the feasibility and economics of such systems in New England.

The forest is also a favored site for hiking, running, cross-country skiing, and snowshoeing, and occasionally more specialized interests such as spelunking and bird watching. The Outing Club maintains around 10 miles of trails, as well as a cabin that can be used by club members. Hikes are led frequently by the club, and PE trail crew and skiing classes are often found using the trails.

"It's a great way to get people who are not necessarily 'outdoorsy' to realize that there are a lot of things around here—you don't have to be a hard-core hiker to enjoy the woods. It's a nice change of pace," said Jonathan Labaree '85, who led weekly Outing Club trips there during the fall.



Busy life

While students find Hopkins Forest an interesting place to visit, Jenks-Jay finds it a wonderful place to live, although not without its drawbacks. "It's a full-time job," she stated. "There's always something to do." In addition to her job at CES, she takes care of and improves the Rosenburg Center and surrounding grounds.

"I love the fact that I can't see the next house—you get more tuned in to the environment...sometimes you can hear the wind approaching as it comes down from the ridge. There's no way I could ever have a place like this on my own," Jenks-Jay explained.

"I've been given the greatest gift to be able to live out there," she continued, "but still you have a tradeoff with the cross-country team running through your daughter's Easter-egg hunt and people 'baa-ing' at the sheep all day." (Four sheep are kept at the forest to mow the lawns, and their wool is used for spinning and weaving exhibition

For the future, it is hoped that use of Hopkins Forest will expand to include many of the academic interests in the student body. Art stated, "It's a resource that can completely fill out the time we have to put into it," and Jenks-Jay added, "I think that there are a lot of opportunities for inter-departmental use that wouldn't conflict. The potential is fantastic and something that we may not fully realize today."

A recent hazing stunt has given birth to a host of problems for the Pi Lambda fraternity at F & M. According to The College Reporter, the frat's woes stem from an alleged incident on the night of April 3, when a pledge's hazing rites were taken off-campus.

According to reports, the pledge was "kidnapped" by frat members and taken to a party. The pledge, however, refused to remain at the party because his pledge brothers were absent. Frat members accomodated his protests by taking him to an off-campus location, where they instructed him to await pick-up by a forthcoming Pi Lambda patrol.

Much to the dismay of frat members, though, the pledge wandered away from the drop-off site, and eventually surfaced at Atlantic Breeders, an impregnating firm known for its stringent (if not impregnable) security. Breeders' security officers noticed the pledge's arrival at their plant and summoned local police, who issued the pledge a citation for public drunkenness and underage drinking. The frat now faces disciplinary action by the dean's office, which promises a penalty commensurate with the circumstances, which were described by a former frat president "as definitely not normal."

Trinity

A recent issue of The Trinity Tripod featured an advertisement for Trinity's version of "Free University," conducted in April at the Hartford college. Like Williams' Free U., the one at Trinity provided a grab-bag assortment of courses, ranging from seriously intellectual to seriously fun. Among this spring's offerings were:

"Basic Introductory Seminar on Talking Heads." Described as a "survey of America's foremost avant-garde group," this class focused on the band's albums and its members' solo projects. There were recommended readings and an implicit promise to "Stop Making Sense."

"Postmodernism—Present Dlin Architectural Design." This course seemed more serious, covering "pertinent architectural works of the last twenty years," and providing "helpful reserve reading" of 45 pages.

"Basic Beermaking." The instructors claimed "you can find out how to save money brewing your own beer," particulary English-style ale. It was probably an easy course: you came in, made beer, then passed out.

"A Short Course in Auto Purchasing." At first glance, this one appears to be a vital part of the liberal arts education, promising "insights in shopping and negotiating the auto deal." However, listed next to it in the advertisement is Free U.'s answer to cross-curricula study: "Basic Automobile Maintenance and Repair," offered perhaps for those who fail the purchasing course.

Professor Roger Bolton pointed out at the CUL meeting that the money earned by renting out the land where the Log sits now might surpass the cost of moving it.

Local strike ends as management gives in

by James Spallone

The two and a half week labor dispute at Williamstown's Carol Cable Co. ended last Friday when most of the 123 workers returned to work at the Water Street plant. Seven union members, however, have been suspended for nine days without pay as a result of the strike action.

According to Northern Berkshire Labor Coalition member Professor Daniel Fairiss, the dispute involving the placement of a non-union, management level foreman on the first shift has been resolved in favor of the union. The promotion of the non-union member resulted in a union worker's being moved to the third shift, prompting the walkout. As a result of the negotiations, the union member will not be bumped to the third shift, Fairiss said.

"We feel strongly that it (the settlement) was a victory, not so much on the issue of where the foreman will be placed, although that was won, but more on the issue of demand for basic justice and human respect at the workplace," Fairiss said. "We (the Coalition) were very happy to play a role in that."

The controversy began on May 23 when members of the International Union of Electrical Radio and Machine Workers Union Local 299 walked out. Management said that the walkout was illegal because it violated a no-strike agreement in the workers' most recent contract. The walkout went unrecognized by the International Union so the strikers received no benefits.

During the week of April 29, after the company fired all of the strikers, Local 299 officials began talks with the company management, assisted by a state arbitrator procured by State Rep. Sherwood M. Guernsey (D—Williamstown). The walkout was not an official strike and so there were no contract negotiations, but Fairris said that he believes a verbal agreement between management and workers will begin improving communications.

Local president Norman Estes spoke to about 300 students gathered for the Music Fest and thanked them.

Face it—your parents have just coughed up roughly $45,000—the price of a small, used yacht—so they could proudly watch you, through teary eyes, pick up your Williams sheepskin on June 9. As a result, they have now been driven to eating cold gruel and living in a corrugated tin hovel, having had the family home repo'd after a failed fourth mortgage. You, on the other hand, have just returned from a two-week vacation on Sanibel and, with the money you saved by sleeping ten to a room for six (your idea of economizing), have bought a new receiver for your stereo. Your parents are burning the old family photos for heat, and you're wondering what they're going to give you for graduation. Isn't it about time you gave them something in return?

"Williams: The Four Seasons" is a series of full-color limited edition lithographs reproduced from original realist watercolors painted by alumnus and all-around major dude Brian R. Daniell (and you all thought I was just another hammerhead...). The prints are signed, numbered, and hand double-matted and are available custom-framed and under non-glare glass. They'll look great on the wall of the family hovel and are a great investment—after all, you may need to go to grad school . . . At last, the perfect thank you gift is here. The set can be viewed in Baxter lounge over the grand piano, at the First Aggie Bank on Spring Street or in the River House Restaurant in Williamstown. The prices are: Matted, mounted, unframed, $50, each or $150, for the set of four; Framed, $80, and $250. Call now to ensure framing and delivery before graduation, 458-5140 or write to P.O. Box 287, Williamstown. Thank you for thanking them.

points in the first half to lead 24-0 at the midway point. The second stanza, however, belonged to Williams. Five minutes into the half, Rob Rau '88 ran the ball into the try zone before passing to Joe Navarra '88 for the Ephs' first try of the afternoon. Sean Brennan '87 successfully added the conversion to cut the lead to 24-6.

Immediately following Navarra's try, Andy Harris '88 and Drew Steckler '87 also scored for Williams to cut the margin to six points at 24-18. The game ended, however, before the Ephs could add the equalizing try.

Although this weekend brought three losses to Dartmouth, this season has been one of the most successful for the WRFC in recent memory. Although seniors Shannon McKeen, Tim McFadden, Mark Evans, Bob Ause, Jeff Calkins, Mike Kolster, Dave Curry, Tom Dumphy, John Dagnello, Mark Van Norman, and Dave Blaney will be missed greatly, the club optimistically anticipates an equally successful season next fall.

Golfers end season 8-2

by Rick Orluk

The golf team went into this week's play with an unblemished 7-0 record but came away with a tough luck 8-2 clip. In two matches Williams led after the top three players had finished their rounds but could not hold on, losing to Amherst in the Little Three Championship and Dartmouth on Saturday. In addition, Williams placed second in this year's NESCAC Championships held at Taconic golf course May 5th and 6th.

In the NESCAC's Williams was led by the play of senior co-captains Mike Hennigan and Chris Harned who placed fifth and sixth respectively with 36-hole scores of 158 and 159. Amherst, which had the first, second, and fourth place finishers, won the tournament, beating the Ephmen by seventeen strokes. After the first day, Williams trailed the Jeffs by only two strokes with Trinity in third. Amherst got strong team play on Monday to wrap up the win.

On Wednesday, the Ephmen traveled to Wesleyan for the Little Threes. Once again, the team came away with a second place finish behind arch-rival Amherst. The Jeffs won with a score of 398 trailed by Williams with 410 and Wesleyan with 435. After the top three players for Amherst and Williams had finished, the Ephs led by four strokes behind the play of sophomore Chas Foehl who recorded a team low 78. Harned and Hennigan also played solid golf to post scores of 79 and 81 to push Williams into the lead, but it was short-lived as Amherst's number five player shot a four over par 76 to capture Medalist honors and rescue the Jeffs.

Lead falls at Dartmouth

On Saturday the Ephmen squad faced the Division I Dartmouth in Hanover. The top three Williams golfers fared well racking up a seven stroke lead, but once again depth became a problem. Williams' last two scorers shot 81 and 85 while Dartmouth's last two players recorded a 71 and 70, allowing the Big Green to recover and win the match by seven strokes. Coach Rick Pohle said, "The last couple of matches we have jumped out to early leads but have been unable to hold them. Depth had been our demise." Williams was led by Harned and Foehl who both shot 74's, and Hennigan added a 75.

Williams finished the season with an 8-2 record including victories over Harvard, Cogate, and Holy Cross. Pohle was content his team's play. "Although we will miss Chris and Mike, I think we have several players who are solid and with the addition of a couple of incoming freshmen, I think the team will fare well in the next couple of years."

Women's lacrosse routs Skidmore 23-10

by Faith Raider

The women's lacrosse team ended its season with a 23-10 rout of Skidmore Thursday to end with a 6-4 record. With 28 goals on the year, junior Laura Rogers socred seven goals and added an assist.

Other high scorers were sophomores Lee Wierdsma and Kiri Swenson freshman Julie Infurna, and senior Emily Sneath. Sophomores goaltenders Martha Hoopes and Lias Dorian combined for nine saves.

Last Saturday, senior Alison Fuller led the team to the Little Three championship by scoring seven goals and dealing out two assists as the Ephwomen trounced the Lady Jeffs of Amherst 15-7 on Saturday.

Fuller's scoring outburst against Amherst gave her 11 tallies in Little Three competition this year, and she ended the year averaging over three goals a game. Other scorers against Amherst were Rogers, Wierdsman and senior Jane Rech. Goalie Martha Hoopes had a busy day, making 13 saves.

Tulane controversy: could it happen here?

by Dave Paulsen

Q: What do you say to a Tulane University basketball player wearing a suit?
A: Will the defendent please rise.

Off the Record by Dave Paulsen

The above joke making the rounds indicates the sad status of major college basketball. It refers, of course, to the recent indictment of several Tulane basketball players for point shaving in two basketball games. With the indictments came the information that the team's star, John "Hot Rod" Williams, had received $10,000 in a shoe box to sign at Tulane. During the season, he received as much as $100 in cash a week from his coach, Ned Fowler.

But this was at Tulane, a big-time Division I school. That sort of thing could never happen at Williams, right? Wrong. And it's time the record was set straight. Some may consider it pure coincidence that Williams President John Chandler chose this year to retire as President. Well think again.

On February 25, after the Ephs' disappointing loss to the Tufts University Jumbos, Jeff "Ira" Roth was approached by some of his Tufts acquaintances. Coming from New Jersey, Roth was well connected with members of the bookie community. Roth's friends, after seeing him erupt for five points in the previous game, figured "Ira" was the key to any point-shaving scheme. The game to be fixed was the seaon finale against Wesleyan.

"I've got to talk to The Man," Roth told his friends. He was, of course, referring to me. After all, who was responsible for the passes which led to Ira's scoring outburst? After discussing it, I agreed to "the fix." After all, accepting a bribe couldn't be any worse than the illegal offers I had received as a recruit.

It'll probably all come out in court, anyway, so I might as well reveal all the details. My high school coach, who was screening the numerous offers I was receiving from colleges, decided I should accept the full scholarship offered to me by North Central Wisconsin Agricultural School. The deal included a $10,000 signing bonus. Unfortunately, my parents couldn't come up with that kind of money, so I had to come to Williams instead.

Anyway, Ira and I decided that we should include Tarek Essa, who owns Kuwait, into our scheme. The details were all set. The point spread had Wesleyan favored by 11 points. All we had to do was make sure that our team lost by more than 11 points.

All week long, as we passed each other on campus, we whispered, "the fix is on." Essa was able to get loads of money down on the game for all of us. Things were looking good.

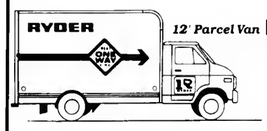
The only problem was that Coach Sheehy must have heard about the scheme. Because he changed his plans and decided not to start us. In fact, we didn't even play.

Lightweights earn silver as crew rows in Dad Vail

The varsity lightweight four won a silver medal this weekend in the top performance as the crew team competed in the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia this weekend.

Sophomores Mark Trumbull and John Desnoyers, junior Dean Papadoupolos, and senior Tim Goss combined with coxswain Sophi Gorski '87 to place second behind the University of Minnesota. They qualified for the finals by finishing in front of Lafayette by only about a second.

Meanwhile, the varsity men placed second in the petite finals after failing to win their semi-final in a subpar performance. The varsity women placed third in their opening heat but placed fifth in their semis and failed to reach the finals. They ended up finishing sixth in the petite finals.



The regatta was on the Schuikyil River in Philadelphia, and saw 75 colleges compete, including schools from Florida, Alabama, and Michigan.

"I am very optimistic about next year," said Coach Peter Wells. "We have a very up group with a lot of pride and team unity."

Lacrosse downs Hamilton 14-10

by Greg Keller
and Andrew Smith

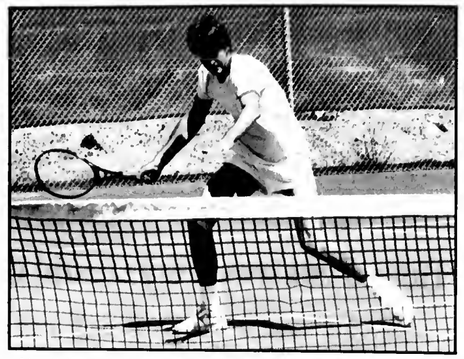
The men's lacrosse team finished its season with victories over Hamilton and Connecticut College to raise its record to 6-4. Freshman Jonathan Edie poured in four goals in each game to lead the Ephmen.

Against Hamilton on Saturday, junior goalie Brad duPont turned in a outstanding performance by collecting 25 saves in the Ephs 14-10 victory. His goaltending led to a close game through three periods.

Jim Sperry '87 led the Ephs to a 4-3 first period lead by assisting tallies by Edie and Mike O'Connell '87, and scoring off an O'Connell pass. Hamilton fought back in the second period for a 7-7 tie at the half.

Late in the third period, co-captain Reese Hughes '85 fired in two quick goals, giving the Ephs an 11-8 lead. Strong defensive play held the Continentals to only two tallies in the final period. Also scoring for the Ephs were Matt Salisbury '87, Rob Miller '87, Mike Stoddard '86, Dave Flynn '85, and Andy Jeffrey '86.

10-6 over Conn.



Against Conn. College, Edie scored four consecutive goals in the third period to lead the Ephs to a 10-6 victory.

Conn. took a 3-0 lead before Sperry assisted a Chris Toll '86 tally at 1:35 in the first period. The Camels countered early in the second period on a Chris Hobson goal, before unassisted goals by Toll and Chris Oldham '88 cut the lead to one at the half.

After allowing an early Connecticut tally in the third period, the Ephmen took control, firing in seven unanswered markers. O'Connell started the rally with an unassisted goal at 10:42 in the third quarter. Edie then began his shooting spree and found the net four times.

In the fourth quarter O'Connell set up goals by Chris Swindell '88 and Spery to complete the Eph attack. For the game, duPont collected ten saves in the Eph nets.

O'Connell ended the year as the team's leading scorer by tallying 34 points on 17 goals and 17 assists. He was followed by Edie, Sperry, and Hughes.

At number one, Craig Hammond '85 won his last home match as an Ephman 6-2, 6-4. (LeBauer)

Tennis tops MIT 5-4; ends year undefeated

by Cliff Peale

Finishing their season with a perfect 10-0 record, the tennis team squeaked out a 5-4 victory over MIT on Saturday in Boston after routing Union in their final home match on Thursday.

Against MIT, number one player Craig Hammond '85 crushed his opponent 6-2, 6-4, while fellow senior and number two player Tim Rives gave up only five games while winning 6-3, 6-2. These two have been varsity starters for four years, and their experience will be missed. Counting juniors studying away, seven of the top nine players from this year's team will not be here next year.

Senior Tim Rives, playing two, slammed his Union opponent 6-3, 6-2 as the tennis team beat the Dutchmen and later MIT to go 10-0 for the season. (Pynchon)

Number three player Kevin Callanan '87 lost his first dual-match singles of the year, falling 3-6, 6-3, 6-4. Junior Chris Clarey ended an up and down season at number four by losing in a tough third-set tiebreaker.

Tim Peterson '86 ended an excellent two weeks, after suffering through a miserable first half by winning 6-2, 6-0, while number six player Chris Meyers '87 fell 6-3, 6-4.

The Ephs then had to win two of three doubles matches to clinch the match, and the number one and three doubles teams of Hammond-Rives and Callanan-Andy Canning '85 obliged with straight set wins of 6-4, 6-4, and 6-1, 6-2. Clarey and Peterson, playing number two, fell 6-4, 6-3.

"It's the story of our season," said coach Sean Sloane. "The doubles teams really did the job."

The win followed an easy victory over Union on Thursday, as all six singles players took straight-set victories, excepting Clarey at number four, who got stronger in the third set to win 4-6, 6-2, 6-1. Two of the three doubles teams lost in abbreviated matches.

Women ruggers end year 2-3-1

by Helen Kaulbach

Under the blazing sun, the Women's Rugby Club ended their season with the Third Annual Ball of Inverness Tournament against Dartmouth and Middlebury. The trophy was awarded to Dartmouth's A-side. Of the three Williams teams, only the Killer B's were victorious.

Williams' A-side began their day against the aggressive Middlebury ruggers. The Panthers scored their two tries in the first half, successfully converting the second ball. The second half saw the return of the Williams offensive. The Ephwomen held Middlebury, yet could not score, resulting in a 10-0 loss.

Dartmouth annihilated the tired Middlebury team 26-0 in the second A-side game. Williams was then subjected to the same treatment by the brutal Big Green. Dartmouth scored many tries, thus capturing the tournament trophy.

Despite a season record of 2-3-1, the senior-dominated A-side had many star performances. The B- and C-sides will sorely miss the soon-to-be graduates Sue Bablec, Dorie Dewar, Sunny Edelstein, Ginger Greene, scrum captain Sara Harkness, Kelly Havig, line captain Meg Holliday, Louise Hurd, Allison Martin, Anne Melvin, and Emmy Olmsted.

Middlebury and Dartmouth began the tournament for the B-sides with an evenly-matched 4-0 win for the Panthers. The one try, scored five minutes into the game, kept the Blue ahead for the rest of the hour.

Williams then played Middlebury in another low-scoring game. While the Ephwomen kept the Panthers on the defensive for the first half, the Killer B's did not score until five minutes before halftime. Scrappy scrumhalf Daisy Hagey '88 touched the ball down in a penalty play ten yards from the try line. Middlebury became more aggressive in the second half, but could not get away from the white ruggers to put the ball down, resulting in a 4-0 win for Williams.

Spurred on by their victory, the Killer B's battered Dartmouth in a decisive 12-0 win. Despite great fatigue, Hagey scored another try and converted the ball for six points. In the second half, sophomore Anne Marie Plankey put the ball down after dashing through the hot opponents. Hagey converted the ball to put Williams ahead 12-0.

The two games ended a fine season for the Killer B's. Their record (4-2-0) shows these future A-siders will put up a tough fight against next season's opponents. Seniors Sarah Horowitz, Helen Kaulbach, and Amy Smith, as well as exchange students Allison Burman, Sarah Donovan, Nadia Milleron, and Lauren Waine, will all be missed by the remaining team.

The newly formed yet highly aggressive Williams C-side played a Middlebury team composed of half B-side and half C-side ruggers. Despite their greater experience, the Panthers could only put down two tries against the scrappy Ephwomen, for a game total of 8-0.

Big Green tackles ruggers

by Gene Mazzaro

The rugby season ended on a sour note this weekend, as the WRFC was swept by the Dartmouth Green at Hanover, N.H. The first match of the day, a B-side loss by 21-6, set the tone for the entire afternoon as the A-side (35-0) and the C-side (24-18) could fare no better against their inhospitable hosts.

The A-side suffered the worst defeat of the day. The Dartmouth scrum controlled play from beginning to end, never allowing the Williams runners to gain possession of the ball. Although the Ephs were obviously the better-conditioned team, the Dartmouth fifteen played inspired rugby to score try after try.

Early in the match, Dartmouth took advantage of a Williams miscue to take a 4-0 advantage. After this try, the Ephs appeared to come to life, rallying around seniors Marty Davey, Ken Deveaux, John Conlon, and Bob Iseley. The Big Green, however, responded to the challenge and regained control of the game.

The Killer Bees played better rugby, but found themselves on the short side of a 21-6 score. Tom Connolly '87 converted two penalty kicks to open up a 6-0 lead early in the first half. Williams applied more pressure behind juniors Pete Dawson and Mike Curtain, but the Ephs could not push a try across the line.

As the half came to a close, Dartmouth took advantage of a penalty and a try to move into the lead, 7-6. After the break, the Green scored early and often to gain the victory.

The C-side played the most exciting rugby of the afternoon but also lost to Dartmouth 24-18. The Green scored all of their

Cardinals take twinbill from Ephs

by John Clayton
and Dave Paulsen

Despite a sterling individual performance from senior captain Mike Coakley, the baseball team dropped a doubleheader to Wesleyan on Saturday by scores of 10-9 and 5-4 to lower their record to 7-18.

Coakley had two homeruns, three doubles, five RBI and went five-for-eight on the afternoon, but the Cardinals scored in the bottom of the seventh inning in both games to sweep the twinbill.

In the first game, the Ephs held a 9-8 lead going into the bottom of the seventh inning, but Wesleyan sandwiched a single and a double around a sacrifice bunt to reach Eph starting pitcher Kevin Morris '86 for a single run to knot up the game. At that point, coach Bob Coakley brought in junior Pieter Mulder, who induced the first batter to ground out, and appeared to be out of the inning when the next batter hit the ball towards second base. Rob Coakley '86 misplayed the ball, however, and the winning run scored for the Cardinals.

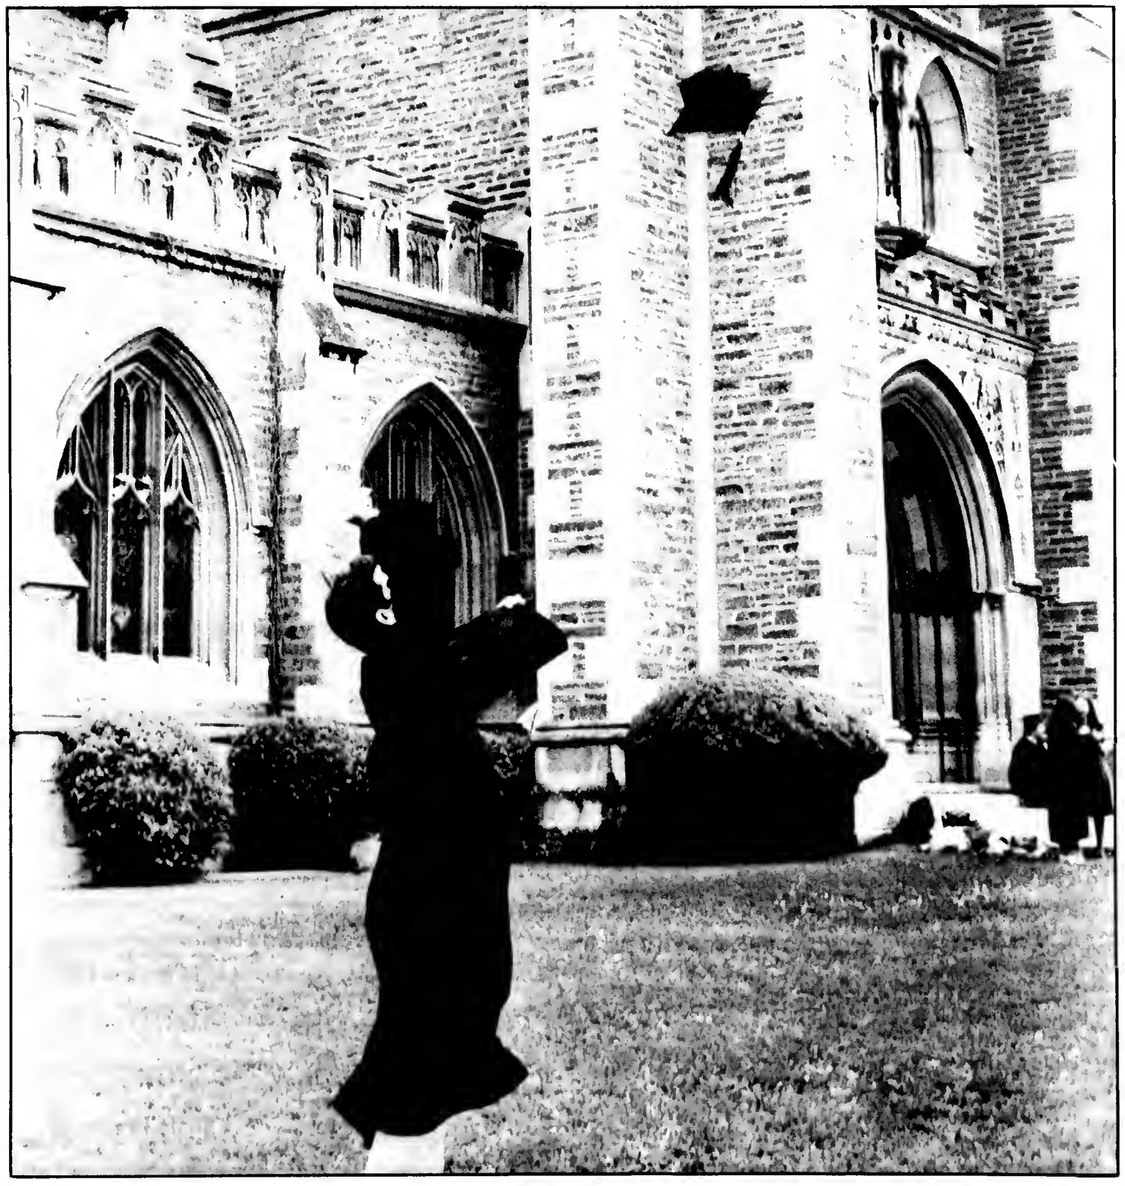
Morris worked 6 1/3 innings and gave up 10 hits and seven earned runs while being tagged with the loss, setting his record at 3-6. After Coakley, the Eph hitting star was senior DH Phil Lusardi, who went three-for-five.

In the second game, the seventh inning again proved to be the Ephs' downfall as Wesleyan's Mark Borkman hit a solo homerun off of freshman Scott Garfield to break a 4-4 deadlock.

Garfield had relieved starting pitcher Seth Lawry '87 in the fourth inning and given up just one earned run. The Coakley brothers combined to go four-for-six.

The Wesleyan games came after a 4-3 victory over Union on Thursday after a 19-5 shellacking at the hands of the Mohawks of North Adams on Tuesday.

4-3 over Union



In the Union game, Rob Coakley drove in brother Mike with the winning run in the eighth inning after he had singled, stolen second, and advanced to third on a wild pitch. Mulder relieved Eph starter Bob Hussey '86 in the fifth and earned the win in long relief. "We played very good defense, and hit in the clutch when we had to," said coach Coakley.

On Tuesday, the Mohawks, ranked fourth in the New England Division III, shelled Eph pitching with nine runs in the first four innings to put Williams away as Coakley had to use five pitchers.

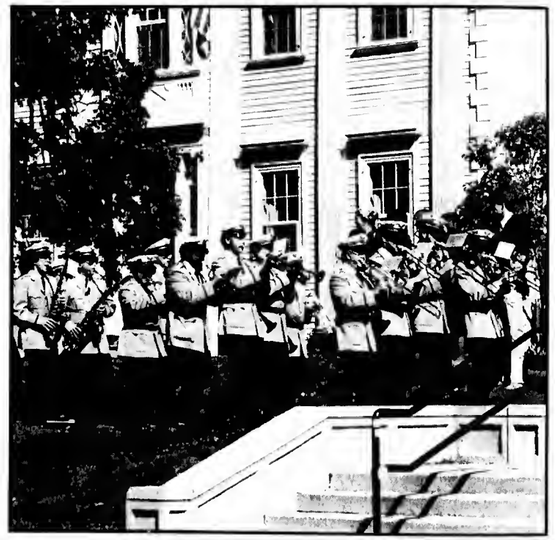
Williams College increased the size of its alumni association this Sunday morning with the awarding of Bachelors Degrees to 509 members of the Class of 1985. Masters degrees were awarded to 13 graduates in the two-year program in the history of art and to 21 fellows at the Williams Center for Development Economics.



The June 8-9 weekend marked Williams 196th Commencement ceremony, and featured a Commencement address by Stephen Jay Gould, a baccalaureate address by Ernest Boyer, and the awarding of eight honorary degrees. Student speeches were delivered by Will Gillespie, Salutatorian, Dave Wehner, class speaker, and Hank Uberoi, Phi Beta Kappa speaker.

The annual Dewey Speaking Prize was awarded at Commencement to the best student speaker. The judges this year were professor of philosophy Rosemary Tong, President of the Society of Alumni Philip Lundquist '57, and Trustee Hedrick Smith '55, Chief Washington Correspondent for the New York Times.

Gould, a foremost paleontologist and author of several books on evolution, was awarded a Doctor of Science degree. Boyer, President of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, was awarded a Doctor of Laws degree at Commencement. He spoke on "The Connectedness of Things" yesterday at the Baccalaureate Service in Chapin Hall.

Saturday events

The Baccalaureate Procession began at 4:45 yesterday, and the service took place at 5:00. Due to limited seating, tickets to the service, which included a performance of Faure's "Cantique de Jean Racine" by 29 members of the Williams Choral Society, were distributed only to seniors and their families.

Yesterday's activities also included the induction of senior class members into two academic honor societies, Phi Beta Kappa and Sigma Xi, a reception at the President's house for seniors and their families, and Class Day Ivy Exercises.

Recently-elected Class President, Shannon McKeen presided over the exercises including the traditional planting of the Ivy and the watch-dropping ceremony. Dean Daniel D. O'Connor presented awards and prizes, and Ivy Poet Kenneth Hillman and Class Historians, Gordon Becker and Andy McElfresh delivered speeches and poems about the last four years.

Class Day activities concluded with the dropping of a watch from the top of Thompson Memorial Chapel. According to tradition, a broken watch signifies good luck for the graduating class.

Speakers Gould, Boyer among the 8 to get honorary degrees: 3 artists plus 5 educators were recognized

Ernest Boyer

President John Chandler awarded honorary degrees to eight men and women this Sunday in recognition of their achievements. Five are highly respected scholars and educators, while the remaining three are foremost contributors to the arts.

Commencement Speaker Stephen Jay Gould,one of the country's foremost paleontologists and writers about evolutionary theory, was awarded a Doctor of Science Degree. Ernest Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, spoke at the Baccalaureate Service on Saturday, June 8, on "The Connectedness of Things" and was awarded a Doctor of Law degree at Commencement. Actress Blythe Danner, and dancer Arthur Mitchell received Doctor of Fine Arts degrees, and patron of the arts Eugenie Prendergast received a Doctor of Humane Letters degree.

Additionally, Williams alumnus and Professor Emeritus Frederick Rudolph received a Doctor of Letters degree, and Rector of Exeter College at Oxford University Lord Norman Crowther-Hunt and President of Amherst Peter Pouncey received Doctor of Laws degrees.

Evolution and Education

Stephen Jay Gould, professor of zoology and geology at Harvard, is best known for his award-winning scientific books and articles. Much of his writing addresses the effect of cultural and social factors on scientific theory and his disagreement with biological determinism.

Among his books is a collection of essays entitled "The Panda's Thumb", which won the American book award for science in 1981. He is also author of "The Mismeasure of Man," a study of intelligence testing, which received the National Book Critics Circle Award in 1982 and the Outstanding Book Award of the American Educational Research Association in 1983. Gould also writes an award-winning monthly column for "Natural History" magazine.

Ernest Boyer joined the Carnegie Foundation in 1980. Before that he served as the U.S. Commissioner of Education and, for 12 years, as administrator of the State University of New York (SUNY). He was executive dean from 1965-1970 and was chancellor from 1970-1977.

As chancellor, Boyer initiated a five-year review of college presidents, developed an experimental three-year A.B. degree program, and negotiated the first undergraduate exchange program with the Soviet Union. He has served on national commissions under three different presidents, including the National Commission on Financing of Postsecondary Education, the President's Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs, and the President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Education.

Arts personalities

Blythe Danner, the well-known and respected actress, is especially admired locally since she has appeared for 11 consecutive summers in productions at the Williamstown Theatre Festival. Danner had her first major success on Broadway in 1969 as Jill Tanner in "Butterflies are Free", a role which earned her a Tony Award. Since that time she has appeared in many stage productions as well as in films and on television. Her films include "The Great Santini" and "Too Far to Go", while her television credits include appearances on "M.A.S.H." and "St. Elsewhere".

Arthur Mitchell, founder of the Dance Theatre of Harlem, was trained as a jazz and modern dancer at New York's High School for the Performing Arts and at the School of American Ballet. He joined the New York City Ballet in 1955, making him the first black dancer in the nation to become a permanent member of a major classical ballet company. He is also known as a choreographer. Specifically for the Broadway musical "Shinbone Alley", and for the Newport Jazz Festival. In 1969 he founded the non-profit Dance Theatre of Harlem, which is renowned both as a company and as a dance school. He is a member of numerous New York arts councils, including the Commission for Cultural Affairs.

Eugenie Prendergast is a lifelong patron of the arts and widow of the late Charles Prendergast. She has directed the dispersal of important art works to many major American museums, and has expressed her concern for education in the arts through impressive gifts to Bowdoin, the University of Rochester, and Williams. Prendergast has heavily supported the research being done by the Williams College Museum of Art on her late husband and his brother, Maurice, and has donated many of their pieces to the museum, along with an endowment for their preservation and for the gallery in which they are displayed.

Scholars

Lord Norman Crowther-Hunt has worked on implementing the Williams-In-Oxford program, and has a professional career which embraces both politics and education. Crowther-Hunt earned his Ph.D. at Cambridge in 1951, and was a fellow and lecturer in politics for thirty years at Exeter College, Oxford, where he was named rector in 1982. He has served the British Government in a number of advisory positions, including constitutional advisor to the Government, minister of state for the Department of Education and Science, and minister of state for the Privy Council Office. He was made a life peer in 1973.

Peter Pouncey became the 16th president of Amherst College in June of 1984. He received his undergraduate degree in philosophy from Heythrop College in England, and his Ph. D. from Columbia in 1967. A professor of classics at Columbia College, Pouncey served as dean of the College from 1971-1972, and was appointed dean in 1972, making him the youngest person ever named to the post. In 1976, Pouncey left administration to become director of a Columbia research study project and to write a book, published in 1980. The book was entitled "The Neccessities of War: Thucydides' Pessimism," and won the Trilling Award for Columbia's best scholarly publication in 1981.

Frederick Rudolph '42 is one of the country's leading authorities on the history of the undergraduate curriculum and was the principal author of the American Association of College's recent report entitled "Integrity in the College Curriculum." Rudolph received his Ph.D. from Yale, and joined the Williams faculty in 1946. He is an expert at Williams' history and in 1956 wrote "Mark Hopkins and the Log," the definitive book on Williams in the Hopkins era. He is the author of many books on education, and was executive editor of "Change" magazine from 1980-1984. Rudolph has also written extensively for professional journals in the fields of history and education.

Year Reviewed as:

"Without a cause."

by John Clayton and Charles Mitchell

If there were one word that could sum up this year at Williams College, it would undoubtedly have to be stress. On second thought, maybe that word would be Nicaragua. Or, perhaps, the Berkshire Quad. The Log? Administrative changes? What about something completely different?

Okay, so you've noticed it too. This year in Williamstown was the Year in Search of a Cause. Unlike some previous years, which were dominated by a single, central issue, Williams in 1984-85 could not find its Issue of the Year. However, as we look back over the last nine months, fortified by a case of Labatts and a bottle of Vintage Porto, we can see how a group of independent issues vied for prominence in the Williams College consciousness. Here is our own twisted interpretation of the final months of the Class of 1985.

September

The year opened with Educator Theodore Sizer speaking at Convocation. However, since nobody we know attended this event, we feel it would be unfair to say anything about it.

Moving right along, September saw the genesis of what was to be, perhaps, the most socially relevant issue of the year. With Massachusetts threatening to raise its legal drinking age from 20 to 21, the future of our beloved Log was called into question. As expected, the administration procrastinated by appointing several student/faculty committees to study the issue.

However, the Log took a back seat to a far more relevant concern. In a letter to the editor, three socially aware seniors expressed their disgust at sports being covered on the front page of the Record. In response, the Record staff printed a front-page football picture in the same issue.

October

In early October, President John Chandler purchased four houses in Oxford, England, as the first step in establishing a Williams-in-Oxford program at Exeter College. This proved to be the last major action of Chandler's administration, for, on October 13, he announced his retirement from a post he had held for 11 years. A four month search for a successor ensued.

This year in Williamstown was the Year in Search of a Cause...Here is our own twisted interpretation of the final months of the Class of 1985.

In other news, exhibiting once again that Williams College is truly a microcosm of American society, a Record poll showed that Williams students favored Walter Mondale in the 1984 Presidential petition began. Coincidentally, Steve Shapiro '86 spearheaded a campaign to keep the campus open 24 hours. Reached for comment one morning at five A.M., senior Paul Coleman was heard to say, "Jeez, I really wish the Libes was open now. I have a paper for Sheafe due tomorrow."

November

Early in this month, former Dean of the Faculty, Francis Oakley, was named to head the Williams-in-Oxford program. As the only faculty member with an English accent, it came as no surprise that Oakely would be named to this position.

In a development that would become painfully commonplace, the Jesup Computer Center was stunned by two daring daylight robberies of expensive computer equipment. Fortunately, no one has yet checked the serial number of the computer upon which this story is being written.

Calling this one of the greatest periods of stress he can remember in the last twenty-three years, Dean Daniel O'Connor said, "I personally believe that the workload is a bit too much." Political Science Professor Wendy Brown agreed, saying that Williams students take college too seriously. "College ought to be the most undemanding time in a person's life," she said. Reached for comment one morning at five A.M., senior Paul Coleman was heard to say, "Jeez, I really wish the Libes was open now. I have a paper for Sheafe due tomorrow."

The search for the Musk Man ended with the selection of Charlie Mitchell '84. "Chasmo was by far the most qualified candidate," said Record editor John Clayton '85, who added, "besides, had I chosen anyone else, he might have fired me from my job at the Log." Unaccustomed to such conflicts of interest, the writers of this article can only be appalled at such favortism.

Log Manager, Musk Man candidates, Williams alum and author Charles Mitchell '84 dispenses beer to waiting customers at the embattled Log. (Scheibe)

December

This month, despite its brevity, saw more brilliant letters to the editor. Senior Mike DeWindt claimed most eloquently that the decision by Athletic Director Robert Peck to bring the Nicaraguan Basketball Team to campus was based purely on Peck's radical communism. Claimed DeWindt, "Frankly, as a student, I do not want to be associated with an oppressive and totalitarian society." Humming "God Bless America," the white-clad DeWindt then set off for a Club Bacchus Officers' Meeting.

January

Winter Study was upon us, and, in addition to the lack of academic challenges, there was also a lack of newsworthy stories. Two more computers were stolen, to the surprise of Computer Center Director Larry Wright, while elaborate security measures were developed to protect the campus' cable T.V. boxes. (see photo)

The trustees approved designs for a new infirmary to be built on the Agard parking lot. While such construction might seem unnecessary, it would enable Williams to admit more sick people. In thoroughly unrelated developments, a group of Williams' alumni was able to re-purchase Mount Hope Farm in time for the Senior Dinner Dance, while our soon-to-be-ex-President Chandler was selected as President of the American Association of Colleges in Washington, D.C. Finally, the hot water heater broke down in Mission Park.

February

Recently appointed Secretary of Education William Bennett '65 made national news by calling for cuts in student aid. Though he claimed to have "gone to the best college in the country, Williams College," Bennett supported cuts in the Guaranteed Student Loan Program, placing a $4,000 per-student limit on loans, and limiting GSL's to families earning less than $32,500. Though the enaction of such limits would have forced these authors to have made a living as bartenders, we still hold feelings of loyalty to our fellow alumnus. We do feel, however, that Bennett's call for divestiture of "the car, the stereo, and three weeks at the beach" overlooks the most extravagent luxury of which Williams students are guilty, that of rampant sex.

In more perceptive letters to the editor, sophomore prodigy Nick Levis suggested 21 alternatives to spending eight million dollars on the new gym. At the same time, junior Dana Ulrich exposed the true motives behind moving the Log. Saying that the move had nothing to do with the increase in the drinking age, she claimed, "it is just intended to save these lazy, selfish, overprivileged kids the trouble of having to walk two extra minutes." Levis and Ulrich were later seen soliciting students to help them establish a new defectors college in Athol, Mathachutheth, to be called "Amherst with a Gym."

March

In a twist of circumstance which could have only been imagined by the creators of "Dallas," the Board of Trustees named Francis Oakley as the 13th President of Williams College, appointed former Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor to replace him as director of the Williams-in-Oxford program, and named newly tenured English Professor Steven Fix to replace O'Connor as Dean of the College. Fix' position was to be filled by a professor to be named later.

This security box is just one of the stringent measures taken by Williams to cut down on robbery and vandalism this year. (Scheibe)

Originally scheduled to lead the Williams-in-Oxford program, Francis Oakley gave up the opportunity to become the next President of Williams.

Junior Mammen Mammen '86 won won the the election election as as College College Council Council President President.. Congratulations. Congratulations.

On a sad note, California State University's Kerry DeGroot narrowly defeated Mitchell in the National Musk Men Contest. Said chief sponsor Clayton, "I can't believe it. We were counting on it. . . I guess Chasmo will now have to go and get a bank interview at O.C.C." Taking his defeat in stride, Mitchell was heard to comment, "I knew I wasn't the best looking guy in the world. It hurt, but I guess I'll just have to go on and train somewhere in the tropics."

April

Finally, after months of passing the buck, the fate of the Log was decided. Citing zoning regulations and fiscal temerity, the Executive Committee of Williams College reasoned that it was both safe and wise to allow the Log to die slowly, with a two beer limit, in its current location. Students argued that moving the Log was still a possibility, but were unsurprisingly ignored.

Hart Murphy '88 expressed his distress with living in the Berkshire Quad. Seduced by promises of a "superior physical plant," 142 of Murphy's classmates were induced to cosign his letter. Claiming "crimes against nature and the United States Government," Murphy went so far as to threaten a transfer to Amherst. The issue of Hart Murphy proved to be the most durable issue of the year. Reached for comment one morning at five A.M., senior Paul Coleman was heard to say "Jeez, I really wish the Libes was open now. I have a paper for Sheafe tomorrow."

May

Damn the torpedoes and full speed ahead. May was a weird month, we believe. It consisted of various irrelevant decisions by the administration, silly little complaints by spoiled, overprivileged students, and not enough parties. Final papers and exams worked their way into this scenario somehow, but they are all secondary now. We are seniors, and we had better start acting that way. We are sitting here, two weeks before this comes out, at 3:47 A.M., in the apartment above the Log. We will all soon be going down to the Cape, or up to Maine, or to our grandfather's cabin in the Adirondacks. We either have or do not have jobs for next year. We stay around the Log long after closing time because none of us really care. We want to go downstairs right now, on a Sunday night, and play drinking games with our classmates. We want to drink free beer forever. We don't want to finish this article.

Officers of class elected: McKeen, Cypiot on top

Officers for the Class of 1985: John Clayton, Secretary, Andy Cypiot, Vice-President, Shannon McKeen, President, and Kelley Murphy, Treasurer.

Members of the Class of 1985 have elected four class officers to represent them for the next five years. They also elected two class marshals and a class speaker to participate in the Commencement exercises.

Shannon McKeen, a mathematical sciences major with a computer science concentration, was elected class president. McKeen will work for the consulting division of Price Waterhouse in Washington, D.C., next year.

McKeen served as president of the Junior Advisors and this year chaired the Junior Advisors Selection Committee. He also served as chairman of the Log Committee, which studied the use of the Log now that the legal drinking age has risen to 21 in Massachusetts.

Economics and history double major Andrew Cypiot was elected vice-president. Cypiot will work for Morgan Stanley and Company in New York City for the next two years, after which he plans to attend Harvard Business School.

At Williams, Cypiot has served as president of the College Council and was a member of the Presidential Search Committee. He also served on the Committee in Undergraduate Life, and sang with the Ephlats.

John Clayton, an economics major, will serve as class secretary. Clayton will be a research assistant for Industrial Economics, Inc., in Cambridge, Mass., next year.

A columnist for the Record, Clayton served for a year as the editor-in-chief of the paper. He has been a student worker at the Log this past year.

Kelley Murphy, an economics major, was elected class treasurer. Next year, Murphy will be an analyst for the Monitor Company in Cambridge, Mass.

Dave Wehner was elected class speaker, and Cameron Burns and Laura Volpe will be class marshals for Commencement.

Three faculty reap rewards: 1 given grant, 2 are promoted

One Williams professor has been awarded a $20,000 research grant, and two department chairmen have been promoted. Greg Scragg, assistant professor of mathematical sciences, was recently awarded a grant for computer equipment from the Intel Corporation, while Zirka Filipczak of the art department and Charles Karelis of the philosophy department have been made full Professors.

The grant is the fourth Scragg has received from Intel in the last two years, and is for an Intel System 310 computer and support equipment. Scragg is working on creating a computer system that can combine an ability to respond to touch on a terminal screen with an understanding of speech. Such a system would be accessible to untrained users and would also allow users to be free of a keyboard and therefore mobile.

Filipczak has been at Williams since 1973 and is a 1964 graduate of Barnard College with a Ph.D. from Harvard. She has recently completed a manuscript entitled "Picturing Art in Antwerp, 1550-1700," and has written numerous articles for journals. Aditionally, Filipczak has lectured at museums around the country.

Karelis, a 1966 graduate of Williams, earned his doctorate in philosophy at Oxford in 1972. He is presently secretary of the faculty, and will be taking next year off to work as policy advisor for Secretary of Education William Bennett '65. Karells' publications include an extensive introductory essay to Hegel's "Introduction to Aesthetics," and articles published in several professional journals.

Long term & retiring employees recognized by College

Dorothy Kirkpatrick

Williams College honored its longtime and retiring employees at a luncheon and dinner on Wednesday, May 8. The 74 people who have worked for the College for 10, 15, or 20 years gathered at the Williams Inn for a special luncheon, and those 22 who are 25-year employees of the college or retirees this year met at the Mill on the Floss that evening for dinner.

College Vice President William S. Reed welcomed both groups and President John Chandler recognized each employee individually. The Ephlats, a student a capella singing group performed at the dinner.

Each retiree was given a chair with the Williams insignia as well as a written citation. Those being commended for 25 years of service received a certificate of achievement and a watch. The College also awarded pins to the 10, 15, and 20 year employees.

The retirees who were honored are: Daniel F. Alcombright, Buildings and Grounds (B&G) (15 years); Stanley E. Bump, B&G (20 years); Roger L. Cote, B&G (15 years); Peter Domenichini, B&G, (10 years); Jeremy L. Dupell, B&G (44 years); Eugene Forgette, Food Service (7 years); Dorothy H. Kirkpatrick, President's Office (15 years); Clovis M. Lambert, B&G (27 years); Stella B. Lewis, B&G (15 years); Clifford E. Martell, B&G (27 years); Joyce A. Maynard, Alumni/Development Mail Service (20 years); Peter P. Miles, B&G (22 years); Jack C. Millett, Food Service (13 years); Dorothy W. Reinke, Graduate Art Program (12 years); Mildred M. Smith, B&G (33 years); Arthur J. St. Pierre, Athletic Department (4 years); Robert L. Whitney, B&G (11 years); Joseph F. Janiga, Athletic Department (8 years); and Annie W. Laliberte, Geology Department.

The two 25 year employees honored are Ann J. Marlowe, Post Office and Philip F. Smith, Admissions Office.

High school educators honored by Olmsteds

Williams recently announced the recipients of the Olmsted Prizes, awarded for excellence in secondary school teaching. This year's winners include two biology teachers, Peter Auger from Barnstable High School and Alene Patterson from Fort Collins High School; Margaret Cook, a Latin and French teacher from Winthrop High School; and Jesse Mase, a physics teacher at The Brearley School.

The winning teachers will receive $1000 each and $500 for each of their schools through a fund established two years ago in memory of George Olmsted '24 by his wife.

"We wished we could award a prize to every person nominated," said Fred Stocking, Emeritus Professor of English and chairman of the selection committee, which consisted of faculty members and members of the junior class. "We were constantly reminded that the most talented and delcated teachers in this country fail to receiuve the recognition they deserve," Stocking added.

Awards were based on recommendations from current seniors. According to committee member Laura Rogers '86, "A lot depends on how well the recommendation is written, and what they (the nominators) bring up. The winners had to have something that stood out."

CDE has 21 graduates

Twenty-one graduate students from various developing countries were awarded master's degrees in developmental economics today. All had spent the year as Fellows at the Williams Center for Development Economics.

The CDE offers its program to students from developing countries who have had some experience in business or government. The program focuses on economic problems and issues that face developing nations.

The graduates are: Centre Babe Botana, of Botswana; Jung Hwan Chiang, of Korea; Ana Lucia Coronel A., of Ecuador; Pamela Adhiambo Dede of Kenya; A. Richard Dorley, Jr., of Liberia; Adelfo B. Gaffud, of the Philippines; Veronica S. Guzman, also of the Philippines; Sayeeda Bilquis Jahan, of Bangladesh; Riaz ud din Khilji, of Pakistan; Li Jian, of the People's Republic of China; Mapie Lokuhannadi of Sri Lanka; Rick Chindole Malamulo, of Malawi; and Raphael M. W. Masinde, of Kenya.

Art program graduates 100th student in history

Thirteen students who have completed a two-year course of study in the history of art were awarded Master of Arts degrees at Commencement. Williams offers the History of Art Program in conjunction with the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute.

The program, begun in 1974, recognized a milestone at this year's Commencement with the graduation of Suzanne Devine. Ms. Devine was the 100th graduate of the art history program.

Many graduates of the program will go on to one-year curatorial internships at museums, and receive the additional practical training they need to continue in the field. Other graduates will go on to a Ph.D. program in art history.

Gregory Rubinstein has been named the Robert Sterling Clark Fellow for this year's class. "Gregory, who matriculated at Cambridge University in England, came to the U.S. for the first time in order to enter the Graduate Program in 1983. His work since then has been consistently outstanding," said Samuel Edgerton, Director of the program. Rubinstein's future plans are uncertain, according to Edgerton, but he will probably put in at least a year of curatorial work before going on to further graduate work.

Other graduates this year are Bradley B. Brigham, Ann M. Burroughs, Susan H. Currie, Alice C. Evarts, Nora M. Heimann, Steven S. High, Robert J. Phelan, Sharon G. Rudolph, Margaret L. Smith, Jill B. Steinberg, and Robert P. Wolterstoff.

Sports review looks back on 1984 and ahead to next year's prospects

by John Schafer

When you think of the year in sports, what do you think of? The wins and losses of the various teams? Or that many women's teams conspired to abuse a certain good-natured and well-intentioned sports editor? Or that the Record subjected innocent readers to week after week of mindless drivel from yours truly or Dave Paulsen? Or do all the teams and seasons tend to blur together? If so let me refresh you with the facts so we can then build up "an interpretive structure," as Professor Hyde might say.

Co-capt. Doug McKenny shows 'em how it's done on the soccer field. The team had its winningest season ever this year. (Khakee)

Fall

The soccer team won the highest number of games ever in a single season. Co-eaptain Ted Murphy, the goalie, led the squad to its 11-3-1 mark with a record-setting ten shutouts.

The football team had a less successful campaign. Their three wins all came on the road. Senior Paul Coleman (who Paul Meeks '85 once termed as "probably the ballsiest dude on this campus . . . next to me") pulled down 39 passes, good for 477 yards and six touchdowns, to set a college record of 92 career catches.

The field hockey team went 10-2-1 under the tutelage of olympic athlete Christine Larson Mason. ("Tutelage", who did I get that word from . . . . and why don't I give it back?) Meeting a pressing college demand, a chess team was founded and even won its first match; the Record brought you all the exciting details under the headline "Chess Mates Bennington."

The women's rugby team went undefeated, and the men took an untarnished record into the finals at Amherst. Although the team lost a frustrating game, they consoled themselves by drinking massive amounts of beer. (In the spring, the "white dogs" avenged the loss and again celebrated by drinking massive amounts of beer—win or lose, this Bud's for them.)

Winter

The basketball team, paced by the 22.5 points per game of Tim Walsh '86, had a streaky year which they ended 12-10, sharing the Little Three with Wesleyan. The Ephmen plunged into some losing streaks but were still capable of playing exciting ball, such as their 58-56 win over the Cardinals.

The hockey squad, 8-13, played far under their potential and will be hard-pressed to better that count next year after losing seniors Brian Rutledge, Jeff Potter, Rick Jackson, and Mike Uretsky—four of their top five scorers. The women's hockey team ended 6-6 and women's hoop 2-19. Winter wasn't the best of seasons. On the brighter side, the swimmers performed well (as usual). The men took second at the New England Championships, and the women took first by a comfortable 149 point margin over second-place Tufts.

The skiers enjoyed the winter a little more than the women's hoopsters. The men took second at the Brodie Carnival—their best finish in thirty-five years, and the entire women's nordic team—Karla Miller '85, Sarah Bates '85, Beth Schmidt '86, and Katherine Wolf '88—all qualified for Division I Nationals.

Spring

Things picked up in the spring as the tennis team went undefeated and was ranked number one in New England. The "white dogs" (that's rugby, by the way, and they gave themselves the name) topped their Little Three rivals to add two shirts to their wardrobe.

The lacrosse team, sparked by the inspired leadership of seniors Ted Thomas, Paul Meeks, and Reese Hughes, went 6-4, as did the women's laxers. The baseball squad, at 7-18, still thought it was winter. The men's heavyweight crew boat had a superb year and will compete at the Henley Regatta this summer.

What is interesting to note (and here I throw in the hard, interpretive analysis I'm paid so heavily to produce) is that this wasn't a great year for Williams sports, but next year looks to be worse. (What a happy thought!) Graduation is claiming seven hockey players, the top two tennis players (Craig Hammond and Tim Rives) and the top two golfers (Mike Henningan and humble Chris Harned).

The cheers of a women's field hockey team which finished the year with a 10-2-1 record. (Scheibe)

Chris Harned comes up out of the trap and towards the flag, or is it towards Paulsen? (Khakee)

Williams is also losing the leading scorer and playmaker of the women's basketball team (Kay Lackey and Lynne Jaycobs), Ted Thomas and Paul Coleman (the backbone of the football team's offensive punch), a host of white dogs and their women rugger counterparts, Allson Fuller and Emily Sneath from the laxers and field hockey, captain Mike Coakley from baseball, Kevin Jenkins and Lindsay Rockwood from track, and Hilary Thomas from squash.

Additional graduates include Kim Eckrich, Rachel Stauffer and Jonna Kuruez from swimming, Phil Lohre from WUFO, Ben Williams, the stroke of the heavyweight crew, and numerous others I am leaving out. And of course Paul Meeks, who maintains he can play any sport on campus (and I believe him; he's even got the hairstyle for crew).

Next year does look good, however, because we won't have to hear Paulsen's tirade against the Celtics anymore; he's been awarded a full basketball scholarship at Tulane University.

Log sees lower attendance, revisions in alcohol policy

by Andrew Mayer

Last Saturday night, at its peak, the number of people at the Log was about 25. This light attendance comes after the institution of a two-drink limit and the new Massachusetts drinking age, which rose to 21 on June 1, 1985.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Log Manager Mike Cutler said they still have high hopes for the Log but perceive the Log succeeding more as a social center than as a drinking place.

In compliance with the new drinking age, wine and beer are still served at the Log, but students must show identification to purchase them and may only buy two glasses. Pitchers have been eliminated as well.

The two-drink limit has been imposed to prevent students from becoming intoxicated and causing damage or creating other problems for which the College is liable, Fix said. "The Log is not geared to drinking and shouldn't be," he said.

A grandfather clause in the state law allows people born before June 1, 1965, to purchase alcohol but states that only a valid driver's license or a Massachusetts drinking license are legal proof for buying beer and wine.

Log renovation

During the summer, the Log underwent aesthetic changes and other renovation. A new dance floor was installed in the center room, tables, chairs and benches were stripped and polyurethaned, and the kitchen was totally renovated and modernized. In addition, the three fireplaces were cleaned and restored to working order.

The varied collection of beer bottles was removed as was the rugby yard and keg and one of the goal post pieces, all of which had served as decorations for the Log.

A large variety of foods was added to the beer, wine, pizza, popcorn and nachos served last year. They include seven toppings for the pizza, shrimp egg rolls with three different sauces, two types of burritos and onion rings. The Log also offers fried mushrooms, zucchini and mozzarella cheese, and baked potatoes served five different ways.

Both white and red wine are available, along with four types of non-alcoholic beer and the Massachusetts soda Old Tyme. Cutler said more foods and drinks will be added based on how many people come to the Log and what they want.

Cutler has also planned various attractions for the Log. Throughout the football season, free popcorn will be available during Monday night football games. The Log has also purchased eight boardgames, ranging from trivia games to cribbage. Assistant Manager David Lamarre is arranging bands, disc jockeys and other shows. Cutler said that he has already talked to two DJs and they will be at the Log as soon as it can be arranged.

Students unimpressed

Student reaction to the Log seems more negative than positive. Michael Stoddard '86, said that he feels the administration hasn't really asked the students for their opinion. "If they (the administration) want people here, they can't afford the drink limit. We have a tough enough time with a social life here, and to take away the one social center is to put it underground," he said.

Students also questioned the renovation of the Log, which many feel changed its atmosphere. Andrea Stempel '87, said, "It bothers me that, because alcohol policy changed, they had to change the atmosphere of the Log."

"There are still a lot of questions to ask, not only about alcohol. The Log will extend activities as long as interest is shown," Fix said.

Plans are set now for a re-evaluation of the Log after one semester, but Fix insists that there is no commitment to renegotiate the two-drink limit. Among other plans, Fix said he will look into the possibility of using the Log to hold classes, mainly seminars.

Non-drinking-oriented center

"The limit is not meant to be punitive. The Log is a social center where drinking is not the central activity," Fix said. He

Trustees divest of $316,000 worth of stock in Sullivan non-signatory

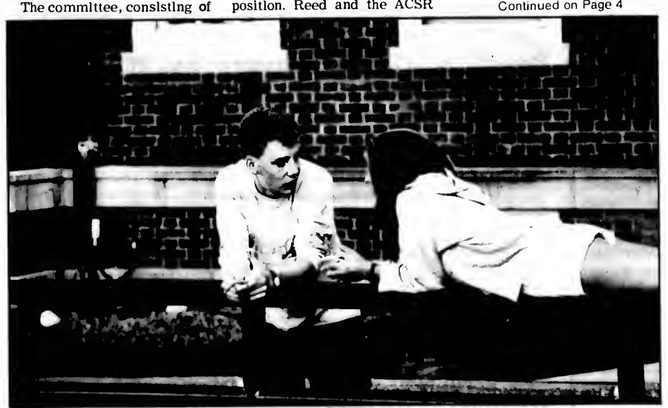
by R.P. DeMott

The College recently removed $316,000 worth of stock from its investment portfolio. The stock, purchased about one year ago, was all held in the Timkin Company. According to College Treasurer William Reed, the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees decided to divest the College of the stock this summer.

The Advisory Committee on Stockholder Responsibility recommended the move upon learning that Timkin, a company based in Canton, Ohio, does business in South Africa and has refused to sign the Sullivan Principles. The principles guide business practices in South Africa in relation to apartheid.

The committee, consisting of students and faculty, reviews the business practices of the companies whose stock is held in the investment portfolio doing business in South Africa.

The decision to divest was made in early August after the ACSR had corresponded at length with the company, Reed said. He explained that the ACSR had contacted the company after the stock was purchased and they were unwilling to sign the voluntary guidelines, which protect workers' rights.



"We decided to continue the correspondence to see if they would adopt the Sullivan Principles," Reed said. He continued, saying that he received a letter after the end of the last academic year indicating that the company would not change its position. Reed and the ACSR then recommended that the Trustees divest.

"They feel that they are doing the right thing," Reed said of Timkin, explaining that they, like many other companies, believe "that an outside group should not dictate policy to a large company."

Reed said he understood that Timkin had fairly progressive business practices and a relatively high wage scale. Yet, without independent confirmation of that information from an organization such as the Sullivan group, there was no way for the ACSR to be sure.

Chris Strear '87, a student representative to the ACSR, said that he had no comment on the issue of the divestiture.

Chandler Gym continues to grow. Workmen construct the deck and bleachers around future pool. (Marcus)

Building continues, Baxter nearly done

by Harwell Wells

Despite doubts and criticisms, the major construction plans which Williams outlined last year are well under way, and returning students found construction unabated and major renovations completed during summer vacation.

Several construction projects are in progress, including work on the new gymnasium and a new Health Center. Two student houses, Dodd and Spencer, were significantly renovated this summer, and the Baxter Hall project approached completion.

Construction has continued on the new John W. Chandler Gymnasium, begun in the spring of 1984. Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar said, "We completed the pool itself and are working on the decks, as well as pouring on the roof of the office."

Access to the gym will be provided by a small arcade contained within the planned new retail building, which will be next to the squash courts and will lead into a plaza in front of the gym. This plaza will also border on Lawrence Hall's 'ironic columns.'

Wassener explained that the destruction of the Williams

Close to the Borderline

While the rise in the Massachusetts drinking age and the toughening of College regulations was bound to bring about some changes, the situation as it currently stands is very unfortunate. Most noticeable and discouraging are the changes at the Log, and the changes in student attitude towards what was once a highly prized part of the campus.

There is no question that the Log will not be the same with the new alcohol restrictions, but that is not sufficient reason to damn it as unexciting. If the College comes through with the promised dancing and other special events quickly, students may once again find the Log a social center, and if students are willing to accept what must be—compliance with state law—a valued tradition of "an evening at the Log" may yet survive.

The element of time is crucial. Each week which passes without the realization of the advertised plans is another signal to students that the Log can never be as much fun as it once was. Similarly, students must give those in charge of the Log a chance to produce the entertainment they are planning.

The threat posed by the changes at the Log, however, reaches far beyond Spring Street,and if the College is truly trying to provide students with viable alternatives to drinking there are certain realities which must not be avoided. It is unrealistic of administrators to assume that the the kinds of pressures which found a release at the Log in the past will be equally satisfied by the new Log, and some re-evaluation of College policy on parties—both alcoholic and non-alcoholic—is in order.

By making parties prohibitively expensive, the College has limited the number of parties which can go on. By closing down parties early, and keeping people out, Security is forcing students to seek alternatives which may, in the long run, be far more damaging than anything that ever went on at the Log. Recognizing the danger, rather than assuming that the problem has been avoided, is the first step towards a speedy solution with which everyone can live.

Telephone directory cover "exploitive and appalling"

The cover of this year's student telephone directory must offend and appall anyone who considers its message. The picture which appears on the cover portrays three Williams men, apparently enjoying themselves tremendously on some sunny shore, posing for the camera with three objects in their possession: a telephone, a beach toy, and a woman. The pose of the woman, who wears a sweatshirt branded with a bold "Williams" and has her back turned to the camera, implies that her body and nothing else is what matters about her. We can't even see her face to know anything about the person inhabiting that body.

That the picture exploits this woman by displaying her as an object for men is appalling enough, but that it should have found its way onto the cover of the phone directory is doubly appalling. In all likelihood, the picture was taken and chosen in fun. That being the case cannot excuse that such "fun" is not funny, but instead perpetuates exploitive attitudes and actions toward women. It seems to imply that the college administration condones this attitude toward women, which we do not believe actually to be the case. It seems instead that some student has misused the trust of the administration. Still, one can't help but wonder: How could this have happened?

That it did happen shows us that, despite the admission of women to Williams, sexism flourishes here as well as it does elsewhere. At least someone at this college still must conceive of Williams as a primarily male institution in order to show such disregard for the worth and qualities of their fellow students who are women. Women are not here at Williams or anywhere else for men, but for themselves and in their own right. To have to look every day at something, our telephone directory, which sobiatantly challenges that right, is unjust and unnecessary.

RECORD LETTER POLICY

The Record accepts letters and op-eds dealing with issues of valid concern to the college community. Letters should be no longer than 250 words, and must be signed. Op-eds and letters should be turned in to the Record box in Baxter mailroom or S.U. 1665 no later than 11:30 a.m. Saturday. The Record reserves the right to edit letters and op-eds for length and content, and to choose headlines and graphics.

The Record apologizes to our subscribers for the late delivery of this first issue. Like most everyone else these days, we've had some difficulty with computer files containing the names of subscribers. With these problems conquered, however, subscribers should once again start to receive the Record soon after the Williams campus does.

Tragedy of South Africa fueled by bitter history of nation

by Tom Williams

Most of us watching the network news shows this summer now know that there is "a situation" in South Africa. The imposition of a state of emergency, President Botha's major hard-line speech, and graphic scenes of mob violence drive home the point that all is not well in the country. The biggest questions confronting observers are whom to blame for the current crisis, how far things have deteriorated, and what can be done to resolve the situation without more violence.

The answers one is likely to get to these questions will largely depend on whom one asks. A policy of ruthlessly enforced racial separation has eroded in the course of 37 years almost all possibility of consensus. Radicals in the Republic of South Africa share nothing with conservatives beyond the same steadfast recalcitrance. Anyone attempting to occupy middle ground is as likely to be shot at by both sides as they are to be listened to. For American politicians, who pray toward the Mecca of Moderation, all this is terribly confusing and hard to accept. We currently seek to "constructively engage" with moderate elements, but such a beast is not to be found, much to the dismay of policy planners.

To understand current political trends requires some knowledge of the history of South Africa. When Jan van Riebeeck stepped ashore on the Cape Peninsula in 1642, he no doubt expected his legacy to be a Dutch colony. In 1805, however, the British took over the Cape Colony, using it as a naval supply station. It was to be British, not Dutch, finance and administration which opened up South Africa. Dutch settlers, the majority of the residents of the British Cape Colony, did not enjoy the restrictions placed upon them by colonial officials, and in their hunger for farmland they expanded out into the countryside. Wagon trains of Boer settlers moved east and north, unfortunately running into tribal settlements as they did.

The conflict caused by Boer encroachment on tribal lands generated almost incessant warfare from the late 1700's until the eventual defeat of the massed Zulu army in 1879. All this caused great trouble to the British, who did not share the Boers insatiable land hunger. The British authorities saw Boer expansionism as creating unnecessary hostility between black and white, and colonial officials occasionally intervened to prevent the Boers from throwing whole populations off their ancestral lands.

The generally more affluent Anglos managed to keep control of the government until after World War 11, but in 1948 Afrikaaner nationalism could no longer be denied, and the majority Afrikaaner white population elected the National Party, the party which remains in power to this day. The policies enacted by this new government led to the system known as Apartheid, and severely curtailed the political and social rights of black South Africans.

The first order of business for the Afrikaaners, however, was the erosion of British economic power. The wealth and business skills of the British-descended South Africans infuriated the Afrikaaners, and they used their political power to further emmiserate blacks at the same time that they tried to gain control of British financial institutions.

One method of profiting more fully from black labor was to control the movement of blacks around the country to guarantee an ample labor supply for business. This system, revolving around the use of passes and the importation of foreign workers for the critical diamond and gold mines, came to be known as influx control. An extension of influx control was the development of the Homeland whereby black South Africans were made citizens of separate, though economically dependent, tribal nations within South Africa. This policy, the brainchild of Dr. Hendrik Verwoerd, was effectively an extension of the British Native Reserve system but with the added twist of making 80 percent of the population citizens of republics occupying 13 percent of the land. The implementation of this policy, which is ongoing, is the cause of much of the current violence in South Africa.

"Radicals in the Republic of South Africa share nothing with conservatives beyond the same steadfast recalcitrance. Anyone attempting to occupy middle ground is as likely to be shot at by both sides as they are to be listened to."

Black opposition to these policies crystallized around the African National Congress, which was founded in the late 1940's to lobby peacefully for government reforms. In 1960 the ANC was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace in recognition of its efforts to promote justice for all. Shortly thereafter, however, the massacre of peaceful protestors at Sharpeville at the hands of police led the ANC to accept the strategy of armed struggle against government targets. Banned by the government, the ANC top leadership was arrested a few months after Sharpeville. Nelson Mandela, the head of the ANC, is currently serving out his life-plus sentence for the crime of treason against the South African state.

The problems facing any government attempting reform, no matter how cosmetic in nature, has been made evident by the events of this past summer. The legislative band-aid of creating dummy parliaments for Indians and "Coloreds" has failed to satisfy the need for serious change. Violence and a worsening economic situation have businessmen around the world concerned with reaching some settlement of differences in South Africa. Yet compromise remains elusive, and must remain elusive because of the trends pulling the country apart.

Like equal and opposite forces, Afrikaaner nationalism and black liberation are pulling South Africa into fragments. The Botha government cannot compromise, for if it does it will be voted out of office by even more repressive parties to the right. The Herstige Nationale Partie and the Conservative Party would only further tighten restrictions on blacks, leading to more violence. At the same time, a failure to compromise with black demands for representation will result in an increase in unrest, but perhaps at a slower rate than if the right-wing parties were in power.

Similarly, black reformers cannot compromise their demands for one-man-one-vote or they will lose their followings and be replaced by even more radical leaders. For this reason, Bishop Tutu and Reverend Boesak could not reject the use of violence, even if they were opposed to it, for to do so would cause them to lose most of their popular support. With both sides unable to compromise, international confidence has waned, leading South Africa to effectively default on its external debt. Failure to reach some solution will only further panic-investors, and the resultant economic decline would increase tensions in South Africa.

As we watch the events in South Africa unfold on the nightly news this fall, we should keep in mind the nature of the tragedy to which we are witnesses. Two hundred bitter years of history are now bearing their acid fruit, and we can only hope that we might have enough compassion to feel sorrow for both sides, to understand the nature of their struggle, and help as we can to resolve this crisis peacefully.

Cap'n Crunch: no longer in stock

by Vernon Squires

The red boxes are in the dining halls, but somehow it's not quite the same. I haven't checked out my "Crunch Hunch" yet, but I dimly suspect the boxes are empty, just hollow and mocking reminders that the Cap'n is gone.

Cap'n Crunch, a serial delight in last year's Record, no longer is editorial food-for-thought on Tuesday evenings. Not that its humble (like Harned) author retired or anything; he just got carried away and graduated.

Clates? Graduated? Clarify, please.

Indeed, it takes some effort to absorb such a thought. After all, this is a man who dribbled a basketball to Amherst in the dead of winter. Twice. And a man whose residence in West College (and later Spencer) gave new meaning to "it's better on top." Clates? Graduated? C'mon.

The truth, however, hurts; like every college student this side of Bluto, Clates bid farewell to his four-year haunt, where he vigorously met the assaults and challenges of classroom and barroom, Lord Jeff and Panther, deadline and byline. Now, he's the scariest of all animals—an alumnus. But like the sickeningly sweet aftertaste of his beloved cereal, Clates will remain with us for a little while at least.

Clates was the kind of guy who noticed things. Then he talked about 'em. Although he sometimes ruffled Dean O'Connor's feathers by attacking contradictions of administrative policy, Clates always watched out for the students' best interests.

Clates fought for the Log. He hooted at Amherst. He called Heinl a "hypocritical chump." He even broached the idea of bringing the Wave to Weston Field. Clates liked the Red Sox, hated incompetency, and wore white canvas high-tops (Converse All-Stars, with Chuck Taylor's signature—this says alot about a man).

I remember a party during his junior year, the year of ArtWorks, Williams celebration of the arts. Clates, eyes slightly unfocused, sported a Hawaiian shirt and a battered baseball cap, more off his head than on. Around his neck hung a weathered picture frame.

I gazed at him, amused by such sartorial tastes, and asked, "John, what the heil is that?"

Clates made a heroic effort to focus his eyes, looked about the room and paused for effect.

Then he pointed to a friend, who was dressed nattily in coat and tie, with a carefully lettered "ArtWorks" sign on his chest.

"He's 'ArtWorks,'" Clates mumbled. "I'm 'Art doesn't work.'"

Such was vintage Clayton humor. However, while he bandied about irreverence like a carnival barker, Clates also exemplified professionalism. He was a top-notch journalist, and a magician with language. Thinking, writing and having fun: Clates.

Cap'n Crunch will be missed. As will Clates. But The Record will forge on, offering Schafes and Paulsen with their alternating wisdom, and this column, named with Clates in mind.

Welcome to another year at Williams. Let's make it the best, even without Cap'n Crunch.

Computer Center changes software and acquires laser printer

An updated word-processing program, student use of laser printers and replacement of the Univac mainframe with the VAX, are among the changes which took place this summer in the Computer Center, according to director Lawrence Wright. Wright added that 10 more VAX terminals have also been installed.

The changes should not create problems for students used to using the old systems, said Miriam Grabois, Jesup's word-processing expert. The word-processing program now available to students on the IBM personal computers, Word Perfect—version four, is an updated version of the old program.

"It's a better product with better footnotes, a different template, endnotes and a safety back-up feature," Grabois said.

She hopes the new back-up procedure will reduce the number of student papers that get 'eaten.' "It (the back-up procedure) is not to protect you from your own stupidity but from mechanical problems," Grabois said.

Students must still save documents before leaving Word Perfect, but the new program will save a copy in case of computer malfunction or loss of power. A pamphlet describing the changes was placed next to each computer.

New software and a laser printer for word processing are among new additions to Computer Center. (Khakee)

Laser printing

This year, students writing papers on Apple Macintoshes may use a laser printer for letter-quality printing at a cost of ten cents per page, Cheryl Brewer, receptionist/assistant in Jesup said. "Students can purchase a computer center cashcard for five or ten dollars to pay for the printing, paper and other computer supplies," she added. Students may no longer purchase disks at Jesup, but several stores on Spring Street carry them.

"The Univac is gone, but there are 12 Macs in Bronfman and 10 more Vax terminals, really replacing the Univac," Wright said. The Macintosh thefts that plagued the Computer Center are under control now, Wright believes, as all Macintosh computers are tied down. "We've had no problems since last January," Wright said, adding that one of the stolen computers has been recovered.

College Art Museum starts adding galleries, offices in Phase II of remodeling plan

by Harwell Wells

The Williams College Museum of Art has begun Phase II of its construction and renovation project, according to W. Rod Faulds, assistant director of the museum. The museum will be closed for eight months, from January 1st to August 31st, 1986, during the construction.

Two new galleries are being built along with the renovation of six galleries in Lawrence Hall and its rotunda. There will also be the renovation of space for offices, workrooms and storage, said Michael Govan, special assistant to the director.

The new galleries will be devoted to the display of 19th and 20th century art. The two-story addition will use its first floor as both an area to enlarge the display of the works of American artists Maurice and Charles Prendergast and to continue work on the comprehensive catalog of their works now underway at the museum.

The second floor of the addition will display the museum's permanent collection, which has not been on view since the beginning of construction more than five years ago.

The most visible aspect of this project so far is the expansion of the museum's driveway to a U-shaped turn in front of the hall, from which a new loading dock will be built. Previously, large artwork had to be unloaded at the foot of the hill and carried into Lawrence Hall.

Faulds estimated that the new galleries will almost double existing space for display of artwork. "The gallery will aim to be one of the best college museums in the country," he said.

"The permanent collection has been expanding by gifts and purchase during the past five years," Faulds said, explaining that the museum and the department of art will continue acquisition by purchase and gifts. While construction has been underway for two months, Faulds said, "We are still raising money and gifts for work not specified in the contract."

ACSR advises Board on portfolio decisions

by Martita Weil

Focusing on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, Williams Reports was released yesterday by the Office of Public Information. The publcation included the ACSR's annual report to the President, and responses by the President and the Board of Trustees.

Stating their recommendations on stocks in the College portfolio, the ACSR concentrated on companies which do business in South Africa. Fifty-eight companies have been contacted by the ACSR in the past two years, 40 of them during 1984-85. Proxy votes submitted to 16 companies in the portfolio were also outlined in the report.

Steven Lewis, chairman of the ACSR, noted the wide range of issues covered by the proxy votes. In addition to 2 votes on the Sullivan Principles, a set of voluntary guidelines for fair business practices, the ACSR voted on the possible termination of sales to South African military/police by Ford Motor Company and General Motors, and more detailed reporting of nuclear materials transportation by Burlington Northern.

"The Trustees remain committed to the proposition that Williams is in some measure accountable for the behavior of the companies in which it invests," President Frank Oakley said in the report.

Trustee support

The final decisions on investments lie with the Board of Trustees, according to Lewis. "They don't delegate that responsiblity, but they do include the ACSR on their agenda," he said. "People who want to talk about social responsibility in investment should come to the ACSR."

In 1983 the Board accepted the ACSR criteria for judging companies in the College portfolio. The conditions include whether or not the firms intend to expand their South African business, whether they directly support the government, adhereance to the Sullivan Principles, and reporting procedures to stockholders.

The report praised the Trustees for their supportive attitude, noting that all ACSR proxy votes were accepted and passed on to the companies by the Board.

Students aired their views to trustees when divestment became an issue in '83. ACSR recommended dropping more stock over the summer. (Glick)

$1.7 million sold

The College has already divested $1.7 million of stock in companies which do South African business, including $700,000 in Dresser Industries and $720,000 in Newmont Mining Co., according to Reed.

Sixty percent of Williams students were in favor of complete divestiture, according to a survey taken by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition in 1983. WAAC member Randy Capps '87, said that while the coalition had not yet decided on its course of action for the year, he felt they would still be seeking complete divestiture.

Capps said that it would probably not be enough for a company just to have signed the Sullivan Principles, adding, "The Sullivan Principles are somewhat of a band-aid on the problem."

Newsroom building was necessary to "gain access to the gym site for the steel needed to build the gym."

The original deadline for the gym, September of 1986, has been postponed to spring of '87, according to Wassenar.

Infirmary?—Health Center!

Construction on the new Health Center, located behind Agard House, is well on its way to completion, according to Assistant Director for Architectural Services David Westall. The walls of the Center have already begun going up, and the interior framing has begun.

Westall said that the design is significantly different from the drawing printed in the Record that caused some controversy last January. "The drawing was only a preliminary design," Westall says, adding that protests about the building's design had no effect on the final plans.

The Center will open in January, with staff and equipment moving in over Christmas vacation.

Student housing

Major changes in two student houses are almost complete, according to Director of Housing Wendy Hopkins. She said the fact that several of Dodd's common rooms still lack paneling and light fixtures is a result of the huge volume of work.

The local firm of Smith and LaCasse was contracted to do the job and originally had a deadline of September 3rd for completion. Hopkins described the work being done on Dodd House as major redecoration with a complete rewiring of electrical and lighting fixtures in the house, as well as recarpeting almost all rooms.

The Spencer House bedrooms were redone, including replacing mattresses and re-painting as part of regular summer work done on the residential houses.

Bigger mailroom

Westall also oversaw the renovation of Baxter Hall, a project he says is now largely complete. The interior is virtually finished, leaving only the patio area to be built.

The project, which originally did not include the patio work, came in on schedule and several thousand dollars under budget, according to Westall. The project switched the location of the mailroom and student lounge, providing about 2,400 boxes in the new mailroom.

The patio enlargement will continue for several months as the three series of steps to Park Street are consolidated into one long ramp. It will also contain a new handicapped-access ramp, replacing the temporary one located on the southeast entry to Baxter.

According to Fix, the administration will not assume that any of the Log's problems are solely related to alcohol. He explained that because three-fourths of the students cannot legally drink anyway, the alcohol problem directly affects very few people.

"I agree it's been an awful change, but it's not as if we're right and they're (the students) wrong or vice versa," said Cutler. He said that he is optimistic about his new job and is willing to work with the Student Activity Board or any other committees to find ways to bring students back to the Log.

Cutler said, "With two beers per person, the Log can still become a place for social gathering."

The Log's new extended hours are from 7 p.m. to 12 a.m. Monday thru Thursday, 4 p.m. to 12 a.m. on Fridays and 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. on Saturdays.

What's the key to being involved at Williams? Signing up at the Purple Key Fair during Freshman Days, of course. (Khakee)

'89ers survive freshman daze

Arriving as much as a week before upperclassmen, Williams freshmen receive a special introduction to the college. This week, the Record offers two articles, written by freshmen, describing the first few days at Williams.

by Christina Manos and Bill O'Brien

Freshman Days—those anxious, exciting days when a class first gathers. Each year, some 500 students manage to survive Freshman Days, usually no worse for the wear. This year's rookie Ephs, the class of '89, were no exception.

Most students agreed that the first few days, although somewhat awkward, were helpful. Freshman Katherine Kevill found it "really nice to have a couple of days to get to know one another and Williams before starting classes."

"I think everyone had apprehensions," said Mark Stepsis '89, referring to the tensions that filled the orientation period, and which ran the gamut from roommates to classes to doing laundry for the first time.

Students said they were unsure of where they were going and what they were doing. "At the beginning, it was kind of like follow the leader," said Kevill.

Junior advisors

Throughout Freshman Days, the Junior Advisors served as counselors, mediators, and friends. Jamey Gallop, JA in East College, shared this advice with his entry: "Be adventurous. . .Don't limit yourself. . .Williams is a small college, but it's amazing how much there is to do."

Among the activities of Freshman Days were meetings and lectures, the Purple Key Fair and the Casino-Dance. The party was hailed as a great time by dancers and "gamblers" alike, despite what Doug Edelstein '89 called a "150-degree oven of a room."

On a more serious note, freshmen were given an intellectual welcome to the college with speeches and entry discussions. President Francis Oakley spoke at the class meeting, and Professor Larry Raab spoke on Robert Frost's poem "Mending Wall" and the use of metaphor in life at the Freshman Assembly.

"Professor Raab's speech was inspiring," said Nils Halverson '89. "I never had much interest in poetry before, but he sort of gave it new meaning-he made the poem open up."

Freshman Days—those awful, anxious days somehow turned into memorable days. As well as a good time, the Class of 1989 had an opportunity to discover some things about each other, themselves and their new home. As Alan Krause '89 summed it up, "It was really special."

Freshmen take to the hills on WOOLF trips

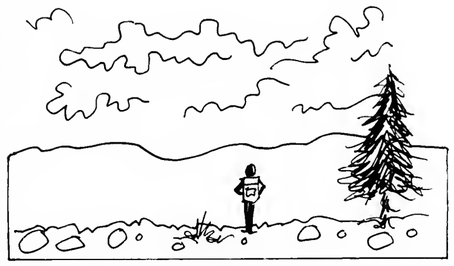
by Leslie Jeffs

Gazing at the narrow white line wavering before my eyes, I kept telling myself, "If you make it through this, you'll make it through anything."

Yes, I was one of the not-so-few, the proud, the WOOLFers of Williams College. I spent three days on a bike climbing the steep Berkshire Hills and having a lot of fun.

WOOLF is the Williams Organization for Outdoor Living for Freshmen, a branch of the Outing Club which sponsors both biking and hiking trips. Last April, we freshmen received brochures urging us to "get psyched, it'll be great." I thought a WOOLF trip seemed ideal for starting college, so I quickly signed up.

Arriving on campus the day of the trip, I found other anxious freshmen, whose faces I eagerly studied, drifting into Baxter to register. Luckily, as the room filled, our shyness faded and was replaced by friendship and camaraderie.



Campus fun

Following registration was an afternoon of games and activities calculated to remove any false worries about collegiate life. Between playing "drifting defense" in Capture The Flag, giving circle-backrubs and participating in a few dry rounds of Thumper, I had a great deal of fun. The evening flew by; soon we were off to hit the hay, or at least the wet grass of Weston Field. And yes, someone had the audacity to order Colonial pizza at 3:00 a.m.

The next morning we arose early. Heavy dew had much to do with this decision. After a crunchy breakfast of yogurt and granola, we split into groups and literally "headed for the hills."

Thinking bicycling more exciting than hiking, I had signed up for that trip. After a few grueling miles, my legs suggested that my beliefs were erroneous. I never realized what a difference biking is with panniers and hills. Big hills. Big panniers, for that matter. Luckily, one of my trip leaders offered to carry part of my gear, so I quickly handed him 12 oranges and started off once more. I didn't see too much scenery that first morning—just the familiar black asphalt staring back at me.

Student-artists create Udder Theatre group

by Martin Hildebrand

The Williamstown Theatre Festival was not the only theatre in Williamstown this summer. Also taking the stage was a group of Williams students and recent graduates who formed the "Udder Theatre." Using the Log for performances, the students put on Jean Giraudoux's The Madwoman of Chaillot, Pam Gems' Dusa, Fish, Stas, & Vi, Christopher Durang's The Nature and Purpose of the Universe, and I Married a Killer, a musical cabaret written by Randi Kromm '86.

Although the Log was an unusual place to produce plays, Joanna Adler '86, a member of the Udder Theatre, said the Log offered "a really good space to work in. It had a tavern-sort of atmosphere and brought feelings of warmth and comfort to the audience."

Not designed as a theatre, however, the Log posed some challenges. "We had to come up with creative ways to design a playing space and spectating space. We stuck the audience in the play for The Madwoman of Chaillot. It was a really great choice," said Adler. For the production of Madwoman, a play set in a cafe, both actors and audience members sat at the tables which made up the scenery.

"I was really impressed with the Udder Theatre. They did a really professional job and seemed to have a lot of fun," said Brian Carpenter '86, who worked for the Conference Center this summer. "I felt some of the performances there were better than at the Williamstown Theatre Festival."

Aecording to Adler, there was a warm relationship between the Udder Theatre and the Williamstown Theatre Festival. "They really welcomed us. Nikos [Psacharopoulous, the director of the festival] was unable to attend the opener but

Illinois Institute of Technology

At the Illinois Institute of Technology in Chicago, one school official, who asked "not to be identified," said, "Everything in a university is a matter of great debate...Universities are where politics was invented."

The event which prompted the statement was the dismantling of part of the recently renovated library. Upon returning this fall to campus, students and faculty alike were shocked and outraged by the construction, which had taken place over the summer.

Especially controversial was a brightly colored steel canopy over the library's entrance. The IIT community felt that the canopy clashed with "the somber style" that dominates the rest of the campus.

The architect, Robert Nevel, was informed that the decision to dismantle the canopy was final. According to the New York Times, "The Institute's president declined to elaborate on why the initial canopy designs had not been reviewed." (New York Times)

Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute

Woodchucks in the Saratoga, New York area recently proved that they are useful for something other than shadow-watching. These crafty rodents broke onto the archeological scene in an unusual unearthing of Revolutionary War ruins.

Professor David Starbuck of RPI and a crew of students have been excavating in a field in Saratoga that was the site of the headquarters and hospital erected by American General Horatio Gates at the Battle of Saratoga in 1777. After encountering various difficulties in choosing an excavation site, professor Starbuck discovered a strange pattern of woodchuck holes. Excavation around the holes turned up three stones from an old well. Following the trail of woodchuck burrows, further excavation disclosed the cellar hole of the headquarters site.

Perhaps the woodchucks have teeth for history, and realized the significance of this battle, which brought France into the war against the English and helped decide the outcome of the War.

Washington and Lee

It was '69 for Williams. Sixteen years later, Washington and Lee University also has decided to "turn things around." The first female students arrived this fall at Washington and Lee in Lexington, Virginia, terminating the 236-year all-male tradition.

The welcome these freshmen received was described as "low-key" since the men were slighty apprehensive about the change. Jim Kerr, a senior, remarked upon the newly decorated freshman dormitory: "When I lived here it never looked like this... In fact, I've never seen that color peach before."

Danatha Hoffman, one of the freshman women, said, "For most of us this is an adventure. It will take a lot of getting used to, but it's great to be one of the first."

Now that W&L has accepted women, there remain only four all-male schools in the country — Virginia Military Institute, Hampden-Sydney College, Citadel Military College, and Wabash College. (New York Times)

In Other Ivory Towers, written by Record reporters Gwen Garceau and Jennifer Sills, was compiled from campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

Profs join music staff

Robert Suderburg will be joining the Williams College music department this fall as composer and visiting professor of music, and a new fall course in world music will be taught by Visiting Associate Professor Kazadi wa Mukuna.

In 1966 Suderburg co-founded the Washington Contemporary Group, which received a Rockefeller Grant and won a Naumberg Foundation Award.

A recipient of two Guggenheim fellowships, as well as numerous other grants, Suderburg graduated summa cum laude from the University of Minnesota and received his Masters of music from Yale University and Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania.

Suderburg will be instructing students in music theory and composition. Student works will be performed throughout the year; in addition, Suderburg himself will also be giving two recitals.

Kazadi, who will be spending the fall semester at Williams, is the junior ethnomusicologist of the Office of Folklife Programs at the Smithsonian Institute in Washington. He received his B.A. and M.A. in music from UCLA, and a Ph.D. in ethnomusicology from UCLA as well. Kazadi also holds a Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Sao Paulo, Brazil.

Musical Cultures of the World is a course new to the Williams curriculum. An introductory survey similar to the Afro-American music course offered last year, it will examine music from China, Japan, India, and Africa. In conjunction with this course, Kazadi has arranged a World Music Concert Series, which will demonstrate aspects of music and dance from these countries.

sent $100 and a nice letter welcoming us to Williamstown," she said.

"Many of the actors in the Williamstown Theatre Festival were really pleased and impressed with what we had done," she added.

Bubbles and roller skates

A big challenge for the Udder Theatre was attracting an audience. "We had to go out to get an audience rather than waiting for one to come," Adler said. "David Latham '86 and Randi Kromm would play guitars and mandolins, and a few of us would roller skate and blow bubbles to attract attention while we handed out brochures."

According to Adler, the tactics were successful. "We packed the house a lot of nights with about 300 or 400 people. It was a nice mix—students, professors, festival workers and people from the Williamstown community."

Participants in the Udder Theatre praised the professional experience. Regina Kelly '86, who played the lead role in The Madwoman of Chaillot and directed Gems' play, said, "It was an incredible experience to both act and direct in summer theatre. Usually it takes several years to get a play to direct or a major role to act; here you can put your ideas to work and present them to an ensemble. We learned a lot about how to run a company, including how important it is to work as an ensemble."

Latham commented, "We felt it was a very worthwhile opportunity. It gave both actors and directors opportunities to take on projects or roles they might not have had the opportunity or time to do during the academic year."

There are plans to continue the Udder Theatre. "We want to keep ourselves small," Adler said. "But we would like to continue. We'd like to create a liaison with lots of alumni, and act as a forum for writers among them. I've already been looking at some scripts Williams alumni have written."

Group support

In those two days, I think I saw more of my bike than I ever wanted to. The experience was fantastic, though. My trip leaders and tripmates always were supportive and encouraging; I doubt many of them thought I would make it up that last hill, but their presence kept me pedalling to the end. Just being part of the group got me psyched up for the upcoming Freshman Days and Williams life in general. A special bond develops between people who have worked, sweated and burned macaroni together.

The rewards of the trip only grew after its conclusion. I returned to "Billsville" confident, happy and ready for both studying and partying. Seeing familiar WOOLF faces and calling out casual "hellos" was a confidence booster during Freshman Days. I commanded instant respect (or so I like to imagine) when I told people, "Yes, I was on a WOOLF." The trip was a smart move; perhaps next time I'll try the hiking. For now, however, my bike securely is locked in the basement, where it will remain until the memory of the saddle fades.

Robin Hood confuses audience

by Scott Blasdell

The opening scene to last Friday night's performance of Robin Hood, an anonymous ballad opera farce (circa 1730), could not have been more confusing. Indeed, a large crowd at the Clark Art Institute auditorium found it anything but farcical.

Robin Hood (William Hite) was not charismatic, but stiff and formal, sounding like a teenager reciting Shakespeare. When Maid Marian, alias Mathilda (Lynn Torgrove), was equally melodramatic in her entrance, the audience seemed surprised.

The second scene, highlighted by the affected speech of King Edward (Herman Hildebrand), lightened things up a little. However, the performance remained tense until Robin and Marian were replaced onstage by the "merry band of men" carrying a portable Sherwood Forest (two dead tree branches in Christmas tree stands).

Unfortunately, when Robin and Marian exited, they took with them all semblance of a plot. At this point, the music and individual scenes, which were essentially humorous skits, took over as entertainment.

Generally, The Friends of Dr. Barney, the Boston group which put on the ballad opera (co-sponsored by the Williams Music Department), succeeded in amusing a somewhat baffled audience. The action was quick, lively and funny, and the score, including compositions from the group's art and music director, Charlotte Kaufman, inspired appreciation for eighteenth century music.

One standout performance was given by David Ripley, who doubled as Little John and Prim the Puritan. He added life and humor to both roles, and as Little John provided a much needed focus for the unusual performance.

Football ready for new season; Powers to start at quarterback

by Dave Paulsen

A group of seasoned veterans and an exciting young quarterback will lead coach Bob Odell's football team into the 1985 season, his 14th at the Eph helm.

Nineteen starters return to the Ephs from last year's team which compiled a 3-5 record. Those returning players will welcome a new face into the huddle—sophomore quarterback Scott Powers. While Powers is untested at the quarterback spot, Odell is confident that "Scotty's going to be a good one. He can run like a deer and can throw the ball pretty well." Odell indicated that the Ephmen will use Powers' running ability on bootlegs and "drop back and dash" plays.

Powers will be making extensive use of the running abilities of senior co-captain Tom O'Connor. Last season, O'Connor averaged 60 yards per game and proved himself as a back who could gain the extra yard when needed. He will be joined in the backfield by junior Rob Miller and sophomore Mark Meyer, both of whom saw plenty of action last year. Also back is hard-running senior Jay Hickman, who did not play for the Ephs last season. The injury-prone Hickman showed flashes of brilliance in pre-season play, according to Odell. Maurice Holden, a freshman, is also expected to carry the pigskin for the Ephs.

Entire line returns

The entire offensive line returns to open up holes for the backs. Senior Greg Taylor mans the center slot, flanked by guards Pete Dawson and Brad Ball (both seniors), and junior tackles Taylor Watts and John Madden.

Andy Jeffrey, a senior split end, anchors the receiving corps after snaring 33 aerials last year. Junior John Shaw will be the other split end, and junior transfer Jim Poulsen and sophomore Lew Collins will split time at tight end.

Defensively, the Ephs promise to be the same solid unit that performed exceptionally well last season. The secondary consists of seniors Frank Morandi, Dick Hollington, Jeff Lilley, and junior Jerry Rizzo. The linbackers will be juniors Dan McCarthy and Dan MacDonnell, whom Odell describes as "ornery as all get out."

Senior co-captain Greg Norton anchors the defensive line from his end position. He will be joined by sophomores Brian Nixon, Jim Franz, and Jeff Boni, along with senior Ken MacLeod. In addition, sophomore Dave Crompton is expected to see action at both the noseguard and linebacker positions.

Odell is optimistic about his squad's chances for success. "We'll be competitive," promised Odell. Saturday's contest against Middlebury will be the Eph's first chance to prove Odell correct.

Tennis slams Vassar in opener

by Rob Ward

The Williams tennis squad opened its season this past Saturday afternoon in convincing fashion. The varsity, led by co-captains Sue Brown '86 and Liz Kellison '87, displayed fine tennis in crushing Vassar 8-1.

According to coach Sean Sloane, two important facts helped contribute to the large margin of victory: the Vassar team had been decimated by graduation, and the match was played on Williams' clay, a surface on which some of Vassar's netwomen had never played. "I think the team is very strong," added Sloane, "but a truer test will come Tuesday against Skidmore."

Williams certainly started strong, as Jenny Koski '86 and Mary Montgomery '88 racked up quick singles victories at fourth and first, 6-1, 6-0, and 6-3, 6-0 respectively. The blowout continued as Katie Kerr '87 and Deb Bernheimer '86 won 6-0 and 6-1 at second doubles, and Laura Rogers '86 and Annabel Sheinberg '89 followed suit at third doubles, 6-2 and 6-1.

The triumph was secured as Brown took fifth singles, 6-3, 7-5, and Kellison added to the victory total at sixth singles, 6-3, 6-4. 7-5, 6-3 was the score in a spirited second singles match that Williams' Liz Peay '86 ended up winning. Finally Vassar's Laura Marcus and Chris Bark broke the shutout, winning first doubles from Geri Hugo '86 and Cathy Paper '89, 4-6, 7-6, 6-3.

Superior conditioning

The last match saw Anne Shulman '88 locked in a hard-fought battle in which service breaks were traded twice in the final set. However, the Vassar player tired, and Shulman pulled away, winning 4-6, 6-3, 6-3, as her superior conditioning proved to be the difference.

The difference between this year's team and last year's Williams varsity, which went 8-3, could just be an excellent blend of youth and experience, said Sloane. This includes Missy Crouchley '89, who missed the Vassar match, and Anne Petersen '89 and Katie Brackenridge '88, who both won exhibition matches. A good indicator of the quality of this year's team will be today's home match versus Skidmore. Williams won 5-4 last year, and this will be a key victory if the team hopes to improve after a promising start.

Ephwomen top Vassar to start year

by Tom Ewing

The field hockey team opened its season with a 2-0 victory over Vassar College on Saturday at Cole Field. Williams has beaten Vassar in each of the last three seasons they have played.

Willams goals were scored by Lisa Tenerowicz '88 and Kirsten Neuse '89. The Williams offense kept up a steady pressure on Vassar, while the defense held Vassar to just one shot. Anchoring the Williams defense was freshman Winifred Hohlt, in goal for her first Williams game.

Coached by Larson-Mason

Coached by 1984 Olympian Christine Larson-Mason, the field hockey team is coming off a strong season last year in which it finished 10-2-1 and took second in the NIAC tournament. Seven members of that squad, however, graduated last spring.

Skidmore College comes to Williams and the green surroundings of Cole Field for a game on Tuesday. Senior co-captain Jean Hakmiller said that she anticipated a game similar to Saturday's victory. After the Skidmore game, however, the Williams schedule becomes much more difficult, with games against Smith Mt. Holyoke and Wesleyan through the end of September.

Sue O'Brien '86 battles a Vassar defender as senior Sue Klein looks on. The Ephwomen blanked Vassar 2-0 to start the season on a winning note. (Albright)

Cross-country stumbles, though Ellison wins race

by Carter Zinn

The men's varsity cross country team suffered a dissappointing loss to a much improved Middlebury team Saturday, although John Ellison '86 came out victorious by covering the tough 5.4 mile course in 29.31 to lead both teams. Meanwhile, the women's cross-country squad, finished third in a four team meet at home.

But after Ellison came a pack of four Middlebury runners before Williams' second man, Tom Pingree '86, crossed the finish line. The total team score was Middlebury 21, Williams 42.

Although the loss ended a long streak of Eph dominance over Middlebury, coach Peter Farwell was not distressed. Because of the depth of this year's squad, and to preserve the top runners' best performances for more important meets later in the season, Farwell plans to stagger his racers in the earlier meets, while some are still in the midst of their training.

Still, he was dissatisfied with its performance, but stressed that everybody who raced gave full effort. Sophomore David Sprague finished third among the Ephs and tenth overall in 31.07, showing "a lot of improvement," according to Farwell. Ed Tonelli '86 and the steady Mark Gilrain '87 rounded out Williams' top finishers by taking 12th and 13th, respectively.

Women take third

Taking the example of junior veterans Becky Conklin and Kate Pugh, the women's cross country squad took third in an invitational meet, failing to Middlebury and Bates but defeating the defending champion Albany.

Conklin, the team captain, finished third in the competition. After Pugh, the top Ephwoman finishers were senior Beth Schmidt and sophomore Sarah Pierce.

The squad is extremely young, fielding ten freshmen and only four veterans. Conklin termed this opening meet "really experimental," and was obviously pleased with the results. "The freshmen ran really strongly," she said, "we're really psyched about the season."

The squad hosts the Williams Invitational on Saturday, beginning at 1:00 p.m. in the Science Quad. The men's team next meet will be Saturday at the University of Vermont where those who did not race last week will get a chance. The team hopes to run different runners every meet. Their first home meet is on October 5 against North Adams and will start at 4:00 p.m. in the Science Quad.

College sued for discrimination

by Andrew Mayer

Former Williams College student Sang C. Yun has filed a lawsuit against the school seeking more than $3.5 million. Yun charges that the school improperly forced him to resign in October, 1983. The suit names the College, its trustees, former President John Chandler and former Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor.

The suit was filed Aug. 14 in U.S. Federal District Court in Springfield, Mass., and Sept. 9 in Berkshire County Superior Court in Pittsfield.

It lists eight complaints, including denial of constitutional rights, invasion of privacy, theft, defamation of character and discrimination based on national origin. The suit asks for $500,000 for each of seven charges, and $50,000 for the theft charge.

The lawsuit claims that on Oct. 6, 1983, Yun was coerced and intimidated into resigning from the College. Yun had returned to Williams that fall after a year away. He claims that he was denied the requisite 48 hours to prepare for his Honor and Discipline Committee hearing. He says he withdrew from the College and did not appear at the committee meeting because he was afraid O'Connor would publicly embarrass him.

College: 'No comment'

College officials would not comment on the suit or Yun's charges. James Kolesar, director of the Williams News Office, explained that the College will make its case once the suit goes to court. "When you say things outside of court it muddies the water," he said.

However, College attorney Virginia McIntyre refuted several of Yun's charges in a letter written June 13, 1985 to Yun's attorney, Leon Malinofsky of Northhampton. McIntyre wrote that if Yun went ahead with his suit (which had not yet been filed), the College would ask for an early dismissal and request attorneys' fees and sanctions.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix, who replaced O'Connor on July 1, 1985, cited the College's policy not to discuss a student's college record or reasons for withdrawal without the student's prior consent.

Daniel D. O'Connor

Sang C. Yun

On March 10, 1982, Yun says he received a letter from O'Connor informing Yun that he was to avoid five Williams students, except for a "friendly hello." Among the students on the list was Sarah Mack '84, with whom Yun had previously been romantically involved. The complaint alleges, however, that Mack was removed from the list at her own request and that Yun received another letter from O'Connor on July 9, 1982, informing him of this.

Parents' request

According to the Berkshire Eagle, Mack's parents had contacted the Dean's Office during the year, saying they did not want Yun to see their daughter. They also complained about phone calls and letters Mack had allegedly been receiving from Yun.

On the night of Oct. 4, 1983, according to Yun, he was wandering around campus and decided to go into Lambert House to see the renovation of the living room. Although Mack lived in Lambert House at the time, Yun claims he did not know this at the time.

The next day, Oct. 5, Yun says he received a note from the Deans' Office to go see O'Connor. The suit claims O'Connor told Yun he would be dismissed from the College because he had been seen in Lambert House, a violation of conditions of the March 10, 1982, letter.

The complaint contends that on Oct. 6, during another meeting with O'Connor, Yun was "subjected to continued pressure to waive his right to appeal to the Discipline Committee." According to the suit, Yun was also told that his hearing with the Honor and Discipline Committee had been moved to 7:30 that night.

O'Connor allegedly told Yun that if he did not resign and waive his committee hearing by 3:00 that afternoon he would be dismissed. The suit also claims that O'Connor said that if Yun was not dismissed, he would resign.

Yun withdraws

Yun, after discussing his problem with Professor Rosemarie Tong and Anthony Wilson '84, decided to withdraw. The suit contends that O'Connor threatened to read what Yun says were love letters to Mack at the Honor and Discipline Committee hearing.

The suit alleges that because of this, Yun decided not to attend the hearing, which eventually took place as originally scheduled on Friday, Oct. 7. Also, the suit contends that Yun was not given enough time to gather materials, which he says would have proved him innocent. Yun left campus that afternoon.

The suit contends that "this resignation was not the result of (Yun's) free will, which had been overborne but of the coercion and pressures to which (Yun) had been subjected and of the knowledge in (Yun's)

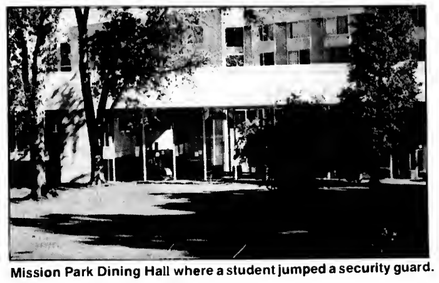
Committees to study Security's party plans



by Virginia Demaree

In response to student complaints about the cost of security for campus parties and questions about security's duties at these parties, the Committee on Undergraduate Life and the housing committee have decided to spend the next few months discussing the College's system for providing security.

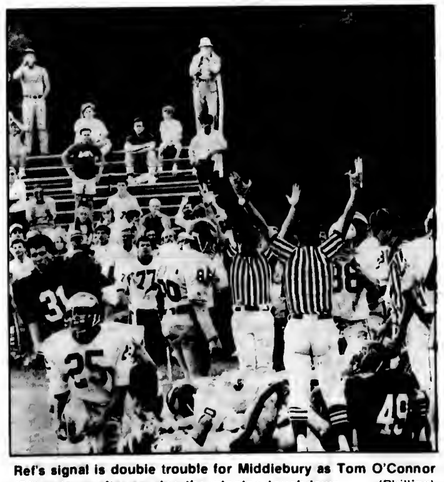
The groups, at the request of Dean of the College Stephen Fix, also will examine ways for the College to enforce the new Massachusetts drinking age.

Until the CUL makes its recommendation, security will operate just as it did last year, said Director of Security Ransom Jenks. "I think some changes will be necessary because of the College's liability question," Jenks said. "The security issue is high priority with CUL, and we'd like them to decide as soon as possible. In the meantime, we are holding fast with party procedure from last year."

Party plan procedures require students to file a party plan for parties with more than 75 guests, and all parties serving alcohol, regardless of the number of guests expected.

Mission Park Dining Hall where a student jumped a security guard.

According to the procedures for planning social events issued by Jenks, the primary duties of the Security Officers at parties are to make sure building occupancy levels are not exceeded, screen for uninvited guests, assist house presidents in maintaining order and report infractions of rules or acts of misconduct to house officers. They are also there to prevent thefts from the house, secure all alcoholic beverages at closing time, stop music at closing time and help ensure orderly withdrawal of guests.



It is with these stated duties that some house officers have complaints. Betsy Andersen '87, president of Armstrong House, said, "There were a couple of incidents (at the First Friday party) that maybe could have been prevented." Andersen said that one table was broken and another table was carried out of the dining hall during the party.

Could be better

"We paid about $120 for security, and to have to pay fines in addition is frustrating," she said. "We (house officers) should take on some duties, but security should too. I'm pretty sure we exceeded fire safety limits, and if the school and administration take that seriously, they could have done better."

One person, whom a bystander identified as a Mount Greylock Regional High School student, tried to sneak in to the party at Mission Park by jumping from the bridge down to the dining hall,

Refugees enlist support for peace

by Tom Ewing

The current human-rights violations in El Salvador can only be compared to those which took place in Nazi Germany, according to a representative of the Caravan for Peace and Justice in Central America.

Sunday in Stetson Lounge, members of the Caravan, a group of Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees traveling through New England, described the experiences that led them to leave Central America. Most of the refugees are in the United States illegally.

Jaime said that he had been a student in El Salvador but had had to end his studies because of the civil war. He said he had been part of a group of students who organized to press for lower fees. While they were meeting with other student and teacher groups with similar aims, he said, the army surrounded them. The soldier had their faces covered and wore fatigues. They forced the students outside and burned their belongings, he said. Jaime said that 13 of these teenagers were killed.

In a separate incident, Jaime said that he once found three bodies on a soccer field where he exercised. Jaime said, "Obviously this was an act of terror designed to scare us and prevent us from being politically active."

After seeing these atrocities, Jaime said, his family saved enough money to send him to the United States. It took him four tries to enter the country because the American government does not recognize El Salvadorans as political refuges. Jaime said he participates in the Caravan to tell Americans the truth about the situation in Latin America.

Omar, a second representative of the Caravan, said that in 1980 the Salvadoran army came to his town and took four of his friends; he later found their bodies. Their heads had been cut off and placed on their legs, he said.

After several years, Omar said he realized that the same thing would happen to him if he stayed in El Salvador. After coming to America, Omar joined the Caravan. "Because I had felt the pain and suffering of my people, I had to do something," Omar said.

Both Omar and Jaime said that United States aid to El Salvador is predominately military assistance. Despite the high levels of this aid, Omar said the situation has not improved for the people of El Salvador. Jaime said that the people of the Caravan hope to generate American support for an end to United States military aid to El Salvador.

Dancing the night away

Cooperation between Williams and neighboring colleges has been advocated frequently and repeatedly by various sections of the school. Yet, as sometimes happens here, nothing was done until a few individuals decided to organize a program and act.

Sandra Burton and her dance department have taken an important step toward cooperation by initiating Dance Festival '85—a combined effort between Williams and North Adams State College. Dance companies and faculty from all over the state will be performing, lecturing, and teaching classes here and nearby.

Now it is up to the students to participate in and support that which they have demanded. Drive, use public transportation, or take advantage of the College-provided buses to get to some of the other sites for the Festival activities. Students often complain that Williams is a "cultural wasteland" by comparison with large, urban areas. This weekend is an opportunity to travel beyond our Ivory Tower and salute the talents and efforts of those involved in Dance Festival '85.

Ignorance

To The Editor:

It was brought to our attention by the September 9th issue of Newsweek that the three major television networks—ABC, CBS, and NBC—have placed a ban on commercial spots dealing with contraception. These spots present to their viewers the issues involved in unwanted pregnancy and urge them to dial an 800 number providing information about birth control and the availability thereof. For stated fears of the "unsuitability" of such a subject, the networks are refusing to run these spots. We are all aware that lack of effective national education and communication about such topics as sexual health and birth control have led to other increasing problems such as child abuse, venereal disease, and suicide. We are equally aware that these problems have been presented to us in the form of television commercials, complete with help-line numbers; and we fail to see why the networks are ignoring one of the sources of these immediate and increasingly growing social problems. Whether this discriminating attitude is due to ignorance or a more troubling sexual and/or "moral" bias , we feel that the networks are failing in their responsibility toward their viewers—a large segment of which is comprised of young men and women that most sorely need this kind of information.

We are circulating a petition designed to show the Williams College support of the lifting of such a ban, and we will send it to all three major networks. Please: if you have not already signed, and you support our stance, look for the petitions up around campus or contact one of us.

Late Night

To The Editor:

It occurred to us that two of the Williams' community's most urgent concerns—the need for an all/late-night study area and the change of the Log's personality—might be easily resolved by marrying the need of the former concern with the "attributes" of the latter. Let the Log remain the focal point for a habit most students (and some faculty) share, but let's change the habit. Make the Log a place where we can pursue our academic addiction unfettered by last calls at the library and a safe distance from a campus now rife with noisy late-night parties.

The New Log has been a quiet place, some say too quiet. We argue that "too quiet" is a relative idea and that the sound level in the New Log may be "just right" for our proposed new use of the "space." The large, polyurethaned tables will make excellent bases for chemistry theses and MCAT workbooks. The new, diverse menu will help feed the hungry bodies that harbor the hungry minds of our erudite community. We could use the cabinet space formerly occupied by the beer can collection for a display of rare books from the Chapin Rare Books Library; the biology department's stuffed Echidna (an Australian spiny anteater) could fill the gap left by the rugby yard and keg; we could hang one of the physics department's giant slide rules in place of the goal post to complete the redecoration of our new social center.

Social center? Of course! We feel the proposed improvements to the Log would make it all the Deans have dreamed, a social center of grander proportions than the Old Log. Skeptics may dismiss this last statement as utter foolishness, but we encourage you to reflect on what has been the true social center of this campus (whatever the current drinking laws): Sawyer Library.

Brief response

To The Editor:

As the advertising editors of this year's Williams Student Directory, we would like to respond briefly to the "Sexism Flourishes" article in last week's Record. We have no desire to offend anyone nor do we wish to draw this issue out in long debates in the Record as occurred once last year. Though we too may question certain aspects of the cover scene, we do hasten to point out that it is the cover designer herself who is portrayed in the photograph and she alone who submitted the cover design.

Iran?

To The Editor:

A swimsuit and sweatshirt-clad woman is flanked by three swimsuit-clad men, who, by posing with surfboard, flippers, and inflatable Dumbo, unambiguously express their full "worth and qualities" as Williams men. This photograph depicting four Williams students spending their summer as doubtless many in fact did is somehow sexist. Why? Because the woman's back is turned to the camera. A frontally nude woman by herself would presumably be an improvement. Next year perhaps. In the meantime, Antje Lewis and company might find Iran a more congenial environment for their notion that a woman's body is never acceptable unless entirely concealed from public view.

Hart Murphy '88

Credible?

To The Editor:

What is the big deal? Is the cover of the 1985 Williams Student Directory really going to foster chauvinist and sexist feelings on campus? Is it really going to "perpetuate exploitive attitudes and actions toward women"? Does the telephone directory have that much impact on the minds, thoughts, and feelings of Williams' students and faculty?

I object to the letter in last week's Record for two reasons. First, I do not find the cover so offensive and insulting, and I do not believe its impact will be so strong as anticipated by the authors of the letter. However, I acknowledge a difference in opinions concerning the picture on the cover, and I enjoy an exchange of views. Secondly, I object to the manner and tone in which the article was written. Come on. Let's be level-headed in our approach to this topic. The tone of the letter is far from level-headed. Such sentences as "The cover-...must offend and appall anyone who considers its message" and "The pose of the woman who wears a sweatshirt branded with a bold 'Williams' and has her back turned to the camera, implies that her body and nothing else is what matters about her"—such sentences are so tainted with extremism and presuppositions on the part of the authors that any well-intentioned message is lost. The article, imbued with hypersensitive diction, just becomes polimical rant and raving.

A more moderate and level-headed letter could have objected to the cover and carried the same message. I still, personally, would not agree with the charge that the cover is objectionable. A more carefully written letter, though, would not have prompted me to write a rebuttal.

In conclusion, I would advise the writers of last week's letter to more carefully scrutinize their word choice in order to convey a more credible message.

To The Editor:

I am an inflatable beach toy. Never mind how I passed through the college's meticulous admissions procedures; the fact is that I am a matriculating member of Williams, and I consider it my duty as such to express my opinion about the cover to this year's student directory.

On behalf of inflatable beach toys everywhere, I must voice my contempt for the inflatable beach toy who allowed himself to be depicted as the posession of four Williams students. Far from appearing offended by this appalling state of affiars, the unidentified inflatable beach toy is actually smiling! Not that I have a right to poke my snout into anyone else's business, I just don't think that a college such as Williams should advertise this sort of behavior. That this offensive photograph was permitted to

by Mary Petersen

Last week's issue of the Record carried a front page picture of the Log empty on a Saturday night—a sight that in years past might only have graced the cover of the April Fool's issue. The statement made by that photograph, however, was no practical joke. For a seeming majority of Williams students, the Log no longer really exists. Yes, there is still a white building near the end of Spring Street containing all sorts of Williams memorabilia, but the atmosphere which gave the Log its distinct personality is nowhere to be found.

There exists a fairly universal conviction (with which I tend to agree) that the demise of the Log coincided with the college administration's recent adoption of a stricter "alcohol policy." While I think that most students will grudgingly acknowledge the responsibility of the college to comply with recently passed Massachusetts legislation that moved the drinking age to 21, I also think there is a valid dissatisfaction with the way in which the college has handled the new situation. In particular the imposition of a two-drink limit and the elimination of pitchers at the Log border on an insult to those students who are of legal drinking age.

Dean Fix was quoted as defending the new regulations as being designed to prevent intoxicated students from causing disturbances or damages. Fix furthered his defense by adding, "The limit is not meant to be punitive. The Log is a social center where drinking is not the central activity." How can students help but be offended by such statements? Is it to be assumed that all of the time that we have spent at the Log during our years here has been solely with the intention of becoming intoxicated and engaging in Rambo-style conquests?

What Dean Fix and other members of the administration fail to realize is that students at Williams have long appreciated the Log as primarily a social center. The Log provided an open and relaxed atmosphere where on any given weeknight we could escape from an often oppressive academic environment. Certainly many of us had on occasion gauged our work so that we could run down to the Log at 11:25, just in time to make last call. Such action, however, hardly represented a desire to engage in Bacchanalian drinking orgies. Rather, we enjoyed the opportunity to wander around or table-hop as we caught up with friends.

New regulations have stripped the Log of its casual nature, replacing openness with the heavy hand of a strict anti-alcohol regime. Can administration officials honestly expect students to find enjoyable an atmosphere which more closely resembles a chaperoned kindergarten than a college pub? Perhaps they might be able to more clearly understand student frustrations by envisioning the enactment of a similar drink limit at the Faculty Club: "I'm sorry President Oakley, but you've already had your two for this evening...." Certainly there is no one who feels comfortable with Big Brother constantly peering over his (or her) shoulder.

The college has, perhaps unknowingly, stacked the cards against itself in trying to establish a new drinking policy at the Log. A military state is attractive to no one. As the Log stands now, it represents for students little more than a glorified snack bar—less centrally-located and in many ways less relaxing than the one in Baxter Hall. In short, new regulations have succeeded in destroying Williams' long-standing "social center;" certainly that can not have been Dean Fix's objective.

Creating an adverse atmosphere at the Log can only encourage students to seek other locations for social gatherings. Is it really preferable for the college to have large nightly parties taking place in dorm livingrooms and basements (many of which have been recently refurnished) rather than in the Log, which was expressly designed for such activity? Indeed, the Log provided a setting that was generally more conclusive to socializing without drinking than the atmosphere of most parties.

At this point, I think that I should note that I am not yet of legal drinking age and I have not stepped foot in the Log this year. These facts did not necessarily have to be related. Unfortunately, by making the Log uninviting for even those of legal age, the college has taken away all motivation for me to trek down Spring Street; why go somewhere my friends (of all ages) certainly won't be? It is time for administration to rethink the Log's alcohol policy and establish one that complies with Massachusetts laws without insulting the sensibilities of Williams students.

So appalled

To The Editor:

Antje Lewis and her friends, in their haste to be offended and appalled at something this year, decided to focus their attention on the phone directory but they made some errors in their interpretation of the cover photo. The picture portrays three men (how she conclusively identified them as Williams men we don't know) on the sunny shore with not three, but four objects in their possession: a telephone, a beach toy, a pair of flippers, and a Pro Model Turbo Surf Slider. (The fact that Lewis and her buddies could have overlooked the Pro Model Turbo Surf Slider is perhaps the unkindest cut of all, but anyway, back to the story.) There is also an Eph-woman there (Donna Ching '84, who designed the cover) with three objects in her possession, namely the three men.

The picture shows the woman to have the disireable qualities inherent in all Eph-women—good looks and inteiligence-she is the only one of the three with enough brains to be looking at the sea, what else do you go to the beach for? At the same time the picture denigrates all men by portraying them as aimless and without purpose (the beach-bum on the left), childish (the poor guy in the middle holding the toy), and the guy on the right clearly represents all businessmen, past, present, and future (the phone) as hopeless bimbos completely out of touch with what is going on. Why, look at him, you can't even see his face behind those sunglasses to know anything about the person inhabiting the body!

This cover implies that the administration condones an attitude toward men as intellectually inferior, which we do not believe actually to be the case. To have to look every day at something, our telephone directory, that so blatantly exploits the men on the Williams College campus is unjust and unnecessary.

For those of you who don't have access, this is the Student Telephone Directory cover.

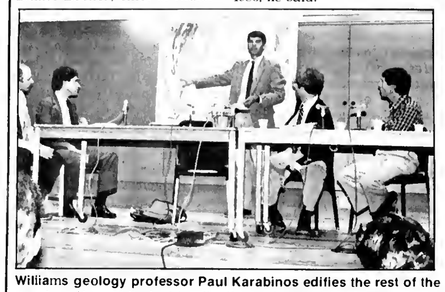
Nuclear waste site sought nearby

by Debbie Snyder

The federal government has selected an area of Vermont just north of Williamstown as a potential dump site for nuclear waste. Although the area is only one of many being considered for a crystalline repository project, a panel of area residents discussed the possible problems last week.

The panel included Cort Richardson, director of the Vermont Public Research Group; Paul Karabinos, assistant professor of geology at Williams; Daniel Becker, chief of radiology at North Adams Regional Hospital; and Edmund Woodhouse, professor of political science at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. Williamstown Town Manager Steven Ledoux moderated the discussion.

Richardson outlined the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982, which establishes the schedule for determining the sites of the repositories. There will be at least two sites, Richardson said, and a draft area characterization plan will be issued in November, 1985. The final 15 or 20 sites will be chosen by May, 1986, he said.



Sites will be eliminated if they have a national or state park, deep mines or quarries, a population density of more than 1,000 persons per square mile or fail a test for thickness of rock mass and a sensitivity analysis of ground water resources.

The canisters containing the waste are designed to last 1,000 years, Richardson said, pointing out that the hazardous life of high level nuclear waste is estimated at 10,000 years.

Karabinos discussed the geological feasibility of establishing a crystalline repository in Vermont. Areas composed of crystalline bedrock are being selected because the bedrock has low permeability and little ground water, according to Karabinos.

Karabinos has been researching one Vermont area, which is under consideration, for seven years and said, "We certainly need to know a lot more about the geology of the area before we establish a nuclear waste site."

Becker explained the biological effects of radiation. "It's really impossible to say whether this involves a substantial risk or not, because we don't know how much radiation this site would give off," he said.

Williams geology professor Paul Karabinos edifies the rest of the panel on the geological implications of a nuclear waste storage facility in southern Vermont. (Somers)

Professor Thomas Spear outlines racial makeup of South Africa at the first of a series of lectures on apartheid. (Albright)

Apartheid's history probed

by Tom Ewing

Speaking at the first of three panel discussions about South Africa and apartheid to be held this semester, history professor Thomas Spear said that the leadership of South Africa is poised between significant reforms and reverting to its traditional policy of strict repression of blacks.

Spear explained historical background influencing the development of apartheid. He mentioned the hostility between Dutch-speaking Afrikaners and British settlers, culminating in the Boer War of 1899-1902, caused a division in the South African white community. This rivalry continued until the election victory of the Afrikaner Nationalist Party in 1948, Spear said. The party is still in power.

Economic causes

The 1948 government began the creation of apartheid as official state policy, Spear said. Although apartheid divides communities along racial lines, Spear explained that it is partially based on economic reasons. The Afrikaners use apartheid to prevent economic competition from Africans, he said.

Today, whites, who make up 16 percent of the population of South Africa, own 87 percent of the land.

Spear also discussed the development of black opposition to white rule in South Africa. Current rioting is growing of its own accord, he said, and is not being encouraged by the African National Congress, the opposition party of jailed leader Nelson Mandela.

Although it was not a sponsor of the discussion series, the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition pursues many of the same goals Spear outlined, says co-president Tom Williams '87.

The series continues October 1, when professors Brian Levy and Stephen Lewis will discuss economic factors in apartheid, and on October 8, when professor Michael MacDonald will assess the political situation.

Oakley outlines fund-drive plans

by Anne O'Malley

College President Francis C. Oakley announced his hopes for a 1993 bicentennial fund drive at the first faculty meeting last Wednesday.

"We would be foolish not to go for it," Oakley said, indicating that the drive would probably start in 1988. "After 1988, I see a great deal of my time taken up with that fund drive, on which the future of the college depends."

The fund drive has not been officially announced, but Oakley said that preparations must begin soon and that the College must be able to present itself as a solid institution in order to merit such extensive support.

As part of preparation for such a fund drive, several studies will take place, Oakley said. One faculty committee is investigating the allocation of faculty among the departments, and another will study office and classroom space to see if these areas are as up-to-date as they should be, he said.

CEP Curriculum review

A subcommittee of the Committee on Educational Policy will conduct a two-year review of the curriculum, Oakley said, adding that the CEP will also look into the academic advising system. "I'm not sure we're doing a good job in this. I'm not Profile: Rev. Carol Pepper in Nicaragua

by Andrea Cousins

Economic disruption, supply shortages (caused by a U.S. embargo), and a war backed by the U.S. government are creating much pain and confusion for the people of Nicaragua.

Such is the opinion of the Rev. Carol Pepper, Williams College chaplain, who this summer spent two months in Nicaragua. Pepper, who is both a registered nurse and an ordained minister, worked as a venipuncture nurse with the Nicaraguan Red Cross, part of the International Red Cross.

Pepper's mission was officially sponsored by the United Church Board for World Ministries. The First Congregational Church of Williamstown and other churches in Williamstown paid most of her expenses. Over $1,100, raised by Williams students, faculty and staff, was used to buy intravenous penicillin for the National Ministry of Health in Managua (where there were critical shortages).

Unsanitary environment

"The conditions were austere," Pepper said, describing bloodbanking and venipuncture as it was done in villages, city slums, large open markets, factories and farms—often in open air, rain and mud. Besides bloodbanking, Pepper administered transfusions to hemophiliac children and translated literature on AIDS from English into Spanish for the blood centers.

Since she was an exchange student in Bogata, Columbia, Pepper has been a repeat visitor to Latin America. She has lived and worked in Columbia, Peru and Mexico.

Currently, Pepper is frustrated seeing Nicaragua ravaged by war, especially by a war supported by the Reagan administration.

"Nicaraguans love Americans and U.S. culture," Pepper said. "Having lived so much in Latin America, I feel that waging war with Nicaragua is like waging war with Ohio. I can picture the civilians being killed, and the children being killed and kidnapped."

"I went to Nicaragua because I can't live with U.S. policy. Their government was freely elected by the people, and trying to overthrow it is immoral,"

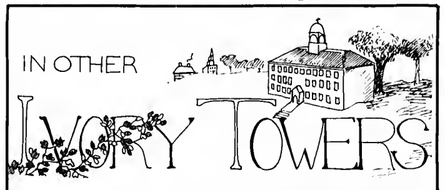
Assamese hail Brown

by Vernon Squires

About 200 members of the Assam Association of North America and the Assamese Literary Society in India will gather at Williams this weekend to celebrate the life and work of Nathan Brown on the 100th anniversary of his death. Brown, who graduated from Williams in 1827, served as a baptist missionary in Burma, Assam and Japan.

Brown was a prolific translator of English literary works. In 1847 he produced the first translation of the New Testament into Assamese, and he was known for translations of literature, mathematics, religious works and instructional texts on grammar and transliteration.

Weekend events



This weekend's celebration, honoring Brown's work, features a number of activities.

Saturday at 1:30 p.m. in the First Congregational Church, members of the Assam Literary Society will dedicate books to be included in the newly-created Nathan Brown Memorial Collection. A partial exhibit of the collection, as well as 19th century Assamese jewelry, fabric and artifacts, will run through Nov. 8 in the Williamsiana Collection in Stetson. There will be a preview of the exhibit on Saturday from 12 to 4 p.m.

At 2:30 p.m., there will be a memorial service, including several clergymen, scholars and missionaries, in Thomson Chapel. Hymns will be sung in English and Assamese as translated by Brown.

Saturday evening at 6:00, the First Congregational Church will host a pot-luck dinner, featuring Assamese food, at the church. Following dinner, there will be a show—including hymns, songs and Assamese dances—in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Beginning at 7:30 p.m., the show will be presented by Assamese residents of North America.

On Sunday the celebration will close with a wreath laying on the Nathan Brown monument in East Charlemont, Mass.

University of Massachusetts

Professor Donald Junkins of UMass is suing two Becket police officers as well as the town of Becket, MA for $200,000 due to an alleged assault on him in the parking lot of Mundy's Bar on Route 183.

The English professor and a woman colleague were reportedly assaulted inside the bar by a customer. On their departure at about 1:30 am, the couple was stopped in the parking lot by a police officer who was investigating the incident. Junkins allegedly was "assaulted and locked in the cruiser." Junkins' lawyer reported that although his client was "visibly bleeding from the face," he was not allowed treatment.

In addition, Junkins was held in police custody until he took a breathalyzer test. Because the results showed him to be legally under the influence of alcohol, he was detained, "stripped, and kept in the state police lockup until 1:00 that afternoon." (Berkshire Eagle)

Wesleyan

"I feel thoroughly shafted by this school." This remark was made by one of the many Wesleyan seniors returning from semesters abroad. Expecting to be able to enroll in certain classes, students were shocked to find that no space had been left for them, leading In-semester registration to be dubbed "Don't Even Bother, There's No Hope For You."

The Wesleyan administration recommends to teachers of "permission - of - instructor" courses that they leave spaces open for returning students. However, the "faculty autonomy" policy of the administration backfired recently in that many professors seemed to have abused their registration authority by ignoring the importance of certain classes to students in light of their own bureaucratic difficulties.

This situation has frustrated many Wesleyan students who believe that "for $10,030 a year, they deserve better." (Argus)

"At most we threw out 50 couches." Perhaps this didn't seem like a lot to the housing officer who made this statement, but to the students who had stored their furniture over the summer, it was no insignificant figure.

Students returning to Holy Cross after the summer were shocked to find that quite a lot of their stored furniture had been thrown out or stolen. The Worcester fire laws dictate that furniture which is vinyl, ripped or lacking a fire sticker, must be removed. In addition, aisles must be present. Director of Housing Peter Simmons threw out loose lumber, rug scraps and furniture in order to comply with these laws.

One student said that her "couch was thrown out and it wasn't vinyl or ripped, and it had a fire sticker on it. I wish someone from housing had notified me so I could have picked it up."

The whole storage procedure was under the direction of the Student Government Association which apparently sold too many storage tickets, causing the overcrowding of storage rooms, and which failed to adequately monitor the removal of furniture, leading to the theft and loss of many items. The housing office took no responsibility for the lost or stolen items.

"I received quite a few complaints about missing items but the students are the ones responsible for the program and it wasn't done properly. Our office (housing) did its part," said Erica Glynn, assistant director of housing.

In Other Ivory Towers, written by Record reporters Gwen Garceau and Jennifer Sills, was compiled from campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

Williams & North Adams State kick off weekend dance festival

by Julie Convisser

Dance Festival 1985, jointly sponsored this weekend by North Adams State College and Williams College, will both celebrate the current forms of modern dance and also explore developmental features of the young art form.

Sandra Burton, director of the Williams College dance department, believes that the Berkshires are an ideal location for a modern dance event. "New England is really a base for modern dance as we know it," she said. "Modern dance is a young art form: Bennington College in Vermont, where Martha Graham started her work, Jacob's Pillow, where each year dancers from all over the country get together, as well as other New England institutions like Connecticut College, have been the nurturers of this modern art."

Many attractions

The three-day event, in which four of New England's lively and innovative dance troupes will participate, offers something for both the dancers and spectators from the Williams community.

For the person with a leotard, tights, cut t-shirt and an eagerness to perspire, there will be three master's classes offered, the first Friday at 4 p.m. in Lasell Gym, the second at 10 a.m. on Saturday in Lasell, and the third at 4 p.m. in Venable Gym at North Adams State College.

Dance Collective members Martha Armstrong Gray and Susan Brown-Verre perform "Dances Under Glass," the opening piece to Friday night's concert. (Flowers)

Those who prefer to see what's happening in dance can attend one or both of the lecture-demonstrations on Friday afternoon at 1:45 in Greylock High School and 3 p.m. Saturday in Venable Gym.

Sunday at 12:25 at the Log, there will be a panel discussion on "New England Dance: History and Current Directions," in which people involved in the shaping of modern dance will participate (including Norton Owen, director of educational programs at Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival; members of the dance faculties of Smith and Bennington Colleges; and directors of the visiting dance companies).

Two dance concerts also will be featured as part of the Dance Festival. Friday night at 8:00, The Dance Collective of Boston and Alex Bloomstein and Dancers will perform; Saturday night at 8:00, the Berkshire Ballet and the Concert Dance Company of Boston will perform.

If you're looking for concert info, the music dept. has your number by Mary Kipp and Lynn Underhill

If you're looking for a good time (musically, that is), the number to call for the new Williams Concertline is 413-597-3146. Sponsored by the College's department of music, the Concertline is a 24-hour recorded service providing up-to-date details on weekly concerts and musical events taking place on campus.

The Concertline, established this fall, willl solve several problems. According to Jean Donati, assistant to the music department chairman, office personnel were hampered throughout past years by numerous phone calls requesting concert information. Furthermore, incoming calls after 5:30 p.m. could not be answered because of limited office hours. In addition, various musical groups, including the Berkshire Symphony, needed an emergency number to contact for rehearsal information. Now musicians unable to attend practices during severe snowstorms can leave word on this answering machine.

All student musical groups are invited to submit information to Donati about their upcoming performances. In this way, the Concertline can provide useful information with a universal appeal.

Swinging bandwagon keeps the Log rolling

by Martita Well and R.P. DeMott

Say what you will about the Log, but when you've had enough studying and someone invites you out to hear the featured band, temptation is overwhelming. And while it is a little strange to order rum-flavored soda instead of beer, last Friday night proved that the Log still is a fun place to go.

Friday night's band, Exit 22, provided a great beginning to the plans for live entertainment at the Log; future bands will offer a wide variety of musical styles. There will be a rock-and-roll party in October, and jazz—described by Log Manager Mike Cutler as "mellow listening music"—on September 26. The Springstreeters also have planned a performance later this semester—so unless you you don't like anything at all, there's probably something to suit your tastes.

Strummin' along

Friday's performance was a pleasant surprise, with Chris Baskin and Kevin Murphy playing guitar and performing pop songs and original numbers, complemented by an unobtrusive rhythm machine. Murphy played most of the lead solos, demonstrating a range of styles. Clearly having studied guitarists, he played like both Mark Knopfler of Dire Straits and Jeff Beck, while at times adding a touch of Eric Clapton's slow-hand style. He told the Record that he loves the blues, and demonstrated that he knows how to play them.

Exit 22 played their songs with a strong beat, and did not attempt to imitate the artists whose songs they performed. "Dancing," one of their originals, featured a terrific solo by Murphy; indeed, the entire evening was filled with good tunes and good feeling. For the skeptics who want to see for themselves, the band will be back at the Log next weekend.

Both Cutler and Assistant Log Manager David Lamarre were pleased with the response to Friday's performance, and Lamarre said, "The Log will be a popular place before the year is out." Although there is a charge for the drinks and food provided by Food Service, there is no cover charge at any of the Log events.

Both Cutler and Lamarre were eager to clear up a rumor concerning those eligible to drink under Massachusetts' "Grandfather clause." According to Cutler, "A valid driver's license (with a photo) from any state is the best form of ID." Persons with photoless licenses may present their college ID to verify that they are of legal drinking age. So even if you're "grandfathered," you can have your two drinks at the Log.

she said. "They have the right to choose their own leaders; the U.S. should leave them alone".

Young victims

Pepper worked on large military installations where she talked with the soldiers, many of whom were only 17 or 18 years old. "They were young and idealistic," Pepper said, "and ready to die for their country and its people. Such youth and idealism made their suffering more poignant."

Recalling a 17-year-old female soldier who kept a nail file in her shirt pocket, Pepper said, "They are really kids. Nicaragua has three million people, half of whom are under fifteen. Who are we killing? Who is dying? Very, very young people."

According to Pepper, the U.S.-backed rebel forces fighting in Nicaragua have been involved in the kidnapping of over 500 people, many of whom are teenage boys and girls who are literacy volunteers teaching in the mountains.

Pepper personally was involved with eight families whose children were kidnapped in the mountains. "It was always the same story: a 16-year-old girl dragged off to neighboring Costa Rica or Honduras and never heard from again. The experience of seeing the Nicaraguan people attacked by the U.S. was painful," she said.

Politics

Although she spoke with many people opposed to the Sandinista regime, Pepper remains critical of the U.S. approach to the political crisis.

"What we are doing isn't right, whatever the Sandinistas are doing," she said.

According to Pepper, the U.S. economic sanctions have caused critical shortages of food and medical supplies. A hospital was closed for a short period of time because there were no lightbulbs. The Red Cross' only centrifuge was not working because of missing parts, parts formerly supplied by the U.S. Before the embargo, Nicaragua depended upon the U.S. for equipment, supplies, medicine and foodstuffs. "No aspect of life is not touched by the blockade," said Pepper.

Presently, Pepper wants to concentrate on medical supplies and other immediate needs for the people of Nicaragua. "There is a lot of work to do," she said. "It will get worse there. Once you've seen it you realize that these are real people, that they are really dying, and that they are not just a column in the New York Times."

unusual events of the Dance Festival: "Pedestrian Path" dances, which will occur Saturday at noon on the Williams campus and at 1:30 p.m. on the North Adams State campus at unannounced outdoor locations.

This is the second cultural event Williams has co-sponsored with North Adams State, and Burton is excited about establishing a precedent for more regional cultural events.

"People are used to the athletic connections between campuses, but our aim in co-sponsoring the Dance Festival 1985 with North Adams State College is to help build intercollegiate social and cultural bridges as well," Burton said. "Governor Dukakis and educators and business people in our area are trying to stimulate growth, and this is our way to help create some linkages."

Free transport from Williams to events on the North Adams campus will be provided, with a shuttle-bus leaving from Chapin Hall one half-hour before the scheduled event. Tickets for the Friday and Saturday night Dance Concerts in Lasell (all other events are free and open to the public) are available to students at the reduced price of $3.50 for one concert and $6.00 for both, and to other adult members of the community for $6.00 for one concert and $10.00 for both. Reservations can be made by calling the Adams Memorial Theater Box Office between 12:00 and 5:00 p.m. Monday through Friday at 597-2425.

sure we always know as much about our curriculum as we should in order to advise students," Oakley said.

Oakley said he was concerned about the organization of the College administration. "We need to institutionalize and systemize our administration more effectively," he said. The administrative staff has grown 90 percent in the last 15 years, Oakley said, attributing the increase to the larger numbers of students and alumni and the expansion of the applications pool.

Although Oakley said that he believes the College's endowment is being well-managed, he cautioned faculty members not to think of the College's assets as limitless. He explained that it was only in 1983-84 that the endowment edged ahead (in constant dollars) of where it was in 1967.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix told the faculty that he thought the changes at the bookstore had worked well, except in the case of one economics textbook, which was significantly under-ordered. He said that he believes Joe Dewey, owner of the bookstore, has been very cooperative and thanked faculty members for getting book orders in early.

The uncovering

The cover of the student directory, which shows three men standing about a woman in a Williams sweatshirt was designed by students Fix explained. The cover has caused controversy for its possibly sexist overtones. He said that the College has allowed students to select the cover, dealing directly with the printer. No one in Hopkins Hall bothered to review the cover design, according to Fix, because students graphic designs have been conservative in the past.

mind that he would be compelled to go to the hearing without the letters and other evidence he had desired to secure from his home and which would have shown absence of foundation for Defendant O'Connor's charges."

McIntyre's letter, however, states, "Mr. Yun had ample warning that he was to stay away from Sarah Mack on his return to Williams in the fall of 1983." It further contends that O'Connor repeated the warning to Yun by phone call and a Sept. 9 meeting.

Yun called 'intense'

Yun is described by former economics professor Michael McPherson, now at the Brookings Institute in Washington, as "very curious and very intense." Professor of political science James MacGregor Burns '39, whom Yun referred to several times in a 20-page letter to Chandler written soon after he left the school, recalled that Yun seemed audit a lot of different classes.

When reached at his parents' house in Los Angeles, Yun explained that he has been working since his withdrawal from Williams to pay for attorneys' fees. Yun said he felt "extremely uncomfortable" discussing the matter.

He said, "The whole thing is really complex. This matter could be very scandalous to some students and profesors. In a sense their privacy is my privacy also."

O'Connor, Chandler and Tong were not available for comment.

Golfers tie for second at home

Stewart Verdery

The Ephs kicked off their 1985 season with the Williams Invitational Sept. 15-16. Played on Williams' home course, the Taconic Golf Club, the tournament consisted of ten teams, including two from Williams. Each team had five golfers with the best four daily scores counting as the team total.

Amherst, a veteran team with four four-year members, captured the top two individual scores and the team title with a two-day total of 629. Williams' A-team tied for second place with Salem St. at 638 with a balanced effort by the top four golfers. Tim Frechette '89 shot a blistering 73 on the second day to claim low honors on the team at 158 and also the low round for the tournament. Co-captain Chas Foehl '87 and Tim McKone '87 both fired 159, finishing tied for 6th place. Co-captain Guy Kurtz '87 rounded out the top four with a total of 162.

The Williams' B-team finished in 6th place with a team score of 682. Bill Tierney '86 led their effort with a 167 as all five B-squad golfers shot '85 the second day.

Coach Richard Pohle said that the high finish by the Ephmen was "a pleasant surprise", after losing two valuable golfers to graduation. He commented that in the short five tournament season the strong points of the team would be the depth of talent and the maturity of the team members. Frechette was especially optimistic about the season after his first tournament, saying, "it gives me confidence for the rest of our matches."

The team played this past weekend in the Duke Nelson Invitational at Middlebury against many of the same schools and Maine and Vermont, both Division I schools. This tourney was a homecoming for several of the older players who had previously played well there.

The Skidmore Tourney and the New England match await the Ephmen this week, and they hope to repeat their solid performance in the Williams Invitational.

ruck and into the trusty hands of Merriam who once again attempted a drop kick. The ball sailed through the air and seemed to hand forever before it split the uprights, putting Williams ahead 12-10.

In the waning minutes of the game, Middlebury made one last attempt to score. This effort was stopped by wing Mark Tompkins '87, who picked up a loose ball and ran it to within one meter of the Panther try zone. Over one hour of excellent rugby was over and Williams was once again victorious.

The Killer B's took the field next and in an amazing display of talent and desire humiliated their Middlebury opponents 26-0. The scoring began immediately with wind forward Mike Duncan '86 rambling over the try line over three Middlebury defenders. Tim Latimore '86 added the conversion for an early 6-0 lead. The next score came off a Middlebury line out that was broken up by Gene Mazzaro '87. He dashed it off to John Fetteroif '86 who, in a display of textbook rugby passed it to hooker Channing Headley '86 who touched it down for the second Eph try. Williams continued to roll behind junior Dave Koota, who scored the next Williams try on a breakaway run. Latimore converted again, leaving the score 16-0 at the half. The party continued as rookie Steve Patterson '87 ran the ball deep into the Middlebury end, finally passing it to Latimore who scored the first try of the second half. Patterson followed this assist with a spectacular kick which he chased down and carried in for the final Williams try. Once again Latimore added the conversion to bring the final tally to 26-0.

C-side finished off the day with a three half game, coming away with a 8-0 win. The first score came early as scrumhalf Greg Bronson '86 pulled the ball out of the maul and tossed it out to freshman linie Gordon who carried it in for his first Williams try. The next score came as scrummie Mike Goldstein '88 picked up the ball outside the Middlebury try zone to score the second C-side try.

This weekend's paly. both on and off the pitch signals the beginning of yet another successful season for the WRFC.

Security

according to Andersen. The student landed on a security officer, injuring her right leg, Jenks said, adding that the officer was fine the next day. "Either we or security should have been checking I.D.'s more carefully," Andersen said.

Assistant Dean William Darrow said that it is not reasonable to expect security to be able to prevent every incident at every party, although he understands student complaints. "It's generally the case that security does not get a great deal of cooperation at parties," he said.

"Reducing the number of security officers at parties is clearly an option, but house presidents want more security," Darrow said, adding that moves made by other colleges, including carding students as they enter a party and establishing drinking and non-drinking rooms "are all, in theory, things we're thinking about. The discussion is open."

JA's responsibility

Although presumably all freshmen are underage, no changes have been made in the College's policy about parties in freshmen entries. "The JA's are responsible there," Jenks said. "We may be particularly vulnerable there."

Junior Advisor Paul Rardin '87, said that the new state law and the College's alcohol policy were discussed a great deal at last year's JA orientation. "The main thrust was a strong reminder about state law more than College policy," he said. "They never said explicitly that the College will not tolerate JA's purchasing alcohol for minors."

"I was very impressed with the way the deans handled the whole blt," Rardin said, "making sure we were aware of the law. I think JA's feel a greater sense of responsibility to freshmen because of the laws."

Freshmen Days were officially dry this year for the second time, but unofficial freshmen gatherings after classes started have not all been alcohol-free. "I think after Freshmen Days, when the party season began, JA's decided to take the initiative to buy beer for parties at their discretion," Rardin said.

Non-alcoholic names

Until CUL makes its recommendations, there will only be minor changes in the College's alcohol policy, Darrow said. First, the deans' office is enforcing the rule about not advertising parties as drinking parties; in other words, not naming parties after alcoholic beverages. "It's created some interesting and creative names," Darrow commented.

The deans are also asking that punch bowls be labeled with their ingredients, and that students keep non-alcoholic punches non-alcoholic. "We've also forbidden large open containers of unlabeled drinks. In other words, no swimming pools," Darrow said.

Jenks is also asking students who file party plans how much alcohol they plan to purchase for a given party. "If they say, 'I'm going to have a party with 75 people and five kegs,' I'm going to question whether 75 people are how many they expect," Jenks said.

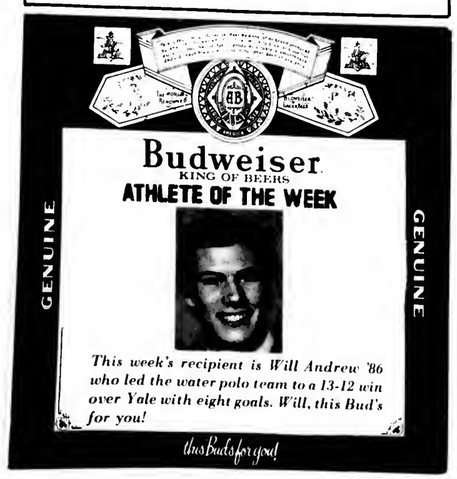
game, led by senior midfielders and co-captains Jeff McEvoy and Mark Schroeder. McEvoy blasted a shot which went wide 13 minutes into the first period, and eighy minutes later Kurt Schroeder '88 brought the ball to the right side of the goal, made a quick reversal and hit a high, crossing shot. Middlebury goalie Van Dorsey, expecting a pass, was caught off guard but managed to deflect the ball over the crossbar.

The Ephmen sustained offensive pressure through veterans Clark Otley '86, Scott Walker '87, and Nikolai Nachamkin '88. The defense was strong with two-year varsity starters Jon Deveaux '87 and Helge Welner '87, helped by Pieter Muider '86 and freshman Mike Masters. In addition, Denny Wright '87 displayed his usual aggressiveness, in particular helping Bryan out on a game-saving play when faced with a one-on-one situation halfway through the second period.

Middlebury had a few threatening plays late in the second period. With 9:00 left, a Panther forward drove a hard shot to the lower right corner of the net, but Bryan made a diving save, initially deflecting the ball, then pouncing on it. Through the overtime periods, pressure mounted and eaeh defense played very toughly and aggressively. Russo noted, "We both had some good chances, but I was pleased; we held our own."



Williams plays its next three games away, facing Clark tomorrow in what Russo said will be "a very tough match", and R.P.I. on Saturday.

Runners fall to UVM, Albany

by Carter Zinn

The men's cross-country team fell to tough competition at University of Vermont on Saturday to teams from UVM and Albany. Co-captain John Ellison '86 was narrowly beaten by two runners in the final stretch of the race to end his undefeated streak in dual- and tri-meets which started to the beginning at last season. The final team score was Albany 24 Vermont 53 Williams 63.

Ellison ran all the way with the top Albany and top Vermont men, only to be outkicked on the track in front of the finish line. His third place time was a fast 26:01. The Albany team dominated the race after the first finishers, running in a strong nine man pack in which only 24 seconds separated the fourth and twelfth place finishers.

Co-captain TJ Lydon '86 finished second for Willalms, 14th overall, in a strong time of 26:47 over the five mile course. Dave Grossman '86 ran conservatively at first, and finished strong just seconds behind Lydon. Promising Freshmaan John Servin finished fourth on the team, moving up from eigth in the middle of the race, and Todd Sandel '86 came in seconds after Servin to round out Williams' top five.

Coach Farweil was pleased with the team's performance, as the top five was more closley grouped behind Ellison than against Middiebury last week. What he is looking for in this stage of the season is the the development of a strong support group to back up the teams proven winners. He said that Friday's Amherst Invitational will provide good competition, and should give some indication of the strength of the top racers who will attempt to win back the Little Three title.

Hockey cruises to 3-0

by Tom Ewing

The Williams field hockey team improved its perfect record to 3-0 by beating Skidmore and Smith by identical 5-0 scores. Both games showed the strong talent and experience of the Williams team, which finished with a 12-3 record last year.

In the Smith game, played at Smith on Saturday, Williams was only challenged briefly in the second half. For the rest of the game, it was the Williams offense that was in control. Senior co-captain Caroline Cento, sophomore Lisa Tenerowicz, and Sue Scarborough '87 each scored one goal, while freshman stand-out Kirsten Neuse recorded two goals. Co-captain Jean Hakmiller '86 started in goal after missing the first two games due to an injury. She faced a total of eight Smith shots; Williams recorded what Hakmiller called "a billion shots."

Williams looked very strong in both games, said Hakmiller, who had anticipated a closer game against Smith. Today the team played Mt. Holyoke, and then they travel to Middletown, Connecticut to play Wesleyan.

Women's soccer slides to 1-2 after being blanked by Smith

by Al Mottur

Hurt by the loss of seven seniors to graduation, the varsity women's soccer team has stumbled to an inauspicious 1-2 start. Saturday, the team faced a powerful Smith team at Cole Field and fell by a 3-0 score.

Smith was the aggressor for the majority of the game, outshooting Williams 25-9. At halftime the score was only 1-0, largely because of the play of goalie Joyce Rogers '88, who was solid throughout, stopping a total of 22 Smith shots. Just under three minutes into the second half, however, the score became 2-0 as a Smith player converted on an indirect kick opportunity. 30 minutes later, Smith added an insurance goal as Rogers was unable to stop a well placed shot into the upper left corner of the goal.

Despite the apparent domination by their ooponents, player and coach alike remained optimistic. "We're beginning to pull it together. They're a good team but we're getting better," said co-captain Ashley Mace '86. First year coach Lisa Melendy echoed her player's sentiments: "We played well and came hard. It's just that Smith is a very experienced team."

Loss to Skidmore

Earlier in the week, the team lost at Skidmore 3-1, a game in which Melendy felt the players came out flat. "We had the skilled players but they were more aggressive. They simply outhustled us." Skidmore led 1-0 at halftime, but Chris Boddiker '88 knotted the game at one apiece as she scored on a breakaway. Seven minutes later, Skidmore went up 2-1 on a direct kick, and with eight minutes left, added another goal to put the game out of reach.

The women's squad opened the season with a heartening 3-0 victory over Vassar at home last Saturday as Boddiker led the way with two goals. Co-captain Gigi Madore '87 also scorcd, off an assist from Michelle Barry '87 midway through the second half. Mace was pleased with the game in that the team "played together and executed pretty well. It was a great way to start the season."

Next up for the Ephwomen is a game at Middlebury on Thursday. Melendy said she does not know much about the Middlebury squad as it is her first year but expects the game to be "equal by virtue of their scores against other opponents."

Looking ahead to the rest of the year, Melendy clted a strong defense, front line, and the need to improve midfield play as keys to the team's chances for success. She also said that the players are doing many things well such as positioning and running to the ball but need to work on "the finishing touches. One of our problems is that we sometimes don't follow through on many of the plays we set up. We have a relatively young squad this year, but I expect an excellent season."

Discers humiliate Brown 15-5

by Willem J. Humes

WUFO went wild this weekend as they defeated Brown Ultimate in an extremely fun match Saturday on the Swamp. The Brown team distinguished itself by arriving earlier than the planned Captain's meeting, an event almost unknown in tournaments. In fact, Brown was warmed up and ready to play before most of WUFO had even arrived.

The first game against Brown was played by a predominantly veteran team with a sparkle of the fresh faces of Andy Felcher '87 and Bryan Cameron '89 who somehow snuek in. The game started with Brown turning overt the opening pull. Sophomore superstar Chris Jones threw a quick overhead to field captain Darryl Walsh '87 for the first score. Brown sored on their next possession to even the tally for the last time. WUFO began playing with deft skill from then on to dominate the game. The offense betrayed few unforced errors while the new zone defense, polished after a whole week of practice, strangled the Brown attack. Long throws mingled with exceptional handling quickly brought around the half time score of 8 to 3.

The next half was much of the same and more. Sebastiano Pugliese '86 marked his return to fulltime WUFO by playing smart, hard-cutting frisbee which allowed the offense to open up and explode into the endzone. The trusty, crafty faculty members, Dave Levine and Colin Adams were indispensible with their smart, fluid style. Mr Syk dove for and came up with a Jones hammer to finalize the score 15-5.

Before the start of the next game a fine show of fribee psyche was put on as the women's team (WoWUFO)took on the auto-spawned team of rookie players (RUF). Good frisbee was played by all with exceptional performances by Sarah Thurber '86 (captain of WoWUFO), Laura Garnish, sophomores Kristen Andrews, Ann Carson and Susan Courtney, freshman Fiona Meconnell, Erin Levine '80, and senior Leigh Anne Harvey.

WUFO president Hans Humes was extremely pleased with the performances Saturday. "WUFO is awesome, has fun and stomps at the same time! "he was overheard to say."Not only that, we're extremely attractive and wonderful people."

Tennis nips Smith in last doubles

Playing great doubles when it really counted and raising their season reeord to 2-1, the Northampton on Saturday by a orc, as senior Laura Rogers and freshman Annabel Scheinberg came back for a 3-6, 6-3, 6-2.

The triumph was an especially nervous one since the Ephwomen won only one of the three doubles matches after taking four singles matehes. Sophomore Mary Montgomery, playing the top singles position, captured a 7-5, 6-1 victory, while second singles player Liz Peay '86 struggled before rallying to a 2-6, 6-2, 6-3 decision.

The number five and six players, seniors Jenni Koski and co-captain Sue Brown, each registered easy victories over their opponents by the scores of 6-1, 6-2 and 6-2, 6-2, respectively.

Sophomore Annie Shulman fell at the number three position, while freshman Missie Crouchley played the match of the day, eventually falling 5-7, 7-5, 6-4.

Today the team traveled to Mt. Holyoke today, while they return to the soft clay on Saturday to take on Springfield.

Water polo sinks Eli for one-point victory

by Frank Vespe

There are a multitude of bad puns that can be employed for a losing water polo team. Fortunately for Williams, none of them applied this weekend as the Ephs defeated Yale on Saturday, 13-12, behind eight goals from Will Andrew '86.

Early on, however, things weren't nearly so bright for Williams as Yale raced to a 7-3 lead in the first quarter. But in the second quarter, the Williams defense "came together," according to Adam Ifshin '87 who seored once. The team rallied and trailed by one, 8-7, after two quarters.

The second half was a stuggle, as the teams traded scores. Finally, Williams cdged out to a two goal lead, but the Eli tallied to draw within one. The Ephs responded with two goals to take a 13-10 lead midway through the fourth quarter.

The Williams cause was also aided by three goals from Chris Kirwan '87 and onc from John Cooke '88.

The players were generally pleased with their performance, especially after the near-disastrous first quarter. Co-captain Dave Schelbe '86, the goalie, said that the game gave hope for a bright future. "I thought some of the younger players showed a lot of promise," he noted.

Ifshin felt that the match was "a really good first game for us," while adding that "everyonc was happy" with the victory.

With this first test passed, the Ephs play twice this week. Tonight they travel to R.P.I., and tomorrow the team is matched against Deerfield at 4:00 P.M. at home.

Women take fifth in Invitational

The women's cross-country team placed fifth in a strong field of twelve teams at their invitational meet Saturday.

Junior eaptain Becky Conklin led the Ephwomen with a tenth plaee finish. She was closely followed by freshman talent Karln Johnson in 13th place. Other scorers included junior Kate Pugh in 43rd, and freshmen standouts Jennie Garrett, 26th, and Annc Thompson in 50th. Coaeh Bud Fisher was espeelally pleased with the results posted by his freshmen.

Middlebury's Dorcas Denhartog led the field of 105 women, 98 of whom eompleted the 3.25 mile race, with a time of 19:12. She was followed by Kirsten Kannengieser of Smith, 19:35, an UVM's Celeste Leon, 19:46. Springfield copped the next five places to easily win the Invitational with an impressive score of 30 points. They were followed by Smith (87), UVM (94), Westfield (128), Williams (142), Amherst (215), Tufts (232), Fitchburg (260), Mt. Holyoke (264), Hamilton (269), RPI (298), and Middlebury (incompicte team).

Football beats Middlebury 7-6

Time and time again on Saturday, the Eph football team came up with the big play when they needed it. This big play ability, combined with a stingy defense and the play of quarterback Scott Powers '88 were the key ingredients in the Eph's 7-6 victory over Middlebury on Saturday.

Defense was the name of the game in the season opener for both squads. Williams coach Bob Odell expressed delight in the play of his defense, noting that Middlebury gained only 194 yards in total offense, the lowest total ever surrendered by his squad. On the other hand, the Ephs only managed 156 yards in offense.

The two teams battled to a scoreless tie at halftime. The Ephs then mounted their only sustained drive of the afternoon, culminating in a one-yard plunge over the goal line by co-captain Tom O'Connor with 2:42 left in the third period.

The scoring drive was sustained due to the ability of Powers to come up with the big play at crucial times. Powers, who was starting his first game at quarterback for the Ephs, connected on two important third down passes to tight ends Rob Coakley '86 and Lewis Collins '88, and then rifled a bullet to split end John Shaw '87 to set up O'Connor's scoring thrust.

Middlebury came back with a fourth quarter scoring drive of its own, with senior quarterback Andy Fellows connecting with fullback Paul Morrison on an eight yard scoring strike. The key play in the drive was a 58-yard completion from Fellows to Chris Sullivan.

Razzle-dazzle fake kick

It was here that the Ephs came through with the next key big play of the day. After the touchdown, which came with 6:44 left in the game, Middlebury coach Mickey Heinecken ordered a razzle-dazzle fake kick and run for the two point conversion. A swarm of Williams detenders stymied the play, however, and the Ephs remained on top, 7-6.

Two other big plays helped to seal the win for the Ephs. Late in the game, with the Ephs trapped deep in their own territory, Pete Dawson '86 outhustled two Middlebury defenders to recover a Powers fumble. On the next play, with the Ephmen facing a third and 31 situation, Powers boomed a 70-yard quick kick which pinned the Panthers deep in their own territory.

A relieved Odell was happy with the win and was quick to praise the entire defensive unit for playing outstanding football. "They did a lot of hitting... and that's the name of the game," Odell said. He also commended defensive coordinator Dick Farley for having his defense prepared for the trick extra point which the Panthers attempted.

Turning his attention to the other side of the ledger, Odell lauded the efforts of Powers. "Scott did a heck of a job for his first time at the throttle. He did a good job at quarterback and punted the ball extremely well." Powers finished the game with nine completions in 17 attempts. He averaged 43.8 yards per punt.

Odell admitted that his offense needs to improve, but promised that "I know we're going to get a lot better." The Ephs will have a chance to show how much they've improved when they travel to Clinton, NY to take on the perennially strong Hamilton Continentals on Saturday.

Sophomore quarterback Scott Powers, starting his first game at Weston Field, looks for an opening in the Panther defense.

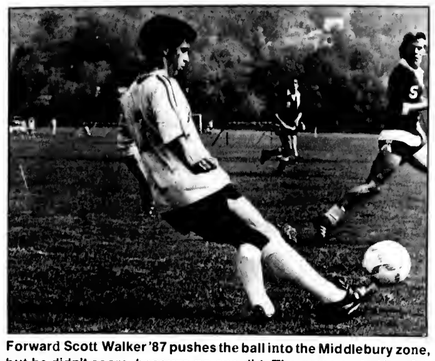
Ruggers sweep Panthers

by Mike Curtin

The Williams Rugby Football Club began their twenty-seventh season the same way they ended their twenty-sixth: with victory. The ruggers swept the Panthers, sending them home to Middlebury with the hope that their future opponents will not have the strength or the depth of the victorious Williams club.

The day began with the A-side defeating the Panthers 12-10. From the opening kickoff, the two teams battled and fought hard, but the Ephs superior training and conditioning gave them the edge they needed to end the game with a win. Scrum half Roger Merriam '86, in a preview of things to come, opened the scoring with a drop kick from just inside the twenty-two meter line. Middlebury, however, came back strong and kept the ball in their offensive zone for the remaining minutes of the half. The Panthers used this to their advantage and scored twice before the halftime break. Their second conversion kick was missed, leaving the score 10-3 going into the second stanza.



Down by seven, the white horde came out for the second half with fire in their eyes. Immediately they drove the ball down into the Middlebury end with superior line work and scrum support. This effort paid off when after some loose play near the Panther try line, the ball spurted out and senior line captain Ed O'Toole touched down for the first and only Williams try. Merriam added the conversions and Williams was now only down by one.

Middlebury, determined to maintain their lead, held the ball in the Eph end and threatened to score. The Ephs, however, would not let them in. Led by senior scrummies Pete Aiken, George Clemens, and Brad Bisseli, the A-side continually stymied Middlebury's scoring attempts. Inspired by this defensive show, the line shifted the momentum of the game. Chris Toli '86, making his debut at fullback, fielded a Middlebury kick and ran it well into Panther territory, placing the Williams squad where they would spend the rest of the second half.

Williams threatened many times, but was unable to touch the ball down and be awarded a score. Senior Craig Kirby carried the ball into the try zone but could not touch it down even with the help of loose forwards Tim Faselt '86 and Paul Hogan '86, who were always on the ball. Scrum-down after scrum-down was won by hooker Craig Blackmore '86, backed up by the piston push of Clemens and Jeff Lifson '86. Time was running out and the Ephs were still down by one. The ball came out of a

by Greg Leeds

Through 90 minutes of regular play and 20 minutes of overtime, neither Williams nor Middlebury was able to score as the men's soccer team tied the Panthers 0-0 Saturday.

In what coach Michael Russo called a "very fiesty, competitive game," both teams played very evenly, each having scoring opportunities which were turned back by solid defensive play. Williams had five shots on goal compared to Middlebury's six, and goalkeeper Brad Bryan '87 looked confident and composed in his first varsity start, making nine saves.

Taking advantage of the fact that they had already played two games, the Panthers wasted no time in pressuring the Williams defense, who, though frantically at times, held off the initial threat. The Ephmen soon regained organization and poise and mounted offensive pressure, leading to several close shots.

Panthers control the air game

The Panthers, under first-year coach David Seward following the departure of 11-year leader Ron McEachen to UVM, were clearly superior throughout the match in their ability to control air balls, due to their general height advantage over the Ephmen. But Williams responded with a strong ground

Volleyball seventh in Great Dane after beating Amherst and Smith

by Debbie Snyder

Tied at 11 in the third game against SUNY-Stonybrook on Saturday, Nancy Hedeman '89 spiked the ball for four points in a row to help the women's volleyball team win 7-15, 15-9, 15-11 and clinch a playoff berth in the Great Dane Invitational Tournament at Albany this weekend. The team had previously beaten Columbia 13-15, 15-2, 15-5 and lost to SUNY-Cortland 15-12, 15-12 on Saturday. They lost to University of Rochester in the playoffs 15-2, 15-4.

On Tuesday at home the team defeated Smith 15-9, 15-12 and came back after a tough first game to beat Amherst 10-15, 15-6, 15-11.

The Ephwomen finished seventh of the sixteen schools in the Great Dane, coming up from twelfth place last year. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin felt that having to fight back after losing the first game in both the Columbia and Stonybrook matches "built a lot of character."

The University of Rochester put their opponents on the defensive immediately in the playoffs Sunday. Coach Hudson-Hamblin stated, "They have a lot of height and blocked all our spikes."

Senior co-captain Lisa Jayne's serving, combined with Hedeman's aggresseve net play, pulled Williams ahead when they were tied with Stonybrook to win the third game after splitting the first two.

SUNY-Cortland, "a very well disciplined team," according to Hudson-Hamblin, managed to dominate both close games. However, Williams rallied in the first game when they were down 14-7 and won five consecutive points.

Lisa Jayne '86 struggles to keep the ball in play against the Lady Jeffs of Amherst as teammates Jenny Ause '88 (8) and Mary Hickcox '86 (2) look on.

(Leeds)

Caroline Teer '87, replacing Jenny Ause '88 who was injured in the Amherst game, played very consistently against Columbia. Co-captain Mary Hickox '86 placed many shots well, sending Columbia's defense to the floor.

Beat Smith and Amherst

On Tuesday, the offense started out slow against Amherst, but pulled together after losing the first game, as Hedeman and Jayne dominated the net. The third game, tied at 8-8, was a point for point battle. Teer came off the bench to score the last two points. Hudson-Hamblin was "very pleased with the defense we played. They were scrappy, they covered the floor well, and they got everything."

The team beat Smith easily, despite a sluggish start, with a strong defense and hard serves. Hedeman and Hickox both served well winning five and four points in a row, respectively. Hudson-Hamblin said that Hedeman "had an excellent debut. She played an all-around game-spiking, blocking and serving."

The team played Albany and Russell Sage yesterday in Lasell Gym. They are looking to upset Albany, who made it to the finals of the Great Dane tounament.

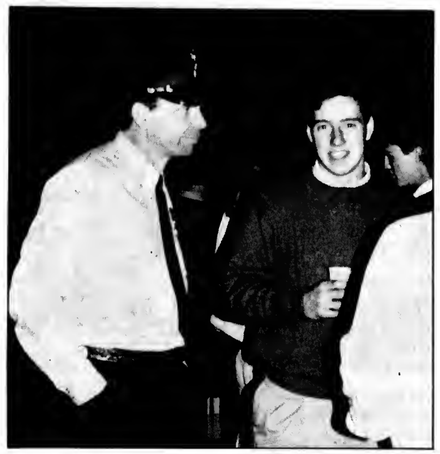
Deans not told about drunkards



by Anne O'Malley

Since the imposition of the new drinking age, rumors about the consequences of underage drinking abound on the Williams campus. Those alleging that the infirmary plans to report students who are treated for alcohol poisoning to the Deans' Office are unfounded, said James Corkins, director of medical services at Williams.

Even though students can no longer get a pitcher of beer at the Log, and they can't name parties after their favorite drink (unless it is an alternate beverage), the College's infirmary plans to continue its policy of protecting student confidentiality.

"We want students to come to the infirmary if they've had too much to drink, or if their friends are worried abut them, and we want to make it easy for them," Corkins said. "We would much rather have students come to the infirmary where they can be observed so that they don't choke on their vomit in their room or in a bathroom."

According to Health Services' Patricia A. Austin, when students with alcohol poisoning are brought to the infirmary, the nurse puts them to bed, monitors their vital signs and makes sure they are not asphyxiated by their own vomit.

Would this man turn you in to the Deans? Not if you ask him for a lift home or to the infirmary, according to security. (Somers)

"Usually the nurse takes care of them, and they leave in the morning," she explained, adding that in some acute cases a student is taken to the hospital, "but that's only in a matter of life and death."

No diagnosis

Both Corkins and Austin stressed that it is not infirmary policy to inform the Deans' Office or a student's parents that a student was intoxicated. Any time a student stays overnight in the infirmary, his name is sent to the Deans' Office, but the diagnosis is never released, whether the student has alcohol poisoning or a broken leg, Corkins said.

Security has adopted a similar policy for cases in which an intoxicated student requests transportation. According to a memo to the switchboard operators who receive the calls, the procedure followed is to take the intoxicated person's name and their destination.

Security will transport an intoxicated person to their room or to the infirmary, but they will not take them from party to party, the memo says. If the student wishes, security will allow a friend to accompany him or her, and they will return the friend to the original location afterwards.

Early deadline key

Dewey claims high level of cooperation

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Although Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Williams Bookstore owner Joseph Dewey agree that relations between the College and the bookstore are much improved this year, they both say that the Bookstore Committee still has a role to play on campus. The committee was formed last year to discuss problems with the College's method of getting books and student complaints about high textbook prices, and deliberate book shortages.

"The committee is especially good for the students," Dewey said. "It helps to bring a lot of points into the air."

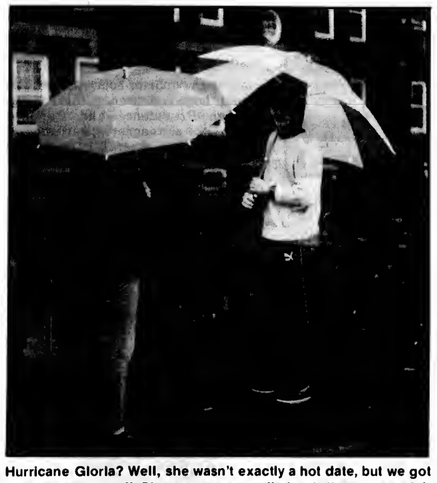
"There's been a 100 percent improvement," Bookstore Committee member Wendy Brown said. "Service is much stronger, with very few problems."

Dewey said he believes improvements have come about mainly because of the earlier deadlines for professors' orders. "The faculty got their orders in two months earlier, which has been just marvelous," Dewey said.

Fix expressed his pleasure with the new deadlines, saying, "Dewey acted in the good interests of the College. He doesn't have an easy job, dealing with such a profit-conscious business."

Educating students

While acknowledging that service is better, Brown said "There have been some problems. The committee will be helpful in educating students as to why prices are the way they are."



In response to student charges that he deliberately overpriced books, Dewey opened his books, demonstrating that his markups are well within the guidelines set in the gentlemen's agreement between the College and the bookstore.

The more pressing issue this year may be the high price of textbooks in general, which Fix says may be somewhat specific to Williams and other small colleges. As Brown said, "Professors at public colleges know that they can't expect students to pay $500 on books a semester."

Fix said that some sort of minimum markup was unavoidable. While most colleges and universities have bookstores that operate as co-ops, selling many items besides books, Fix said, "Being unable to sell anything besides books because of the other stores on Spring Street forces Mr. Dewey to impose some sort of markup."

While expressing his concern about high book prices, Fix said, "In my view, if a student is paying $13,000 to come here, it

Freshmen set admissions records

Score well on SAT, AP's, environmentally sound

by John Faust

The spring overnight program for accepted students held for the first time last year, was a major factor in the quality of this year's freshman class, according to Director of Admissions Phillip Smith. "I'm very pleased," he said. "In terms of SAT's, achievement tests and the number of students with AP (credits), it is the strongest class we've had."

The overnight program, which was sponsored and run by the Purple Key, invited the recently accepted candidates to campus for one of two weekends. By concentrating the stays over just two weekends, the prospectives were able to meet many of their potential classmates.

The 507 freshmen come from an admissions pool of 4,686 — the fourth largest in Williams history, according to Smith. He said he received 320 more applications for the class of 1989 than he did for the class of 1988.

The class, 292 men and 215 women, set a record for percentage of students awarded financial aid, 37.9 percent, and for its percentage of American minorities, 15 percent. These are manifestations of the recommendations a special Financial Aid Task Force made two years ago, according to Smith.

No bird brains in this class! This year's freshmen boast the highest SAT, AP and achievement test scores of any entering class. (Farley)

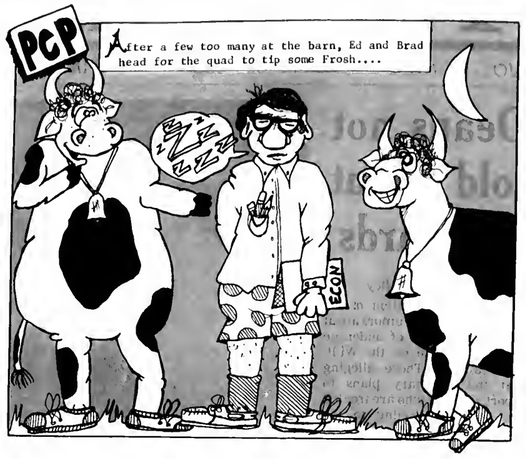
A June profile printed by the admissions office said that the class of 1989 has the broadest geographical distribution of any class so far. Smith said, however, that the admissions staff did not seek to set these records in choosing which applicants to accept. "We take it as it comes. There are more students this year from outside of New England, and we also had the most we've ever had from California," Smith said.

New York is still the state from which the largest number of students come, Smith said. Students from the middle Atlantic states make up 40.7 percent of the class, while those from New England represent 24.8 percent, according to admissions statistics.

Unusual skills

"One of the recommendations of the Financial Aid Task Force was to continue to pay attention to unusual skills," Smith said, although the the admissions office did not compile statistics on the extracurricular activies of the freshman class.

Basing his claim on the fact that many students expressed distaste for smoking and hard rock music on their housing preference forms, Smith said that the freshman class seems environmentally sound and concerned.



Money For Nothing

Social life on campus is a familiar bone of contention between students and administrators, many of whom are tired of hearing the same options rehashed. It is encouraging to see new approaches to this discussion, such as the emphasis on Security policy and party regulations. Certain possibilities, however, are being dismissed without fair consideration, including the idea of student security monitors at parties.

The main advantage of student supervison is economics. Student workers are cheaper than full-time security officers, and would reduce the cost of house parties. The administration's main objection to this proposal involves the question of student liability. While there is a legitimate concern in protecting student workers, the College has yet to prove that a student force would be more liable than non-student security guards.

Currently, the liabilities of security personnel at parties are vaguely defined. Guards are apparently not liable for party damages: Residential houses have to pay both security fees and damage charges. Nor is security responsible for injuries to drunken partygoers. Indeed, there is no clear indication of what security fees do cover, beyond restricting attendance and closing parties. Houses should not have to spend over $100 merely to ensure compliance with state and local laws regarding alcohol, noise and attendance.

The rationale offered by the College for not considering a student security force is clearly inconsistent. Current security guards apparently do not assume liability in the situations the College claims a student force would, so the goal of shielding student workers would seem to be inapplicable. A student security force would be significantly cheaper and might allow an increase in the number of campus parties as well as jobs.

"We would much rather have students come to the Infirmary where they can be observed so that they don't choke on their vomit in their room or in a bathroom."

WAAC petition on divestment

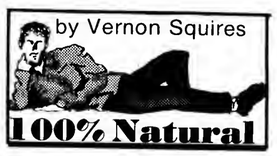
We, as students and members of the Williams community, strongly urge the Trustees of Williams College to divest all holdings in companies that do business in South Africa.

We contend that the South African system of Apartheid violates basic human rights. Corporate activities in South Africa are clearly essential to the survival of this oppressive system. Therefore, our financial involvement with these companies represents indirect support for Apartheid. Economic sanctions, such as the proposed divestment, are the most effective means available to us to oppose Apartheid. It is our moral responsibility to divest.

The above petition, calling upon the college to divest all assets held in companies doing business in South Africa, is currently circulating on the campus.

We believe that divestment is now the only possible method for the college and its community to contribute to reform in South Africa. Previous methods—including so-called constructive engagement—are no longer effective in the slightest degree. The current and continuing situation in South Africa has rendered any "ethical" investment impossible.

The current situation can be seen as partially the result of our previous policies. Our investment has only nourished the South African government and its morally repugnant policies. By continuing to invest in those companies that aid the South African government by their economic activity, our college is perpetuating, participating in, and sharing the dwindling profits of Apartheid.



Therefore, we ask all students to sign the above petition if they have not already done so and, in doing so, to call for our college to divest all its assets in companies doing business in South Africa.

Hurricane Gloria: in the end, she was just a tease

When all was said and done by early Friday evening, hurricane Gloria didn't add up to much. Indeed, given the alarming preparations and hype, Gloria seemed tame.

We were alerted to her menace on Friday morning, and by noon it was decided we were in for a disaster. However, since I myself had never taken part in a hurricane before, I approached the entire matter with skepticism and awe. It was exciting to see college officials scooting about and looking worried, but closing the library and snack bar seemed wimpy.

Judging from predictions, Gloria was an opponent to be reckoned with. She was wreaking much havoc to the south, generating in Williamstown an outlook of spirited anticipation. Gloria was an occasion, the fiercest hurricane since '38. We would be ready.

Down on Spring Street, merchants were all agush with preparations for Gloria's visit. They lined windows with masking tape and hung ominous signs announcing early closings. Inside the Slippery Banana, a host of slicker-clad survivalists gathered provisions with which to weather the storm.

Students were advised to stay indoors. As this made much sense to me, I retreated for an afternoon of studying and radio entertainment (classes had been cancelled).

According to radio reports, Gloria was making an alacritous march up New England. These accounts, however, bore little relation to the scene outdoors. Listeners were told of Gloria's tantrum over Long Island, and at 2:00 p.m., informed that she was making a beeline for Greenfield, only 40 miles distant. This lent an air of proximity to the whole thing, especially when the evening's movie, "Goldfinger," was cancelled. Even James Bond was deferring to Gloria's nastiness.

As each quarter-hour passed, the threat edged nearer. Gloria swept through Providence and Hartford, drawn like a magnet toward central Massachusetts, where, I delightedly noted, she would nail Amherst.

By 3:00, Gloria was astride our state, prompting WCFM to issue stern and austere warnings. All outdoor ventures were

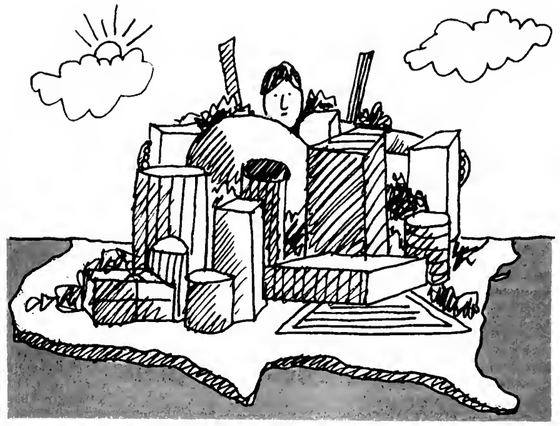
"A frame of mind and a way of life"

Putting waste in perspective

by Julie Convisser '86

It is the waste that worries me. That is what an "Affluent Society" means: shiny, prettily stenciled cardboard shoe boxes that you throw out when you take the shoes out at home—you scrunch them up so they don't take up too much room in the overflowing garbage can. It also means you don't look twice at the plastic bags the salesperson threw the boxes in; you wouldn't notice the pleasant little crinkly noises the pale blue translucent plastic makes when you pick it up or toss it on the floor; you wouldn't shake it in the air and then hold it up to your eyes to look at a newly transformed bluish and slightly hazy world the way Ivy would, having never seen such a plaything much less received one free at a store in Nairobi. Granted, Ivy is a child; but her mother, a grown Kenyan woman living in Nairobi, would immediately recognize the value of such a sturdy and ample tote and put it neatly away in a closet to use at the produce market on Wednesdays. And the absurdity of purchasing something like a canvas Big Bag to be placed in a perfectly durable plastic bag for its brief journey home from the store, which is then thrown into a larger especially bought plastic garbage bag once home, would be enough to make her toss her head back and bellow with laughter.



We are a wrapper and package society which is part and parcel of being an affluent society. One of the wonders of a successfully modern society we are to believe is disposablility which is based not only on the technology to produce "disposable products" but also, and perhaps more significantly, the general condition or perception of having enough to throw away. Enough plastic bags (enough petroleum to produce enough plastic), enough shoeboxes, enough little twisty ties, enough string and foil and bottles and jars that we can easily, continuously, and mindlessly throw them away.

Even those in America who really cannot afford to waste are caught up in a national psychology of affluence, and have adopted their society's definitions of what precisely trash is. So the person for whom a dinner at MacDonald's is a splurge in the weekly food budget will not pause between the last bite of Big Mac and the trashcan to consider the possible value or uses and certainly not the wonders of the styrofoam, water-resistent, heat-resilient, durable and reclosable burger container; but obeys the command "dispose garbage here." He has been conditioned by his society not only as to what to do with garbage, but as to what precisely is garbage.

Even those in America who really cannot afford to waste are caught up in a national psychology of affluence, and have adopted their society's definitions of what precisely trash is.

Of course this is not to criticize or blame any individual for disposing of trash in the proper receptacles, nor is it to conclude that we all should conscientiously collect every bag or wrapper or container that arrives gratuit in the grocery, in the mail, or at the fast food joint. (Can you imagine how quickly the average closet of the average American home would overflow, if the average American saves every piece of re-usable "trash" he received in his daily life?) Rather, it is to highlight one difference between a "modern, technical society" and "underdeveloped" ones, it is to put waste...in perspective.

Whereas the average American or European visitor to Kenya would not have thought twice about tossing the bright-colored plastic bag he received at the shoestore out with his carrot peels and week-old English Muffins, he might indeed notice the lack of such conveniences as shopping bags or even wrappers or containers should he go to the local market in Nyeri in Central Province, in Kakamega in Western Province, or even in South B in Nairobi, Kenya. He might be dismayed or at least surprised to find his freshly carved piece of mutton wrapped in an already soggy piece of yesterday's newspaper; he might be unprepared to produce a vessel into which the five cups of sugar he purchases will be poured from the store owner's sack; and he might have forgotten to bring a bottle handy for carrying home the week's supply of paraffin. Besides being a bit bewildered at the absence of little white printed price stickers or even a sign posting prices of the products he is buying, not to mention the appalling presence of flies in the vicinity of uncovered food products, he might, at the end of a brief shop, be utterly hopeless about the prospects of getting his purchases home in any acceptable condition. If he had been wise enough to bring a carrying bag from home, he could do the easiest thing, which is to do like the locals and plop the whole load on his head, freeing the hands for crocheting, hand-shaking, and other necessary tasks. But more likely, even if he did think enough to bring a bag, he will be a little self-conscious about wearing his groceries on his neatly combed head, and so will be left with the dismal prospect of lugging his bag home as is, mutton juice oozing onto his unwrapped bread and bare pineapple and maize squishing the loose tomatoes with each step, and flies and other insects enjoying the maze of floppy cabbage leaves.

All in all, the Visiting Marketeer might return from the market and walk back with a new appreciation for plastic and paper grocery bags and their seeds of the Modernization Paradigm germinating in his head ("For the Third World, Primitive Societies to progress, They Must move towards Technological Advancement, Industrialization, and a Firm Commitment to Plastic Wrap..."). If he should go home that week he might share his market anecdote with his friends and after leading them to a new appreciation of their fortune for living in an affluent society which provides such conveniences as wax paper wrapper for meats, plastic bags for produce, and paper bags for the whole load, he might join them in their pity of those less fortunate people in less fortunate societies who have to make it without.

But to say he should stay at least another few weeks, being a liberal and open-minded guy and not wanting to get merely a superficial impression of Kenya, he returns to the market. This time he watches people—really looks at them as they carry on their marketing—and suddenly it is as if a great opaque cellophane wrapper is lifted from his eyes, and, as he begins to notice things he never did before, his previous conception of the relationship between packaging, product, and garbage crumbles about him.

He observes for the first time how most of the women who come to market carry empty, scrubbed out old margarine tins in their handwoven sisal bags, in which they can carefully place such tender purchases as tomatoes to keep them from getting crushed. He sees that most of the bottles people offer to the paraffin distributor are crystal clean old Coke bottles, which are then carefully stoppered up with wads of old newspaper. He recognizes that the ball the little boys are playing football with in the middle of the market square is a carefully wound ball of old twine. And futhermore, these things do not sadden him—he does not feel pity by the sight of people all around him making do—instead, he discovers: waste is not a thing, it is a frame of mind and a way of life.

Waste is not the unwanted and unappreciated paper and plastic packaging from our favorite department store; nor is it what some people pay hundreds of dollars to buy machines to compact; nor is it what litters cities and parks; nor is it what occupies huge tracts of land especially designated to be filled with it. Waste is the process by which people become numb not only to the potential value and use, not to mention the costs of things in their eveyday world, but oblivious to the fact that in other parts of the same earth people are making do successfully with a lot less.

Now our visitor can go home to America, although now things may not be exactly as before: he is a bit bothered every time he is obliged to toss a styrofoam egg carton out, thinking what a terrific tomatoe transporter it could be; he has a tendency to ignore the staleness of his week-old English Muffins and finish the whole package; he sometimes saves 7-UP bottles—the color of the glass is so nice—for pencil holders; and once and a while, when he gets home and dumps whatever it is he bought at DartDrug out of the bag, he takes a minute to toss the bag about, listen to its noises.

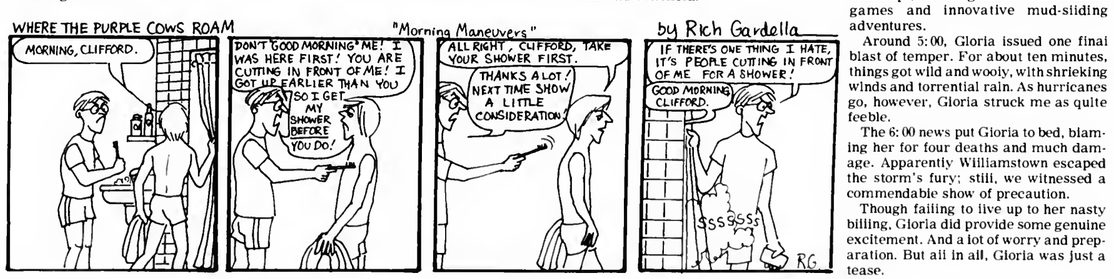
discouraged, and Greenfield now was only 35 miles away (I attribute the reduced mileage to an overzealous newscaster, and not to any insidiousness of Gloria).

Meanwhile, cancellations spread like wildfire; in general, the safest (and probably the only) thing to do was to listen to WCFM and gauge Gloria's progress. She was bent on the Berkshires, her eye equivocating between Greenfield and Pittsfield.



At 4:00 Gloria was (despite dire warnings from the radio) nowhere to be seen. Bored by the repetitive news, I decided to go for a short run to check out Gloria firsthand.

Jogging in a hurricane is not, perhaps, the wisest move, but Gloria was hardly a formidable foe. And, while she gave me a thorough drenching, I didn't encounter anything serious enough to close a college. Many other students shared my contempt, mocking Gloria with football games and innovative mud-sliding adventures.

Around 5:00, Gloria issued one final blast of temper. For about ten minutes, things got wild and wooly, with shrieking winds and torrential rain. As hurricanes go, however, Gloria struck me as quite feeble.

The 6:00 news put Gloria to bed, blaming her for four deaths and much damage. Apparently Williamstown escaped the storm's fury; still, we witnessed a commendable show of precaution.

Though failing to live up to her nasty billing, Gloria did provide some genuine excitement. And a lot of worry and preparation. But all in all, Gloria was just a tease.

Parking..... Security..... Damage..... Comet

Parking regs infuriate seniors

Changes in the parking policy for Currier and Mission Park lots have angered some senior residents of those houses. They say that they feel their seniority is being ignored.

Parking spaces in I and C lots, once reserved for seniors residing in Mission Park and Fitch-Currier, respectively, have been opened to all students with a parking sticker for Fitch-Currier/Prospect or Mission Park. Although many seniors have complained, Director of Security Ransom Jenks said he is determined to stick to the new policy.

Until this year, the Fitch-Currier president and each Mission Park house president provided security with a list of seniors, picked democratically, who were assigned stickers for either I lot, behind the infirmary, or C lot, behind Currier. According to Fitch-Currier President Helen Rozwadowski '87, house residents saw those spaces as a senior privilege, which underclassmen looked forward to having.

This year, Jenks decided that administrating the restricted use of the parking lot created too many problems for security and that the system had great potential for abuse. He changed the restriction so that anyone with an MP parking sticker can park in i lot, and anyone with an FP sticker can park in C lot.

The seniors' main objection seems to be that the system was changed without regard for traditional privileges of rank, Rozwadowski said. Once the new system had been explained to them, she said, everyone had to accept the change.

Subcommittee reports on security plan

This week a College Council subcommittee, chaired by Sally Hart '86, will ask for the council's endorsement of a proposal to have the College, not the individual houses, pay for security at parties.

This would answer student complaints about the high cost of security at parties but yearly house grants from the College might decrease as a result, Hart said. She said that houses paid almost $7,000 for security at parties last year.

The director of security decides the number of security officers needed for a party "based upon the nature, size and location of the party." For party security, each full-time security officer is paid time-and-a-half. Other uniformed persons receive $8.32 per hour, and student security monitors receive $5 per hour.

Hart said that both Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Assistant Dean William Darrow seemed optimistic about the proposal, adding that Jenks was also responsive to the idea.

The same subcommittee had originally planned to investigate the possibility of a student security force at parties, whose lower hourly wage would reduce the cost of security. They decided not to pursue this issue because administrators worried about the College's liability.

"There are real problems about the legal liability (of a student force)," Fix said last week, adding that he had considered the idea in the past. "We don't want to be encouraging a system which would be placing students under liability."

Freshmen damage entry

On September 16, water from a water fight leaked through the floors of Sage B, causing $215 worth of damage to the fire alarm system.

The fight started when entry residents decided to clean the floors after a party held the night before. "The floors were really scummy, and we thought a water fight would be a good way to clean them," Cooper Campbell '89 explained.

About two hours after the fight started, an alarm went off. Security came, and "(We) found it was caused by an abnormal amount of water that filtered down into the detectors," according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks. The alarm went off again while it was being reset.

Jenks filed a report of the incident with Dean of Freshman Robert Kavanaugh, normal procedure after such an incident, according to Jenks. Kavanaugh then discussed the damages with Gregory Lang '87 and David Pauisen '87, the junior advisors for Sage B. Kavanaugh decided that each of the 17 people involved would be charged $12.69 for damages.

Kavanaugh said, "I felt it was inappropriate for the JA's to be in it (the fight). I was particularly disappointed that they were involved." Lang and Pauisen declined to comment on the situation.

According to Jenks, 10 to 12 false alarms occur on campus each week. The most common causes are students playing basketball, smoking underneath a detector, removing detectors and pulling alarms. Jenks said that an alarm technician must be called in each time to reset the system. He added, "I think students aren't taking fire alarm equipment as seriously as they should, (which is) evidenced by the fact that people don't leave the building (when a fire alarm goes off)."

Planetarium offers comet program

The Hopkins Observatory will present "The Return of Halley's Comet" until Nov. 22. The original, student-written production is presented in the Milham Planetarium at 7:30 p.m. each Friday.

The show details the Comet's imminent return to the inner solar system. The history, folkore and superstition surrounding comets are presented, along with ideas about their structure, origins and importance to astronomy.

The Mehlin Museum of Astronomy opens at 7 p.m. before the show. Following the show, weather permitting, the audience will be able to observe the sky through telescopes.

The museum and planetarium are both located in the Hopkins Observatory. Shows are free and open to the public. Reservations are suggested and can be made by calling 597-2188.

Inter-college exchange starts, councils to meet

by John Faust

"Can we improve life in Berkshire County by working together?"

In answer to her own question, Williams Dance Coordinator Sandra Burton created last weekend's Dance Festival '85, the first step in inter-college participation between Williams and three area colleges.

The Festival grew out of a proposal Burton submitted to the Committee on Undergraduate Life last May outlining the development of "non-athletic inter-collegiate activities with neighboring institutions." The colleges involved are Williams, North Adams State, Bennington and Berkshire Community College.

Sandra Burton

Burton said she thought the pervading question on campus last year was how well the community as a whole was interrelating. "I started to realize that people don't think of themselves as part of a county with several educational institutions," she said.

Burton's plan is to initiate communication among all four institutions in order to decide upon feasible areas of interaction. She said this interaction fits in with the goal of a special Massachusetts task force to foster economic improvement in the Berkshires.

The plan was approved unanimously by College Council last May. Council president Anza Mammen '86, said that a special student-faculty committee was formed to clarify Williams' own goals for participation in the program.

Presidents of all four college councils will meet in mid-October and draft a proposal to be presented to the administrations at each school. In letters to the other presidents, Mammen urged that some kind of intra-college discussion take place at the other three schools before the October meeting.

Joint activities would provide a mixing of talent and a social outlet for students from each school, Burton said. "If you've got resources from four schools, you can certainly do more," she explained.

Community interaction is a fundamental part of education, according to Burton. "There's a lot of diversity right here in our area," she said, and put that diversity to use in the dance festival, which featured five New England-based dance companies sponsored by Williams, North Adams State College and the New England Foundation for the Arts.

"Each school has it's own identity — which should remain intact," Burton said, "but let's be neighbors. Let's be more than neighbors. Let's be partners."

Induction festivities begin tomorrow, culminating with Oakley installation

Activities to celebrate the induction of Francis C. Oakley as the thirteenth president of Williams College will kick off tomorrow with a tea and a concert. The induction ceremony itself will take place Saturday at 2:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall, preceded by an outdoor academic procession.

Because of limited seating, admission to Chapin Hall and Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, where the ceremony will be seen on video, is by invitation only. The College invites students to gather at the Log and Baxter Lounge, where large video screens will show the event. College employees are also invited to gather in Driscoll Lounge to watch the ceremony on a video screen.

Food Service will serve a special inaugural dinner to students on Friday. Saturday evening, President and Mrs. Oakley will host a dance for all students in Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink from 9 to 1.

Tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall, the Williams Chamber Singers and the Williams Trio will present a concert, which is open to the public.

The festivities will conclude with an interfaith service in Thompson Memorial Chapel on Sunday at 10:30 a.m. The College's three chaplains, the Reverend Carol J.S. Pepper, the Reverend Augustine Graap, O. Carm. and Rabbi Alan L. Berg, will conduct the service. The Reverend William S. Rich '75, rector of Grace Episcopal Church in Elkridge, Md., will deliver the sermon.

The College's museum and libraries have added exhibits relating to Oakley's induction to their shows. The entrance lobby to Sawyer Library will display "Francis Oakley: a Retrospective" through Nov. 8. The Williamsiana Collection and the Chapin Library also have special exhibits. The Williams College Museum of Art has scheduled five exhibits for the week of the induction.

The Sterling and Francine Clark Institute of Art has an exhibit in honor of Oakley, "Testimonies of Humanism," on display through Nov. 9.

doesn't make sense for a professor to leave a book off his syllabus if it will significantly contribute to the course."

Dewey said, "The average student will probably spend about $400 a year. We averaged it out to about $50 a course."

Dewey sees a tendency on the part of professors to "not use run-of-the-mill books. Students don't mind buying books that are germaine to the course — it's the books that don't appear anywhere, even on the exam, that students get upset about."

Upgrade relations

Dewey said that an upgrading of relations between the College, students and the bookstore is important to him. "(in the past) the burden was dumped on the students, who then put their irritation into the bookstore. If there was a sudden influx of students into a course we would necessarily be short. Students anxious to get off to a good start would get upset," he said.

The College's liberal add-/drop procedure also leads to some marked shortages, according to Fix. "Most book companies will not accept returns of more than 20% of an order, so Mr. Dewey can't just order an unlimited number of books." Fix said.

Dewey concurred, saying that these problems are unavoidable. He added, "Many conscientious instructors keep averages of add/drop figures, which help me out so that I can sometimes adjust a book order. Instructors should warn students when their enrollments shoot up that book shortages are possible."

After the successes of the first semester, Dewey said, "The big test will come with Winter Study and second semester when the time frame is much tighter and everything speeds up."

Intoxication policy

The student's name is taken only so that the officers involved will know who to pick up; that name is not recorded in the permenent log book, according to the memo. The only record of the incident is this notation: "transported intoxicated student from point A to point B."

Anti-social behavior

Corkins and Austin agreed that the only case in which a student would be reported or disciplined for drunkenness would be if he or she became violent and committed an anti-social act. "Anytime you commit an anti-social act, you would be disciplined," Austin said.

"Someone is paid to be here. There's no reason for someone else to lose sleep," she said. "i think it's really hard for students to care for someone who's really drunk, and sometimes it might even be dangerous," Austin said. "They're (the intoxicated students' friends) better off to bring them here, and maybe it's even better for the student," she added.

Corkins said that it's too early to tell if the new drinking age has had any effect on the number of alcohol poisoning incidents.

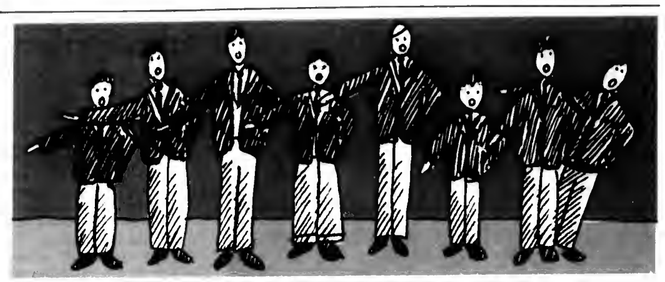
Superb acting makes success of The Sirens

by Lestie Jeffs

Saturday's performance of The Sirens was definitely worth the walt that resulted from Friday's "hurricane." The Cap & Bells production of the one-act play, directed by Michael Knight, was carried off remarkably well.

Lasting just over one hour, the show was skillfully presented. Although at times the action moved a little slowly and the stage movement was stilted, the entertaining plot—with its well-placed humor—was easy to follow.

Helga Davis '87 was superb in the role of Pepper, which allowed for some powerful and touching insights into the overwhelming need for love and respect. Davis kept the dialogue witty and light with a wonderful sense of timing, and her soliloquy—a high point of the play—was a masterpiece of emotion and honesty.



The relationship of Mavis (Julie Welborn '87) and Duane (Gregory Bester '87) served as an interesting parallel to that between Betty (Jacqui Davis '87) and Bobby (Roderick Bunch '88). Welborn gave a strong performance as a cynical, depressed woman who is scared to risk love again, having been hurt once before. Bester gave a brief but worthwile performance as her husband Duane, who seemed to lack the honesty of feeling seen in both Mavis and Pepper.

Both Jacqui Davis and Bunch appeared stilted and forced, seeming to recite lines from a script without bringing meaning to the words. However, Davis delivered an impressive monologue that conveyed the simple values of a young girl: love, happiness, and security.

The Sirens presented many important issues in an honest light, including the paln and disillusionment of growing up, the problems of the black economic situation, and the conflict between optimistic idealism and cynical despair.

Male/female relationships were explored from new angles. Both sides of the issue were presented, leaving the audience with more of an understanding and compassion for the actions of the the opposite sex.

Both the cast and crew of The Sirens are to be congratulated for a fine job. If this is any indication of upcoming Cap & Bells productions, Williamstown is going to be seeing a lot of talent onstage this year.

Campus groups sing with style

by Annie Cordova

Much like mixing a daiquiri or a milkshake, blending is an important element in becoming a member of one of Williams' selective singing. The members of Ephoria, Ephlats, the Octet, the Springstreeters and Essence all agreed that the group sounding good is far better than possessing an outstanding solo voice that is easily recognizable during performances.

Although all five singing groups require a solo at tryouts, Scott Koenig '86 of the Octet noted, "Someone might not have the greatest solo voice, but if they can blend well they'll be in anyway."

In addition, the groups select new members according to which voice parts are needed. Although this might not appear to be fair, if a group needs a tenor it is unlikely to admit a soprano. Also important is how quickly a person can learn music. Because most of the groups perform several selections at a time, it is necessary for them to move at a rapid pace.

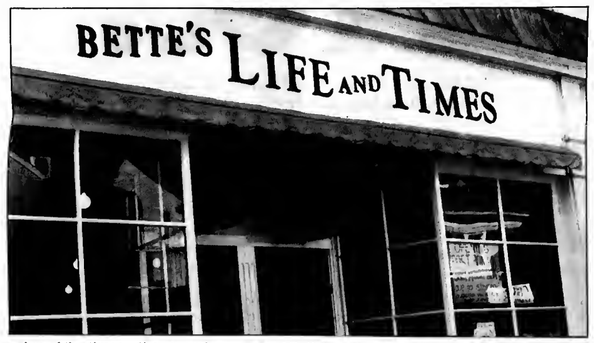
The admission of new people is just one of several decisions a singing group must make; others deal with such issues as performance schedules and attire. For the Springstreeters, an all-male group of ten, all decisions are made by consensus. According to member Rob Wieman '87, president Dave Jaeger '86 and musical director Paul Rardin '87 "pretty much run the boat;" however, if even one person in the group is bitterly opposed to an idea, the idea is abandoned.

Good tunes & times

Administrative decisions and politics are by no means the dominant aspects of Williams singing groups. Most groups agree that making good music together and having fun are just as important as the reputation and physical appearance of the group.

Although these five groups have similar tryout processes and standards, they vary greatly in their repertoire. For example, the only all-female group on campus, Ephoria, will sing "anything from 'Neath the Shadows of the Hill' (the Williams song) to Pat Benatar's 'Fire and Ice'," according to sophomore member Megan Hawgood. This a capella group prefers—for acoustical reasons—to perform in such places as Chapin Hall and Brooks Rogers Auditorium, although Hawgood noted that Log performances also are fun.

Essence has a unique opinion about the concept of on-stage performance. Sophomore Wendell Chestnut said that one of the group's favorite places to perform is Currier Ballroom. Not only does the ballroom offer pleasing aesthetics and good acoustics, but it also allows Essence to perform on the same level as its audience. "We don't like to put ourselves above anyone," Chestnut said.



Diversified in its musical taste—singing such opposites as gospel and Phil Collins—this co-ed group encourages audience participation and tries to make everyone happy with its music.

A distinct characteristic of the Ephlats, also a male/female group, is that it tends to have a more relaxed musical style. By opting to sing Top 40, 70's music and old-time jazz, the Ephlats set the stage for a performance in which the audience can readily recognize most of their selections.

Member Vicki Rummler '88 stated, "People say we look like we're really having fun when we sing—I like people who remember us like that."

Williams Octet members take their role as singers very seriously, for they carry on a tradition that began in 1941. "Other people on campus think that people in the Octet are conceited about (the) group," Koenig said, but he attributes this misconceptlon to the

It's a sign of the times—the recently renovated Bette's coffee shop is now under the ownership of three Williams alums, who have expanded both the floor space and the menu. Although scheduled to open last Friday, Huricane Gloria delayed the start of business until yesterday. (Plonsker)

Entrepreneurial alums add new spice of life to old-thyme Bette's

by Eric Hanson

Spring Street may never be the same. In keeping with the recent trend of reconstruction in Williamstown, Bette's Coffee Shop, a fixture in the area for more than 12 years, has taken on a new name and new dimensions.

"Bette's Life and Times" officialty opened last Friday for regular business, following a perlod of construction that more than doubled the restaurant's floor space. Behind all these changes are three Williams alumni: Nlca Faulkner '84, Rick Gagliano '83 and Todd Solomon '84.

Mutual interest in the purchase of the restaurant brought Faulkner and Solomon together as business partners during the summer of 1984. By last February, the deal was compieted. Gagliano, a professional contractor, was hired for the expansion and "Life and Times" was born.

Dollars and sense

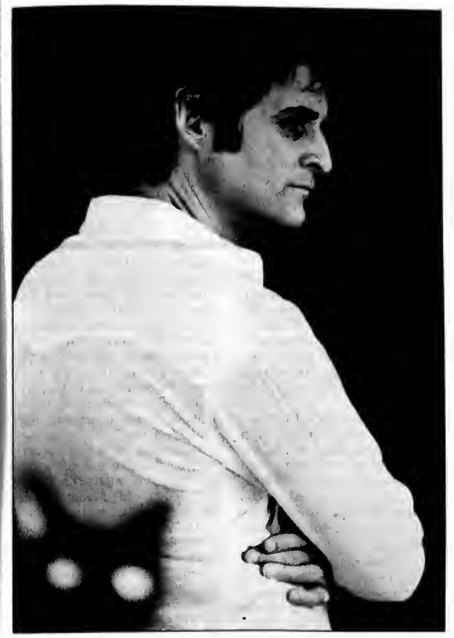
The name and size of the establishment are not the only changes the new management is making. The owners also have an entirely new philosophy for business management that they plan to test out with the restaurant. "With the way present commerce is," Solomon explained, "whenever you put down your dollar, you are more often than not dissatisfied." The new "Bette's" is alming to change the relationshlp between proprietor and customer.

The menu includes soups, salads and sandwiches, with most meals costing between $1.50 and $4.00. Dinners will be added in the future. "We want to offer good food at a fair price," said Faulkner.

The new owners also anticipate serving a wider variety of customers than did the coffee shop. "Bette's has always been a popular place, but within a smaller circle," noted Gagliano.

"We realized the need for a small, inexpensive place within walking distance of the campus that would attract both students and people from the town," Faulkner said. "We want it to be an attractive place for someone to go, either for a quiet meal or to meet someone."

The three alumni are glad to be a part of the continuing development of Williamstown. "This town has changed a lot recently," Faulkner noted. "It used to be a place that people just 'passed through'; now it's a destination."



Solomon agreed, adding, "We're at a fascinating time in terms of Williamstown's development. It's a much more popular tourist stay these days."

The undertaking of such a major venture has been no easy task for the trio. "It's a very old building," said Gagliano, "and every time you take something apart it takes three steps to put it back together."

Solomon also admitted to frustration at times, saying "There are always moments when you feel like you're just banging your head against the wall and wonder why you're doing it at all."

Nevertheless, the entrepreneurs agree that the rewards of the project outweigh the hassles. "The most exciting time of the day," said Faulkner, "is at breakfast when everyone is there before work, the place is buzzing with conversation and you're just looking out over it all. It's really a unique situation."

Profile:
Tony Perry, Newsroom owner, shares views of town and gown

by Joe Thorndike

Most Williams students have met him. Many have talked to him. But probably few know Tony Perry's history. Last year, he became the owner of a venerated Williamstown institution, the Williams Newsroom. Before that, though, he was a man with few permanent roots.

Perry describes himself as "a local guy who spent a whole lifetime as a jazz singer." His words ring with truth.

He started out singing with his brother in a group called The Moonshiners, and after three years joined The Serendipity Singers. Finally, he wound up singing in numerous New York and Los Angeles jazz clubs.

Eventually, though, Perry left the music world to return home. "All I ever wanted to do was jazz," Perry said, "but it's a very low income, very low probability job. You have to get a lot of satisfaction out of doing it. You don't make any money unless you're very lucky."

While he may have settled on a more secure means of making a living, Perry hasn't abandoned his musical work. He's still writing and singing, and recently performed at Capers. Moreover, he said that he is closer now than he has ever been to getting a record label.

Perry provides a unique perspective on both Williamstown and the College, able to contrast their character today with 30 years ago. Speaking of Williamstown in general, Perry said, "If you didn't see the interim stages, you'd never know it was the same town. It's twice the size and it feels twice the size."

"If you didn't see the interim stages you'd never know it was the same town. It's twice the size and it feels twice the size."

Perry lived in the Purple Valley until he was 15, at which point he left for boarding school; however, he witnessed the gradual expansion of town and college between 1958 and 1984 when he averaged almost one weekend a month at home. Perhaps that accounts for his easy adaptation to the Williamstown of today. "It definitely feels like coming back to the same town, maybe just twice as much of it," he commented.

In the view of this Williamstown veteran, local residents are fortunate. "Williamstown has a wider variety of things to offer than any other small town in this country, as well as fewer drawbacks," he said.

Nonetheless, Perry does see several problems in the town. Among them, he cites the negative impact of regionalizing the high school and the emerging need for a mayoral form of government.

Austria's independence marked with symposium of Viennese art

Boasting such luminaries as Strauss, Freud, Mahler, Wittgenstein, Klimt and Loos, turn-of-the-century Vienna made a long-lasting contribution to Western culture. This weekend, Williams College, the Williams College Museum of Art and several other sponsors will present a three-day symposium on the Austrian city and its cultural legacy.

Marking the 30th anniversary of Austrian independence, the symposium, entitled Vienna 1900: Paradox, Politics and Patronage, will focus on art patronage and criticism during the twilight years of the Hapsburg Empire. Events will run from Thursday through Saturday.

"The symposium will be of interest to a general audience," said Wanda Bubriski, coordinator of the symposium. "And particularly to anyone planning to spend a term in Vienna."

According to Bubriski, the artists profiled in the symposium are largely responsible for the current wide interest in in Vienna 1900, and are considered trend-setters for today's styles in fashion, architecture and design.

During the weekend's events, an international slate of scholars will discuss this period of Viennese history. The keynote speaker will be Christian M. Nebehay, noted Viennese antiquarian, art dealer and author. His address will be in Brooks-Rogers Auditorium at 4:30 p.m. Thursday.

Friday evening, in conjuction with the induction of Williams College President Francis Oakley, there will be a concert of Viennese music by the Williams Trio and Williams College Chamber Singers. Beginning at 8:00 in Chapin Hall, the concert will be followed by a reception.

Friday's activities include morning sessions on "Monarchy & Municipality: Government in the Service of Art," and "Industrialists, Financiers and Other Patrons;" afternoon sessions are "From Workshop to Showroom," and "Propagandists and Critics." On Saturday, the concluding session will be, "Was Vienna Unique?"

All symposium proceedings will take place at the Clark Art Institute, and will be followed by a discussion period led by a moderator.

In addition, speakers and moderators will be on campus and available to speak with students and symposium participants, according to Bubriski.

More information is available from Bubriski at 597-2429. All symposium events are free and open to the public.

A book decoration of "Pallans Athene" by Austrian artist Gustav Klimt for the Secession journal, Ver Sacrum, 1900. Klimt and other Viennese cultural figures will be topics of this weekend's symposium.

group's dedication to its music.

Dressed in the traditional Octet uniform of khakis, a navy blazer, a blue oxford shirt and the famous purple cow tie, the group performs a number of non-traditional a capella selections, including Elvis Costello and Joe Jackson arrangements.

Each of the five singing groups demands about six hours a week of rehearsal time, with even more time required before concerts. Although singing in Essence, Ephlats, Ephoria, the Springstreeters or the Octet entails hard work and sometimes frustration, each of the groups is proud to be part of the Williams entertainment community.

More notably, however, Perry occasionally perceives a provincial attitude. "There is a local mentality that chooses to fight the College rather than acknowledge that it is the backbone of the community," he said.

Perry's view of the College is based on long observation. While growing up here, he was constantly involved with Williams. Besides using his vocal talents to entertain at school parties, he was also a batboy and waterboy for Williams teams.

Ephemeral times

The changes in the college from those days are, in Perry's view, substantial. He described the time before the abolition of fraternities as "the Animal House years," noting, "The student body was so together. The spirit was super. Williams was known to be the school no one wanted to come up and play. You could sit there and feel sorry for the other teams."

Perry recalled the attitude of former Williams coach Dale Long as being indicative of the school's character in past years. "Coaching at Williams," said Perry, "was the closest he had ever come to being at a service academy."

The social life was also very active. "The weekends could get pretty nutty," Perry recalled. "On Friday afternoons the street was just filled with people starting the weekend."

These fond memories are not to imply that Perry yearns for the Williams of past years; rather, he loves the school of today. "I'm very impressed by the student body," he maintained, "and I don't worry that Williams students are missing a lot of fun."

Linksters take fourth at Duke Nelson

by Stewart Verdery

The Williams golf team moved into the middle of their season in a solid but not spectacular fashion last week by capturing fourth place in the Duke Nelson Invitational last weekend at Middlebury and third at the Skidmore Tourney.

On Tuesday the linksters placed third in the closely-contested Skidmore tournament. The course played to a par-74 as construction on the back-nine required that the front nine be played twice. Colgate took the team competition with a 319 total, three shots ahead of Oswego State. Williams recorded a 323 total.

Ephman co-captain Chas Foehl '87 became the medalist with a two-over par 76, "an excellent round" considering the conditions, according to co-captain Guy Kurtz '87. Foehl was followed by Tim Frechette '89, whose 79 for sixth place included an unfortunate quintuple bogey. Bill Tierney '86 took thirteenth with an 82. Kurtz said that "there wasn't much help for Chas." Coach Richard Poehl was relatively pleased with his team's performance, but noted that they had had "a good chance of winning" in the tight team competition.

Williams earlier had taken fourth place in the Duke Nelson Invitational September 21-22 with a two-day score of 636. Foehl, who led the Ephmen with rounds of 77 and 78 for a 155 total, placing fourth, echoed other team members' statements in saying that while finishing fourth was very respectable, "we were second after the first day and let it slide. We should have finished higher." Frechette finished ninth with a score of 157(76-81), followed by Tim McKone '87 and Kurtz both with 162 (80-82).

Paul Martin of Amherst was the medalist at 148. Division I school University of Maine won the team title with a 628, with Amherst second at 631, Salem St. third at 634 and St. Michael's tied with Williams for fourth at 636. Poehl remarked that "each player had a moment which badly hurt his score," but said he was "very happy" that they had kept pace with the more experienced teams.

Polo tops Deerfield

by Frank Vespe

It was a busy week for the water polo team, as they played twice. On Wednesday, the Ephs narrowly defeated Deerfield Academy 13-12, when John Cooke '88 scored with under a minute to play. The victory followed a disappointing 7-4 loss to R.P.I on Tuesday.

The Deerfield game started slowly for both teams, going scoreless until Deerfield tallied at 4:00 of the first quarter. Alex Kraus '86 drew Williams even with the first of his three goals at 5:41, but Deerfield regained the lead at 6:19.

Seven seconds after Deerfield scored, Williams called time out, somewhat befuddlingly since but 34 seconds remained in the quarter. The reasons for the time out quickly became clear, however, when Kraus scored off of a scramble in front of the goal just 15 seconds later to tie the game at 2-2.

Deerfield quickly took command in the second quarter, scoring twice before a minute had elapsed. Williams righted itself, though, and took the lead on a goal by Chris Kirwan '87 and two by Will Andrew '86.

The lead was short-lived though as Deerfield scored at 5:30, just 11 seconds after Andrew had given the Ephmen their first lead. Andrew scored his third goal of the game shortly thereafter to give Williams a 6-5 halftime advantage.

The third quarter saw the lead change hands yet again as Deerfield outscored Williams 4-2 to take a 9-8 edge. Williams' goals were scored by Andrew at 1:35 and Kirwan at 5:23, but they were overwhelmed by the Deerfield attack.

The final quarter saw four more ties before the lead changed hands for the final time. Kraus tallied at 1:18 to bring Williams even, but 16 seconds later Deerfield regained the lead for the final time. Williams finally took the lead for good on a pair of goals by Andrew.

The pendulum swung back, though: Deerfield scored twice, sandwiching Andrew's seventh goal, to tie the game 12-12 with fewer than 90 seconds to play, setting the stage for Cooke's heroics at 6:10.

On the previous day, the Ephs had stumbled against a supposedly inferior R.P.I. squad, spotting the Engineers a 6-0 lead en route to a 7-4 defeat.

Field hockey wins 4-1 over Cards

by Tom Ewing

A 4-1 victory over Mt. Holyoke gave the field hockey team its fourth stralght win of the season on Saturday.

Senior co-captain Jean Hakmiller started her second consecutive game in the goal after missing two games due to injuries. Coach Chris Larson-Mason said "Jean did a great job, as usual."

Williams sophomore Lisa Tenerowicz scored twice, to provide half of the Ephwoman total offensive onslaught. Jennifer Kosky '86 and Kirsten Neuse '89 each scored once to account for the remainder of the Williams total.

Coach Mason said that the team was off to a good start on the season. She anticipates that the tougher part of the schedule lies ahead, but she said the team is looking forward to their tougher opponents.

The squad plays at Middlebury on Wednesday and at Trinity Saturday.

game with hard serves. "Laura did a great job one point at a time," commented Hudson-Hamblin.

The team split their matches Monday, defeating Russell Sage but losing to Albany. Russell Sage was an easy victory, the Ephwomen never falling behind in either game. Albany's offense proved to be too tough for Williams, although both games were close. Albany coach Patrick Dwyer stated, "We knew it would be a close game, but we were hoping to win based on the Great Dane tournament." Albany placed second in that tournament last week.

The team travels to Schenectady, NY on Thursday to play Union and North Adams Colleges.

"showed great courage in coming back to tie when they were down after dominating the match." He noted especially the play of midfielders McEvoy, Wright, and co-captain Mark Schroeder '86, and defenders Masters and Weiner, who was playing at sweeper, filling in for the injured Jon Deveaux '87.

On Wednesday, Williams suffered its first loss of the season at Clark, who earlier this season was ranked 8th nationally in Division III. Clark's Doug O'Brien scored both goals, the first halfway through the first period on a shot which Eph goalkeeper Brad Bryan '87 had covered until it was deflected by a Williams defender. That was Clark's only shot on goal in the first half. O'Brien scored again 37 minutes into the second half. Russo attributed the loss to Williams inability to score on "some very good opportunities.

Middlebury added a meaningless goal to shrink the margin of victory to two.

The game against Middlebury was clearly the squad's best effort thus far this year against a quality team. Said co-captain Ashley Mace '86, "Middlebury is a good team. We came out strong and held it throughout. We're continuing to put things together as we grow as a team. If we keep going like this, we should do well."

The team will get a chance to measure their improvement this week as they play two games: at the University of Hartford today and at Trinity on Saturday.

Tunics, flails, victims, and lunacy

The Williams Record brings you all sports. But fencing stories have been conspicuous in their absence, people stop me on the street to say. A large contingent of Perry House Medievallsts (otherwise known as lunatics) did their best to get media coverage by attacking my trusty and loyal sidekick Cliff Peale '87.

On the Record
by John Schafer

Now, many sports teams have criticized my work here and some have called me a sexist, which I can handle, but I draw the line when people try to harpoon Cliff. The main evildoer was Jeff Weinstein '87, although Perry House as a whole cannot escape blame. The day was Saturday, and it was Medieval Banquet Day at Perry—that's the day security unlocked the Perry cages and the loonies got to play outside.

Cliff and his friend Coleman Yeaw '87 were innocently walking to Greylock for dinner when they accidentally stumbled on the organized mayhem known as "the banquet." They will never be the same.

Weinstein was dressed in a double-knit polyester tunic from Zayres which was supposed to represent Byzantine silk. As Jeff tells it, he was trying to recruit Coleman for the part of Rob Moreland '87 in a movie; as Cliff tells it, Jeff came at them waving a flail and dressed in robes and a polyester tunic—for anyone a frightening sight. Cliff, trying to use his vast knowledge of sports terms, claims he "parried" with Jeff for a second while Coleman hung back. In actuality, they fled across Route 2. Jeff pursued.

On the other side of Main Street, our two heroes found some semblance of courage and tackled the crusading Weinstein. Jeff was clearly in deep trouble until Cliff and Coleman looked up to see the rest of Perry had flown the coop and was coming at them. The 25 man force was led by Arvind Singh '88 wielding a plastic cup. The sight of 25 men wearing dresses and carrying clubs and swords was more than enough to chase the small amount of courage out of our heroes. They did what they do best—ran.

Jeff, crusading as never before, chased the two up the stairs into the dinning room flailing madly until he ran into someone who was courageous enough to stop him. This heroine was the food service employee at the entrance. She deserves a medal, and Coleman and Cliff owe her their lives.

Jeff defended all his actions by the blanket excuse, "It was a Medieval Banquet, you dope."

What kind of college are we that lets someone like Weinstien flail around without supervision? This is the same man who volunteered me to be the purple cow at a College Council meeting. Perhaps I'm being unfair, and Jeff is ready for a lengthy legal battle with me. "I know Eric Vincent," he ranted in an interview, "and Anza Mammen will be a character witness for me."

Soccer beats RPI in overtime on Nachamkin's second goal

by Greg Lecds

Nikolai Nachamkin '88 scored two goals, including a game-saver with 45 seconds left to put the game into overtime, as the men's soccer team defeated RPI 4-3 on Saturday. The Ephs pushed their record to 1-1-1 following a 2-0 loss to Clark earlier in the week.

RPI's Ted Gray scored the game's first goal just 6:15 into the first half, but Eph co-captain Jeff McEvoy '86 tied the score, putting in his first and Williams' first goal of the season. He was assisted by Denny Wright '87 with the score which came at 34:35 into the half. Then, just 26 seconds later, Scott Walker '87 pumped in another goal off a pass from Mike Masters '89, putting Williams ahead 2-1.

Jack Birr of RPI evened the score at 17:59 into the second period, and RPI scored again off a penalty kick against Eph goalkeeper Rob Blanck '89. With less than a minute left, it looked as if Williams was about to lose, despite having dominated the game, outshooting RPI 39-5. Then Nachamkin drilled in a shot from the front of the goal, forcing the game into overtime. Nachamkin then finished off RPI with the clincher at 5:29 into the overtime period off a cross from Helge Weiner '87.

Hamilton tops Ephs 16-14

by Greg Keller

The Hamilton Continentals engineered a late fourth quarter drive to set up a game-winning 37 yard field goal for a come from behind 16-14 victory over the Ephmen.

Hamilton jumped to an early lead after Williams' Jay Hickman '86 fumbled on his own 27 yard line. Two plays later, the Continentals completed a 23 yard touchdown pass to go ahead 7-0. The Ephmen responded with a strong ball control offense, marching 76 yards in 15 plays. Quarterback Scott Powers '88 completed two key first down passes. Two Hamilton penalties in opportune situations also rescued Williams from punting situations. Fullback Tom O'Connor '86 capped the drive with a two yard plunge into the end zone with 4:50 remaining in the first quarter.

On Hamilton's next possession, two big plays resulted in the Contintentals' second score. First, a 43 yard pass by quarterback Seamus Crotty to his split end put Hamilton in Williams territory, and several plays later, tailback Jim Korfanta spun through the Eph defense for a 27 yard touchdown run. The point after touchdown attempt failed.

Williams challenged late in the second period by driving to the Hamilton nine yard line before Hamilton intercepted a Powers pass in the end zone, perserving the Continentals 13-7 halftime lead.

In the second half, neither team scored until Hickman dove over the goal line with 10:22 remaning in the game. Freshman Tony Fuller kicked the extra point to give Williams a 14-13 egde.

On Hamilton's next possession, Eph defensive back Jerry Rizzo '87 picked off a Crotty pass and returned it to the Hamilton 37. However, the Continentals stopped the Eph attack by holding O'Connor to no gain on a key fourth and one play. Hamilton's final drive culminated in the game-winning field goal.

For the Ephmen, Hickman ran for 80 yards in 24 attempts while O'Connor picked up 49 yards on 12 carries. Powers completed 10 of 22 passes for 97 yards. The Ephmen face the Trinity Bantams on Saturday in Hartford.

Volleyball tops St. Rose, Conn, and Mt. Holyoke

by Debbie Snyder

The women's volleyball team was down 14-9 to the College of St. Rose Saturday when they took five straight points, fighting back to win the third game 16-14, giving them the five game match 15-5, 15-9, 16-14.

Williams was victorious over both Mount Holyoke 15-2, 15-5, and Cnnecticut College 15-11, 16-14 at Connecticut on Thursday. They also defeated Russell Sage easily at home Monday 15-7, 15-13 but feli to Albany 15-10, 15-13.

The Ephwomen took control quickly on Saturday, allowing St. Rose only five points in the first game. Becky Moehring '87 served well in the second game, winning the last three points. A lack of concentration in the third game set them back 9-14, but they played each point well and tied at 14. Maureen Brand '88 serving and Caroline Teer '87 spiking came through with the last two points.

The team's greatest triumph was defeating Mount Holyoke, the N.I.A.C. tournament champs the past three years, for the first time ever. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin credited the win to a strong defense stating, "Every spike Mount Holyoke hit we were able to turn into our own offense." Co-captain Lisa Jayne '86 and Nancy Hedeman '89 were key in this defense, blocking many spikes.

Routs Connecticut College

Williams also beat Connecticut College Thursday to sweep the tri-match. They were never behind in the first game. Brand came off the bench with powerful serves to get many quick points. Connecticut pulled ahead 5-2 in the second game, but Hedeman serving and Jayne spiking and blocking brought the score back to 9-9. Laura Wefing '88 finished off the

Soccer bests Panthers 4-2

by Al Mottur

Sparked by two goals from Chris Boddiker '88, the varsity women's soccer team swept by Middlebury 4-2 on Wednesday in its only action this week. The team's game against Wesleyan, scheduled for last Saturday, was postponed due to the heavy rains from Hurricane Gloria.

At 20:53 of the first half against the Panthers, Beth Bernheimer '88 fed to junior co-captain Gigi Madore who opened the scoring with an offspeed shot which eluded the Middlebury keeper. Ten minutes later, Boddiker connected on the first of her two goals, the assist coming off the foot of Michelle Barry '87.

Then with over 16 minutes to go in the half, Boddiker upped the Ephwoman lead to three as she was scored on a breakaway. That goal, Boddiker's fifth in just four games, kept her on a pace which will most likely make her the team's leading scorer for the second year in a row. According to coach Lisa Melendy, "She possesses real poise with the ball and is very good at reading where the defender or goalie is going," enabling her to effect her successful one-on-one moves.

Pouring on the pressure

Up by three at the half, the Ephwomen continued to pressure their opponents as the game progressed. That pressure proved profitable as the team padded the its lead to 4-0 12 minutes into the second half. The score occurred after a scramble around the Middlebury goal when Bernheimer got the ball and passed it to Barry who kicked it into the net.

With their lead now at four, Williams held their oponents scoreless for twenty more minutes until Jen Smith shot the ball past Williams goalie Beth Edwards '89 who was subbing for sophomore Joyce Rogers. With but five seconds left,

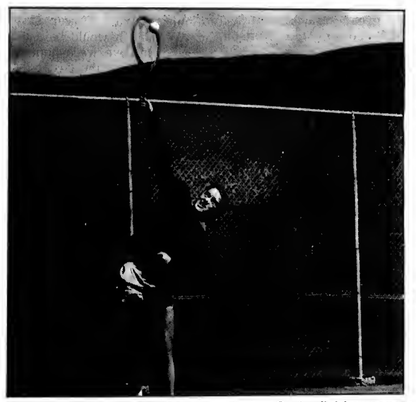
Tennis tops Springfield, Holyoke

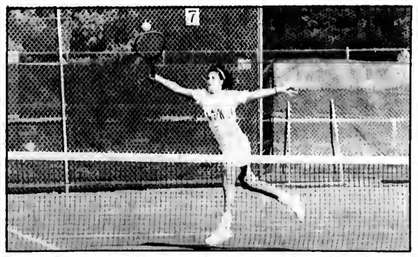


by Rob Ward

Every Saturday, a dozen opponent tennis players step on the Williams courts dressed in pristine whites. And two hours later, they leave, having bowed to the Ephwomen varsity tennis team.

This past Saturday, it was Springfield that fell, 7-2, raising Williams' record to 4-1. Earlier in the week, the team squeezed by Mount Holyoke, 5-4.

Assistant coach Ed Grees took over this past week in coach Sean Sloane's absence, and was impressed by the ease with which Williams dispensed with Springfield, as no match went more than two sets. "Freshmen Missy Crouchley did everything right, playing a great serve and volley game," he noted. 6-0, 6-1 was the score of her first collegiate victory, and it came after losing two hard-fought three set matches in the past week. "Mary Montgomery '88, Jenni Koski '86 and co-captain Sue Brown '86 all played well at singles too," added Grees.



However, the real success came in the doubles, where Williams has struggled all season long. That was not the case on Saturday, as Debbie Bernheimer '86 and Katie Kerr '87 won 6-4, 6-2 at first doubles, co-captain Liz Kellison '87 and Geri Hugo '86 triumphed 6-0, 6-3 at number two, and Laura Rogers '86 and Anne Petersen '89 captured third doubles 6-3, 7-5.

Squeaker over Mt. Holyoke

Last Tuesday, Williams journeyed to Mount Holyoke, and quickly bolted to a 4-1 lead in the match. At first singles, Mary Montgomery quickly crushed her opponet 6-2, 6-0, and Liz Peay '86 registered a bagel at second singles, winning 6-0, 6-0. Koski and Kellison also registered wins at fifth and sixth singles, 6-3, 6-4 and 6-3, 6-0, respectively.

Debbie Bernheimer '86 lunges for a volley in Saturday's Springfield match. (Plonsker)

The match looked over, but the Ephwomen had troubling nailing it down, and Holyoke rallied to tie the match at four all. The last match was first doubles, where Bernheimer and Kerr rallied to win in the clutch, 3-6, 6-2, 6-2. According to co-captain Kellison, "it was one of the most amazing matches. Their volleys were incredible!"

Coach Grees was pleased with the win, but thought Williams should have blown Holyoke away, as their depth and experience was limited. However, "the match was played indoors, on a very slippery surface which was a definite factor," stated Kellison.

It will be another week before the Ephwomen play on their familiar clay courts, as they travel to Middlebury tomorrow, and then to Trinity on Saturday. But at almost the halfway point of the season, a certain familiar sight, the Little Three Championship, looms as a distinct possibility again.

Oakley installed as president

by Virginia Demaree

Despite gloomy weather and intermittent downpours, the induction of Francis C. Oakley as president of Williams College went off with only a few hitches Saturday.

The rain almost cancelled the traditional academic procession but let up allowing seniors, graduate students, current and former faculty members, trustees and speakers to march in academic gown to Chapin Hall.

Carmen Massimiano, sheriff of Berkshire County, led the procession, followed by Dean of the College Stephen Fix serving as chief marshal. More than 50 representatives from colleges in the United States, Great Britain and Europe marched in the procession.

The issue of divestment, although never directly referred to during the speeches, influenced several of the speakers. Chaplain of the College Carol Pepper opened the ceremony with an invocation that supported the protesters outside, saying, "We remember South Africa."

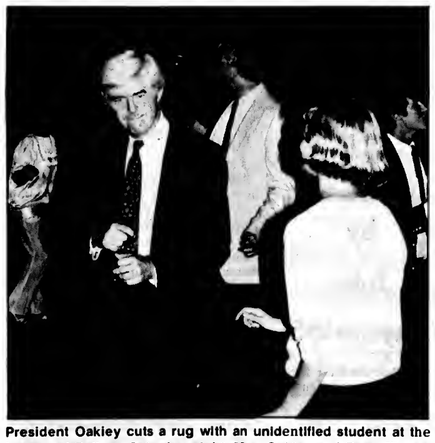
Mammen speaks

Anza Mammen '86, president of the College Council, speaking for the undergraduates, asked Oakley to ensure that, "...we Williams students will be encouraged to be less insular — allowing ourselves to be touched by world events and problems though we may not be directly affected by them.



"Let our education become a bit more painful," Mammen continued, "in confronting those ideas which seem foreign to us ... Let each course we take leave scars on our intellect."

Philip Lundquist '57, president of the Society of Alumni; James MacGregor Burns '39, senior member of the faculty; and John W. Chandler, president emeritus, also gave short greetings to Oakley at the beginning of the ceremony.

Fred C. Robinson, Douglass Tracy Smith professor of English at Yale University, and Eldred D. Jones, principal of Fourah Bay College in the University of Sierra Leone, received honorary doctor of letters degrees from Oakley after his induction.

Peaceful protest on rain-drenched steps

by Harwell Wells

Saturday afternoon members of the Williams community held a peaceful demonstration protesting Williams' investment policy in South Africa. The inauguration of Francis C. Oakley as Williams' thirteenth president was the backdrop for the protest.

According to statements by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition, the protest was aimed at immediate divestment of those companies in the College's investment portfolio which have not signed the Sullivan Principles on business ethics in South Africa. In addition, WAAC is looking at Jan. 1, 1986 as the deadline for complete divestment of all stock in companies which do business in South Africa.

Planned by WAAC, the protest consisted of a rally in front of Chapin Hall during the inaugural procession and the distribution of armbands to those in the procession who wished to show their support. The rally followed meetings last week on the subject by WAAC, the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility and the College Council.

Approximately one hundred members of the senior class wore white armbands, and a few carried posters. The majority of the Center for Development Economics graduate students wore armbands. Only a few of the senior members of the faculty wore armbands, although Kurt Tauber, professor of political science, had both an armband and a poster. More armbands appeared on the junior faculty, including assistant deans Roberto Ifill, William Darrow and Sheila Spear.

'Staggeringly successful'

Tom Williams '87, said he felt the protest had been "staggeringly successful" because of the large number of seniors wearing armbands. Williams cited the presence of large numbers of alumni as well as the Board of Trustees as a reason for using the inauguration as the staging ground for the protest.

The processional itself began near Morgan Hall, walking through Hopkins Gate and past the President's House before

Police chief expounds on drinking-age laws

By Andrew Mayer

Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito described the intricacies of the new Massachusetts law raising the drinking age to 21 and the methods of enforcement used in the area.

Only people who are 21 or were already 20 before the new law came into effect may legally consume, carry or transport alcoholic beverages, Zoito said. The penalty for drinking when underage is not more than a fifty-dollar fine.

Zoito leaves most actual on-campus enforcement to the College's security force. Director of Security Ransom Jenks has stated that usually the town police wait for a call from his department before involving themselves on campus. "You fellas gotta do your own policing," Zoito said, adding that he believes that the College is making an effort to have parties without alcohol.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life held discussions last week on how alcohol should be distributed at parties. Chairman Michael Bell said that the committee decided, "If some form of regulation (of alcohol) is necessary, we find the quantity control or bar service methods most attractive and would want to leave the individual choice up to the houses or hosts."

Zoito cautioned students about the increasingly important issue of liability. He explained that anyone, includ-

Suspect pursued in local late-night harassments

Chief Joseph Zoito Jr. of the Williamstown Police said that he has a suspect in last month's verbal accosting of several Williams students.

The man was reported to have approached several female students late Tuesday night, September 24, and early the next morning. The suspect was seen in West College, on Hoxsey Street and on Park Street. He did not physically accost anyone, but made lewd and suggestive remarks, Director of Security Ransom Jenks said.

Zoito said that his force is watching this person very closely, but he would not release any more information for fear of damaging his case. He said that he, himself, takes regular strolls around campus.

The man was described as being 5'9", between the ages of 25 and 30, and having dark hair, a beard and a moustache.

The man is also the suspect in an incident which took place on Park Street last Sunday night, said Williams Director of Security Ransom Jenks. A resident of a house on Park Street reported to the police that a man answering the same description had verbally accosted her. The man was driving a late-70's model yellowish brown car, Jenks said. "We feel that it was the same man," he said.

Maturity

The anti-apartheid protest this weekend was a pleasant surprise for many people who had expected the worst. After widespread rumors of violence, disruption of the procession and the possibility of throwing objects at those marching, it was good to see that WAAC was able to express itself in terms which encouraged cooperation rather than aggression.

Many at Williams felt that the induction was neither the time nor place for political debate and were afraid that a precious moment in the college's history—the ceremonial beginning of Frank Oakley's tenure as president—would be marred. Yet the protestors made their voices heard in a peaceful way through armbands, posters and chants at the entrance to Chapin Hall, without alienating those people in a position to help them. Had the protestors been violent, they would have done more harm than good and would have caused resistance among precisely the people they wanted to influence.

In his induction address Oakley called on students not to look at academics without also considering issues of global importance. The focus on South Africa, which found its way into many parts of the weekend activities, was one example of this wider vision. Recognizing that the trustees and administration can be co-workers and not enemies in the fight for change is another example of vision, and of the maturity of those who are voicing their opinions.

Letters

Self-Righteousness

To The Editor:

Allow me to begin by stating that I sympathize with the contention that the Apartheid system is a violator of basic human rights. I shan't contest this belief, nor shall I compare it to anything. I shall simply accept it as true along with its assumptions; I doubt that many people would deny it.

I will go one step further and state that I respect the belief that divestiture from companies that do business with South Africa's Apartheid government may be our responsibility. I do not agree with this but I am willing to consider it as a possible truth because I have never been to South Africa, and I, like millions of others who have never been to South Africa, probably don't know a hundredth of the facts of the situation down there.

I will further state that I respect the right of a group of people with certain moral convictions to protest. Again, I do not agree with marches and protests as a means toward an end, especially when that end is half the globe away. I have often referred to protest as merely a means of "passing the buck;" there is very little, if any sacrifice involved, and more often than not, protest accomplishes very little, if anything.

What I vehemently deplore, however, is the disrespect shown by a group of students protesting at the inauguration of a new President. Simply put, the "open, friendly, non-intervening protest" was a disgraceful showing at the wrong time and place. What was meant to be a time of honor and celebration was badly tarnished by the stain of self-righteousness that was cloaked in a mask of "moral responsibility." Students who took part in a protest at such a time should be ashamed of their behavior as should a College Council who endorsed such a thing. It was just another instance of Williams "active thinkers" showing themselves to be thoughtless.

Shame

To The Editor:

It is a shame when a paper like the Williams Record must stoop to sensationalist stories in the fashion of the National Enquirer. It is even more displeasing when, due to journalistic incompetence and bias, the Record cannot even get the facts right when "reporting" such a story.

I am referring, of course, to the article in last week's issue entitled "Freshmen

How to talk to an alum

In high school, we had a course called Communication Skills. It used to be called Writing, but I guess the administrators foresaw music video, where Billy Idol has mastered the skills of communicating through pretend-singing, punching the air, and getting his hair to stick on end.

One thing they never taught us, though, was how to talk to recent alumni. That meant I went through Williams asking questions like "So are you married yet?" and "Have you met my cousin Matt? He's a college graduate, too."

Now that I am an alum (though still unable to conjugate the word), I feel qualified to make some pointers for such discussion.

The first question that occurs is "What are you doing now?" You're hoping for an unusual answer—the alum is a sheep farmer, or a professional wrestler, or President of the United States ("You are? I tell you, Williamstown is so isolated, I didn't even know.") Unfortunately, it's the alums who spend their days in dreary office buildings who visit Williams, to get fresh air.

In answering this question, alums are likely to give their profession, say, "consulting."

If you respond with interest, they are likely to drone on about the ramifications of the latest governmental regulation of intergrated reverse-thrust brass widgets ("Facing stiff competition from the cheaper imported copper variety, you must remember.")

On the other hand, if you respond with something like, "So you just stand at the xerox machine all day long," or "Yeah, but why do you need a liberal-arts education for that?" the alum will likely become defensive and/or depressed. Remember, weekends are important to these people, and if you ruin one with a comment like that, the alum faces six days of misery ("What'd you do last weekend?" "Some undergrad made fun of me.")

The key is to step lightly. Once you've ascertained that your particular alum is not hosting "Bowling for Bigbigbig Bucks," studying nights for a high school diploma, or commanding the Swiss Navy, you should retreat and let the alum lead the conversation.

He or she will likely ask you how things are going at school. This can be a tricky question, because you must guess which of two answers the alum is expecting. Some hope that Williams has remained perfectly unchanged since they left; others assume that without them the place has fallen apart.

After this hurdle, you and the alum have much less in common to talk about than you did last year. No papers for English, no wreckroom gossip, no dining hall horror stories.

But you can mention certain topics that interest all alums:

•The Log. The alum is not interested in whether the new Log is good or bad. The point is that is is not the old Log. Mention the new floor, the vanished beer memorabilia, the graffiti-less tables, and the lack of Chasmo, and watch the alum's face droop.

•Sports. Alums are always back for the big games. They can follow the scores in the Times (almost all alums now work in New York City), and they usually have a vague notion of who the coach, quarterback, and/or goalie is. (For those of you who don't know this information, it's your duty to find out by Saturday, so you and the alum will be on equal footing. The two of you can then swap outdated theories and false generalizations that are backed up by concrete evidence, thus proving your mastery of the liberal-arts education.)

•Drinking. Alums awaken each morning at 7:00 (can you believe it?) and thus rarely drink heavily the night before. But being in Williamstown reminds them of past glories, and they will gladly accept offers of beer. Besides being an excellent topic, this is also an excellent end to the conversation, because the out-of-shape alum is likely to pass out after drinking that first beer.

At this point (making sure to avoid using phrases like "extra vacation time," "my broker..." or "loud pink and green pants," which will undoubtedly wake the alum and cause much drooling), you can tiptoe away from the alum and go have fun, knowing that you have provided a valuable service to a person in need.

Despite obituaries published in this space, John Clayton '85 did not die upon graduation. Yet.

Survey says: repeal drink limit

by Steph Jacon

That Williams legend, the Log, needs your help. Where crowds once gathered, small groups now congregate. The Log Committee has one goal: to get people back down to the Log as rapidly as possible. The most important step towards this goal is changing the Log's current alcohol policy.

Results from the Log Committee's recent survey indicate that students feel the idea of a drink limit is extremely insulting. Students feel that they should be responsible for themselves and not have their responsibilities dictated to them by the administration.

The two-beer limit was not established as a punitive measure. Rather, the administration was under the impression that most people went to the Log after studying to have a couple of beers with friends. People did go to the Log after the library, but they frequently consumed more than two beers. The log, however, was much more than a place to drink. It was the one place at beautiful, bucolic, isolated Williams College where friends from opposite sides of the campus could gather to socialize.

It is this much needed friendly atmosphere that the Log Committee wants to restore. Students of legal age, now staying away from the Log because they feel their rights are being restricted, would return if there was no limit. If this group returns to the Log, so will their friends, regardless of age.

The Committee also seeks to make it easier for people to obtain their beers by eliminating the need to produce both a license and a Williams ID each time a student buys alcohol. In addition, the sooner the masses return, the sooner the floor can be on its way to becoming the scuffed up, popcorn strewn surface it once was.

The Committee wants to present the administration with a proposal about the Log's future as soon as possible. In order to present our ideas and obtain suggestions from the students, the Log Committee will have an all-campus meeting tonight, October 8th, at 7:30 p.m. at the Log. Please come to the meeting and help reinstate the Log into what remains of the Williams social life.

Junior Steph Jacon heads the Log Committee.

The long-term case against divestment in South Africa

by Joe Ehlers

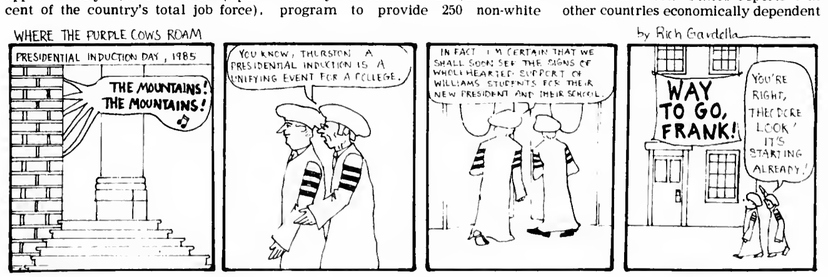
As pointed out by the events of last week, divestment from South Africa is once again an issue on the Williams campus. The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition now claims that a majority of the students have signed its petition urging the college "to divest all holdings in companies that do business in South Africa."

It is encouraging to see Williams students once again taking interest in issues outside the confines of this valley, and the moral questions involving South Africa seem to be made for this purpose. At first glance they appear quite tangible: South Africa's system of apratheid is wrong and grotesque, and the Williams community has a moral responsibility not to support the government of South Africa through the college's holdings in companies doing business and paying taxes there.

This is a picture perfect issue, one so full of truisms that it can't help but appeal to us after a casual glance. But it is founded on a short-term morality based on graphic symbolism that serves to reassure Williams students that our moral beliefs can be justified by a clear, quick reaction to a clear, quick issue that is both conscience-clearing and ethically correct. South Africa is not a clear-cut issue, however, and it certainly is not short-term; the situation in the country today is the result of centuries of historical precedence, and can not be expected to disappear overnight.

There is a case against divestment in South Africa, which, when looked at over the long-term, appears much more just for the oppressed in that country. It also preserves the United States' interests in South Africa, and illuminates the role Williams and other institutions like it can play in political issues such as this one.

According to the Boston Globe, there are about 300 American companies with operations in South Africa, employing approximately 70,000 individuals (1 percent of the country's total job force). These companies have about $2.3 billion in direct investment in the country, 17 percent of total foreign investment. The ten largest US companies in South Africa are Ford, General Motors, Coca-Cola, Mobil, United States Gypsum, Goodyear, Caltex Petroleum, Allegheny International, IBM, and Johnson and Johnson. None of these companies employs more than 6600 workers (as of the end of 1984), and most in the list employ between 2000-3000 workers.



Over half of the American companies are signatories of the Sullivan Principles, a conduct code named after Philadelphia minister Leon Sullivan, who originally drafted it. Companies who have signed the Principles (including most of the large US corporations) are watched over by a Cambridge consulting firm, Authur D. Little. ADL regularly reports on the progress of a company's equal-employment programs, and the overall sense of corporate citizenship and concern that the company shows.

Signatories agree to pay high school and college costs for children of employees. Many companies provide other benefits, such as loans, legal aid for blacks (Gillette Co.), and teacher training programs (Mobil). IBM, which is quite active civically in the country, recently announced a $10 million program to provide 250 non-white schools with computers, and made available loans and management training to mixed-race and black businesses.

Total divestment, as the WAAC petition calls for, would restrict Williams from about one-third of the companies on the New York Stock Exchange and affect perhaps one-fourth of the college's portfolio, according to statistics given in last Thursday's College Council meeting. It would eliminate investments in companies—like IBM and Ford—whose activities in South Africa make up only a fraction of their total business activities.

> ...the South African government will find another way to service its computers after IBM has left, but the millions of dollars that company is pouring into educational and equal-employment programs will not be replaced.

Much more troubling, however, is that in our zealousness to make a statement and send a symbol, Williams and institutions like it could cause more long-term harm than short-term good. Unemployment will certainly increase—and most certainly affect blacks—if US companies (and other multinationals) are forced to pull out. Many of the anti-apartheid and socially-conscious programs US companies have been credited with would be lost. South Africa, which has in the past decade alone shown itself adept at continuing apartheid under forced-isolationism, would undoubtedly react to divestment by becoming more self-reliant and probably more dogmatic. The New York Times reports that other countries economically dependent on South Africa in the region—Swaziland, Botswana, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Malawi, Mozambique, and Lesotho—would be harmed, too, if South Africa would suffer economically from US divestment and sanctions.

The ramifications of divestment are large and long-reaching. As Colin Eglin, spokesman for the opposition Progressive Federal Party stated in a Boston Globe interview, "Disinvestment is part of a process of isolation, withdrawal, and ostracism. If it happens, blacks will believe that the revolution is at hand because of this process, and they will overstep the mark in their expectations. So there will be a downturn in stability and an increase in violence in South Africa."

We must be careful of the symbol we send through strong student support of the WAAC petition. I do not doubt the sincerity or beliefs of the WAAC organizers; I applaud their ultimate goals. But I question if their's is the best road to take. If African history is any measure, the quick solution and domestically appealing symbolic reaction to a crisis by the US has often resulted in long-term instability, violence, and even death for the very people we are trying to help.

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility has done a terrific job in monitoring Williams' investments, and it is this type of careful analysis that we must demand from our college, business community, and government. There are US companies in South Africa whose performance in countering apartheid has been quite poor, and we should not support them. But to turn to a company like IBM and call for divestment because it has the service contract on the computer system used to enforce passes for blacks and coloreds is ridiculous; the South African government will find another way to service its computers after IBM has left, but the millions of dollars that company is pouring into educational and equal-employment programs will not be replaced. (This should not vindicate IBM's servicing of the pass computers, however.)

In the end, we must address this issue realistically and honestly, realizing the breadth of the results our actions can foster. What the WAAC petition—which so many Williams students signed as they sped through the breakfast line or ran through Baxter on the way to classes—calls for is quite radical, quite dangerous, and in the long-run, quite harmful to the welfare of the people of South Africa.

ACSR calls for Lubrixol divestment

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The meeting of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility was unusually well attended last Monday. The student-faculty committee proceeded with its business and then opened the floor to questions from students interested in the College's investment policies relating to South Africa.

The ACSR recommended to the Board of Trustees that all stocks held in the Lubrizol Corporation be divested. Lubrizol has taken the stance that foreign policies should be made by governments, not businesses.

Student representative Sharon Burke '88 commented, "It is clearly time to divest. We've run the course of correspondence. It is our responsibility to divest as there is not reason to continue investments there."

Chairman of the ACSR Stephen Lewis, said of Lubrizol, "They gave a boot to our second chance. In effect, they're saying, 'Fine, do what you will. I can get on with my work.' "

One of the issues on the ACSR agenda was a report on the status of companies under observation by the committee. In the cases of Cheescborough Ponds and Black & Decker, correspondence has been initiated in response to their status as non-signatories to the Sullivan Principles.

Checseborough Ponds has stated that, although they have not signed the guidlincs, their practices are well within the guidelines prescribed. Black & Decker has not responded to any ACSR correspondence thus far.

Discussion at the ACSR meeting also included a report on the Consortium on Review of South African issues, a group of 34 colleges and universities organized to discuss political and investment activities in South Africa. Position papers from member colleges were circulated and William Reed, secretary of the ACSR commented, "Most seem to be catching up to us."

The Consortium is reviewing the long- and short-term effects of a withdrawal from South Africa utilizing economic and political models and also planning a second study indexing all U.S. corporations that do business in South Africa.

When the meeting was opened to questions, Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition member Tom Williams '87 asked, "What are the criteria for divestment? This college, as a liberal institution, has a moral obligation to divest."

Lewis remarked, "The Committee is not oblivious to moral issues. We have a moral responsibility to Williams College. Yet, we must keep in mind that for the College to do something solely for political purposes raises serious questions."

Panel audience against death penalty by 2 to 1

by John Faust

More than two-thirds of the audience at last week's panel discussion on the death penalty opposed capital punishment according to a survey taken by the Williams chapter of Amnesty International before the discussion.

Almost four out of five of those people said afterwards that their views on the issues had not changed as a result of the discussion.

John W. Roberts of the Massachusetts Civil Liberties Union struck a responsive chord in the audience when he said, "The system is not perfect. The system is flawed. The system is prejudiced, and we kill innocent people. Capital punishment does not allow the criminal justice system to make up for its mistakes because there's no due process for a dead person."

However, Jeffrey Sedgewick, professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, said he recognized retribution for heinous crimes as a concern that can be addressed well by capital punishment. "Anger is righteous indignation. It is that thing which gets upset at the sight of injustice," he said.

Demoralization?

If society's anger is not accorded proper attention, Sedgewick said, "Our citizenry will become demoralized." Sedgewick said he hoped that retribution could be confined to the courts rather than turned loose on the streets in the form of vigilante justice.

Paula Johnson, northeast section program coordinator for Amnesty International, focused her comments on Amnesty International's worldwide effort to eliminate the death penalty, which she described as the organization's ultimate goal.

The organization opposes capital punishment because its members believe that the death penalty is not a deterrent to violent crime and that its irrevocable nature does not allow for mistakes in sentencing, she said.

Daniel A. Ford, assistant district attorney for Berkshire County, said that the death penalty advances the first three of four purposes of the United States penal institutions, which are retribution, deterrence, isolation and rehabilitation. "There is popular support in this country for the death penalty, and society's outrage may demand its use," Ford said.

Multiple murders

In responses to the questionnaire circulated in the largely student audience before the discussion, serial homocide was the crime judged most worthy of the death penalty, with single homicide placing second. Those who failed to see a deterrent value in capital punishment outnumbered those who did by a ratio of more than two to one.

Nearly three out of every four people in the audience said that they believe there is racial discrimination in the United States judicial system.

Laleh Moshiri '87, and David Waiters '88, co-chairmen of the Williams chapter of Amnesty International, which sponsored the event, expressed satisfaction with both the turnout and range of issues covered at the panel.

Law enforcement

ing the person who signed the check to purchase the alcohol, the person who picked it up at the store, the person who served it, the president of the house and even the College may be liable if anyone underage is served or if anyone, whether of age or not, causes damage after he is intoxicated.

The rules

He explained that for drinkers over 21, any driver's license, from any state, is deemed legal identification. However, this is not the same for the twenty-year olds who were grandfathered in. Massachusetts residents may use their driver's license to prove they were 20 before the age went up.

Out-of-state residents must purchase a Massachusetts Drinking License at any Massachusetts Department of Motor Vehicles. Without this drinking license, an out-of-state resident is not legally "grandfathered in."

Zoito further explained that no driver, whether of legal drinking age or not, may legally transport more than eight gallons of beer, three gallons of wine or champagne or one gallon of alcohol, without a permit. He warned students that transporting four cases of beer is enough to violate the law. This law is punishable by a fine not exceeding $2500 or six months in jail or both.

He said the police force regularly patrols the border between Massachusetts and Vermont. However, he described roadblocks looking to catch drunk drivers as the only random way to catch people returning from Vermont transporting too much alcohol or who went across the border to purchase because they are underage in Massachusetts.

"Mere suspicion is not enough," Zoito said, adding that for him or any of his officers to stop a car, other than at a roadblock, they must have a reason. He mentioned that anything from a speeding ticket, a burnt-out headlight, or just friendly advice to clean the license plate can, however, be grounds to pull a car over.

If an officer then spots alcohol in the car, he may ask for identification and/or a transportation permit. He said, "We don't go on a fishing trip; it's all probable cause."

New ideas

William Darrow, also a member of CUL, noted a few changes in party rules from last year. First, the time for ending parties serving alcohol on Thursday nights has been moved from 1 a.m. to midnight. He said, "House officers did not play honest with the system," citing several examples when multiple party plans were filed when, in reality, there was only one large party.

Also, parties may continue after the security officer removes the alcoholic beverages at closing time. Darrow said, "We are trying an experiment with letting (the party) go on if house officers want it to continue.

"The (security) officers say 'we're leaving' and if house officers want it to go on, it's on their shoulders." He said he hopes this will encourage a "more natural wind-down."

Bell said that in future weeks the CUL will discuss security, liability and behavior. He foresaw the committee discussing the effects of two laws: the new Massachusetts legal drinking age and a law, stemming from a New Jersey case where the host was found liable for her guest's actions after he became drunk at her house and drove home.

crossing Baxter Lawn to Chapin Hall. Protesters occupied either side of Chapin steps waving posters, and Mark Averitt '86 led the demonstrators in chants.

The protests ended when the processional had finished its way into the hall, though armbands were worn until the end of the ceremony.

College Council President Anza Mammen '86 had originally asked the members of the council to discourage their house members from participating in the protest, citing rumors that the protesters would try to blockade the procession.

At last week's College Council meeting, however, WAAC members described their proposed actions and asked for the endorsement of the council. Mammen then voiced his support for the proposal and, after some discussion, the council passed a motion of endorsement by a three to one margin.

Mammen also sent a note to student mailboxes supporting the group's right to peaceful demonstration.

versity, spoke about several of Oakley's dramatic endeavors there.

Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees Preston Parish '41 finalized the induction by handing Oakley the charter and, he thought, the key to the College. After a poke in the ribs by Chandler, Parish turned to the outgoing president who still had the key in his other hand. Parish then took the key away from Chandler, handed it to Oakley and completed the ceremony.

In his induction address, Oakley described some of the ways his perspective as a historian affects his sense of Williams and its goals. The quickly changing world of today, Oakley said, may be a short period of violence between "millenia of stasis or gradual evolution."

Liberal arts important

A college must be aware of this long-term historical perspective, Oakley said, and must realize the importance of the liberal arts as opposed to vocational education.

"No education which truly aspires to be a preparation for living can afford to ignore the fundamental continuities ... between the cultivation of specific areas of specialized knowledge, expertise or skill ... (and the attempt) to reach towards an understanding of what it is to be human ..." he said. As part of this Oakley emphasized "... the pressing need to encourage more of our best-educated and most talented students to pursue careers in education..."

Oakley cited two new programs which will further this goal. One is a series of seminars with distinguished scholars in various fields and selected seniors, who will be called Class of 1960 Scholars. The second is a fellowship for a minority graduate student who will do a little teaching while working on a dissertation, the Gaius Charles Bolin Fellowship.

Ceremony on cable

Seating in Chapin and Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall was by invitation only, but not all of the seats in Chapin were full. According to Fred Rudolph, college marshal, about 80 seniors did not attend the ceremony after notifying the marshal's office that they would attend. Others were able to watch the induction on large screen televisions in Baxter Lounge or at the Log and on cable television.

A reception at Mount Hope Farm and a dance in Lansing Chapman Ice Hockey Rink followed the induction. Oakley himself took to the dance floor at the ball, showing the student body that he's more than just another president.

Profile: Charles Keller's 50-year view

by Elizabeth Skorcz

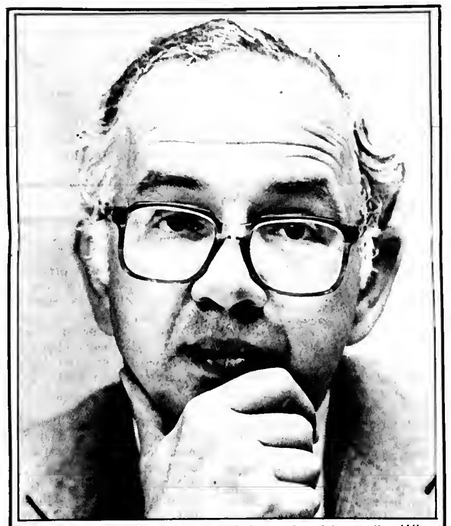
Imagine yourself starting freshman year with Saturday morning classes, mandatory Sunday chapel, a Latin requirement and a cut system with penalties for skipping class. Unthinkable? Not for the Williams College Class of 1939!

Charles Keller, professor emeritus of history and former director of admissions, recently offered his observations on two Williams classes fifty years apart: the current freshmen Class of '89 and the Class of '39, the first group of freshmen he admitted.

Among the humble "frosh-burgers" of 1935 were John Sawyer, later a president of the college, James MacGregor Burns, professor of political science, and Thomas McMann, owner of McMann Chevrolet in North Adams.

Ephwomen?

In 1939 Williams was a male institution. Social life revolved around 15 fraternities and the road to Smith college. Frats were powerful and important; many students pledged even before the academic year began. Since there were no dining halls, pledges ate at their frats, while non-affiliates ate at the Commons Club in Currier ballroom. Freshmen lived in Lehman, Sage, Williams and two annexes which stood where Mission Park is now. Room prices varied in those days, ranging from $90 per semester for a single in the top of Sage to $350 for a suite on the ground floor of Lehman. Tuition was a hefty $400 per semester.



Our Eph predecessors also struggled a bit more in academic waters: of those 253 who matriculated in 1935, only 160 actually received a degree from Williams. According to Keller, several factors explain the low graduation rate. Given the smaller pool of applicants in 1935 than 1985, the Class of '39 was more intellectually disparate, so some students were poorly equipped to handle the workload. Their woes were accented when standards were raised in conjunction with a change in the curriculum in 1935-36. In addition, the Depression created both financial and personal problems.

Preppies to Yuppies

During the 30s, preppies were the norm at Williams. Only 25% of the freshmen had gone to public high schools, while in the Class of '89, the figure is up to 65%. Indeed, in 1939 a drive to recruit more students from public high schools was begun.

The Class of '39 also was less diverse both geographically and in terms of secondary education than the Class of '89. The student body then did not represent all parts of the coun-

Mathletes pluck fowl-play win

by Martin Hildebrand

Eleven calculating Ephs recently routed a brigade of Middlebury students in the eighth annual Green Chicken Competition, a mathematical contest of cerebral proportions.

Held this year at Williams on Sept. 28, the competition derives its name from the prize, a green cookie-container shaped like a chicken.

The 1985 scrimmage required competitors to take an exam with six questions on it. For example, one question was, "Show that the numbers 49, 4489, 444889, obtained by inserting the digits 48 into the middle of the preceeding numbers, are all perfect squares." Although such a query might not cause many students to lose sleep, mathlete Joe Francis '87 described the competition as exhilarating. "It's a collegiate experience not to be missed," he said.

This year Williams reclaimed the Green Chicken by trashing Middlebury 156-55, bringing Williams' overall record in Green Chicken competitions to 5-2-1. Racking up points for the Ephs were Martin Hildebrand '86 with 55 (out of a possible 60), Francis with 41, and Mark Conger '89 and Lawrence Mini '89 with 30 apiece. Middlebury's highest individual scorer earned a paltry (poultry?) 24 points.

According to veteran performers, this year's rookie crop helped Williams wrestle the chicken to its proper roost. "It helped us tremendously to recruit freshmen," Francis said.

Math professor Colin Adams, who organized the Williams team, was modest in victory. "Although the members of the department are glad we won the exam, we're not so sure we want to display the trophy in the department office," he conceded.

When the competition began eight years ago, it was debated whether the Green Chicken should be awarded to the winners or the losers. Organizers decided (on a wing) to give it to the winners. This year, however, a consolation white chicken—holding fewer cookies—was given to the losing team.

The odds are good for Williams next year, when the contest will be held at Middlebury. "It looks like we'll do well in the future because of this year's freshmen," said Adams. Added Francis, "Now that the math department has the Green Chicken, math majors will be eating more cookies, getting stronger, and thus be more ready for next year."

'Medea' hailed for directing and moving individual performance

by Gwen Garcelon

Those who attended last weekend's performance of Jean Anouilh's Medea were presented with a moving interpretation of the classic Greek tragedy. Once again, David Latham '86 competently directed a well put-together show, reminiscent of his effort with last year's production of The Maids.

Medea is a powerful drama centered around a heroine's downfall after her exile from her lover. The play considers several themes, including political tradition and women's sexuality.

The role of Medea, the heroine, was masterfully crafted by senior Su Wrench. Though her's was a demanding role, Wrench carried the show with strong command of her lines and consistent characterization, making the audience lose the sense that she was acting, and at times even moving them to tears.

Jason, the hero of Golden Fleece fame, was played by George Prescott '87. The effect of having only a 15-day rehearsal period was more apparent in Prescott's performance than in Wrench's.

Although he delivered some strong monologues, his characterization was not as consistent as Wrench's and occasionally appeared stilted.

The casting of faculty children as Medea's son and daughter was a successful and enjoyable addition. Christopher and Katie Kavanaugh were professional, contributing a refreshing presence on stage.

Another successful aspect of the show was the spartan set which consisted of a tree stump and campfire. This allowed the audience to concentrate on the action and also added to the tragic feeling of the play.

A presidential salute

by Bill O'Brien

It is listed in the Clark Art Institute's fall calendar as "a selection of books, prints, and illuminations celebrating the life of the mind." This salute to the newly inaugurated Francis C. Oakley, the thirteenth president of Williams College, also represents the goals that Williams strives to meet through education

Titled "Testimonies to Humanism," the exhibition attempts to define the qualities that make one "human." Rafael Fernandez, curator of prints at the Clark, quotes Pascal in his introduction to the exhibit: "It is thought that makes the grandeur of a man. The grandeur of man is great in that he knows he is miserable. A tree doesn't know it is miserable."

"Testimonies to Humanism" is a selective sampling of the work of the great minds of the Western World. Fernandez calls it a "preservation of testimonies to history and how man has evolved."

One of the books on display was written by John Amos Comenius, a 17th-century Czech writer and pioneer in educational methods. His book is an English version of one of the first illustrated books designed specifically for children. Fernandez noted that few people know of Comenius's work, which is so easily taken for granted; yet his contributions, such as the use of illustrations in teaching language, are of value.

The books on display, all lent to the exhibit by the Chapin Library, include works by Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas and Sacchi. The Williams College Museum of Art contributed lithographs by the French artists Daumier and Delacroix, in addition to several Italian works. The remainder of the exhibit is taken from the Clark's own collection and includes a variety of works by French and Italian artists from the 15th to the 20th centuries.

What is it, then, that the exhibiton symbolizes? What is it that makes one human? "In the end, it is learning, it is education that will assert and affirm the human, and liberate man from the beast within," Fernandez said. "In the long run, when students become teachers themselves and discover traces of the imagination and sympathy that have been expended on them, they will look kindly on the claims of humanism."

According to Fernandez, a liberal education makes one "human." "It is important to produce a 'rounded' person," he said, noting the success of Williams in doing this.

"Testimonies to Humanism" will be on display at the Clark through November 10.

try as it does now, but rather came from Massachusetts, New York and the rest of New England.

According to Keller, the admissions procedure differed in 1935 from what it is today. The Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) did not exist 50 years ago, and personal interviews first were instituted in 1935, when Keller took over as director of admissions. As the first traveling admissions officer, he spoke with 90% of the Class of '39 before they came to Williams.

For many of these precocious freshmen, Williams was the back-up school to Harvard, Yale and Princeton; consequently, a concerted effort to combat this second-choice status was undertaken by the administration in 1935.

Et tu, Ephraim

Academic life at Williams has changed over the past fifty years, leaving today's students free from previous rigors. The members of the Class of '39, for example, all had taken three or four years of Latin as a prerequisite to acceptance to Williams, and they expected to study an additional year of it here. This requirement was dropped, however, in 1935.

For the '39ers, exams came two weeks after Christmas, and Winter Study was unheard of. (Fall Reading Period? Be serious.) Nor did the Class of '39 enjoy the Advanced Placement program, which allows many of this year's freshmen to receive college credit. Charles Keller was one of the founders of the AP program.

In addition, during the bygone days of Eph-lore all students took five courses at a time, each of which lasted the full year; cutting more than three classes a semester was grounds for probation. Such harsh penalties discouraged sleeping in on Saturday mornings, when classes often were held. Nor did Sunday mornings afford a chance to bunk 'til brunch, because attendance at chapel was mandatory. The '39ers considered themselves lucky, though—they were the first class who did not have to attend chapel every day.

It was the middle of the night. The young man's hands were tied. His breath would have excited any breathalyser to a point well above the intoxication mark.

In this sorry state, an F&M student attempted to stumble several miles back to campus following a hazing stunt. And if his troubles were not serious enough, local police decided his condition constituted grounds for his arrest. His arrest resulted in a variety of punitive measures currently levelled against Phi Lambda Phi, one of F&M's fraternities and the instigator of the student's unfortunate situation.

The hazing incident, which occured last April 3, was considered by college officials to be very serious. President Powell stated his position on the matter, saying, "...as president, I can not and I will not permit activities here which have caused deaths on other campuses, nor which result in the physical and mental debasement of any student."

The frat president, Geoffrey Edmonds '86, did not share Powell's assessment of the severity of the issue. "It wasn't good, but it was not in the same class as a death—causing incident. The kid got arrested; that's the extent of the severity," said Edmonds.

Phi Lambda Phi is now under suspension until the first day of spring semester '86. Edmonds complained that the administration, which is inexperienced, tends to pay more attention to the negatives, such as this hazing incident, while ignoring the positives, such as Phi Lam's Big Bounce Charity marathon last spring.

Hamilton

"When you have to compete against beer, you can't just use food, you need something more." Although it sounds like an epitath for the Log, this comment comes from the manager of Hamilton's bar, the HUB. Like thirsty Ephs, Hamilton students are concerned about the recently-raised drinking age in New York.

Similar to many campus bars, the HUB has been a center for on-campus socializing and drinking. Now, however, 74% of students are underage. Therefore, the HUB has decided to eliminate tap beer, although bottled beer will still be served to those old enough to legally drink.

In an attempt to compensate for the lack of alcoholic beverages, the HUB has decided to enlarge its menu and provide more types of entertainment. Some possibilities being considered are a VCR with feature films, a big screen TV and a new stereo. Proprietors are hoping to cultivate an atmosphere that "is conducive to a helathy social life, while not revolving around the consumption of alcohol."

In addition to the changes in the HUB, new policies concerning alcohol consumption have been adopted. No college funds may be used for alcohol, beer trucks will no longer be allowed and no alcohol will be served at inter-dormitory council parties. Unregistered parties will be fined $50 per keg.

The consequences of all these changes remain to be seen. However, as Sharon McMullen, departing manager of the HUB noted, "We need an alternative to people sitting in their rooms, drinking with the same 10 friends all year long. People want to socialize."

North Adams State

Excitement was high among the brothers of Beta Chi Gamma and other NASC student frats when the frat's previously condemned Beta House at 7-9 Hoosac Street recently was reopened.

The house was purchased by local landlord Robert Gorghan, who prevented it from being auctioned. Over the summer, three Beta brothers contributed much time and effort to its renovation, taking jobs with the construction company hired to rebuild the house.

When various North Adams inspectors approved occupancy last week, fraternity president Tom Burgoin and his fellow fraternity officers "all breathed a sigh of relief."

Questioned on the matter of when the frat would give its first party—after a year of boarded-up windows and locked doors—Burgoin proclaimed that traditions are not meant to be broken, stating, "Halloween is a Beta tradition."

Viennese concert offers tribute

by Mark Canuel

Although Thursday evening's "Music of Vienna" concert battled for an audience with the opening night of "Medea" and several films, Chapin Hall was filled to capacity for a memorable concert. The event marked the first appearance this academic year for both the Williams Trio and the Williams Choral Society. Presented as part of the "Vienna Symposium" in honor of the induction of President Oakley, the concert featured music of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries by some of Vienna's most influential composers.

The Trio this year has restored Paula Ennis-Dwyer as its pianist, and has replaced Julius Hegyi with Lynn Chang, violinist. Both artists, collaborating with Douglas Moore, cellist, performed their music with precision and grace. The Trio opened the concert with Haydn's "Trio in G Major." The first movement, a set of variations, was cleanly played overall, with an even, rhythmic continuity that prevailed throughout all three movements.

Chang demonstrated a scintillating technique and a singing tone in the extensive violin parts in the first and second movements; yet Ennis-Dwyer's playing, especially in the first movement, was often inarticulate, since the hall's acoustics allowed little use of the sustaining pedal. Still, the Trio gave a fiery delivery of the final fast-paced Rondo, drawing an enthusiastic, well-deserved applause.

Schubert

Schubert's music is often said to be a herald of the Romantic era—this is apparent in his "Notturno in E-flat," Op. 148. The artists played this piece, which mounts from quiet tenderness to passion, with controlled emotion and warmth.

This was followed by a jump to Arnold Schoenburg's "Friede auf Erden," Op. 13, performed by the Chamber Singers under the direction of Kenneth Roberts. Composed more than a decade before his refinement of the twelve-tone scale, the work is a mixture of tonal and atonal forms.

The singers' performance brought out the nuances in texture and striking contrasts in sonorities. Despite an often thin tenor section, they admirably performed a piece that, though revolutionary, still looks back to classical styles.

Following the Schoenberg piece, Moore and Ennis-Dwyer performed Anton Webern's "Three Little Pieces," Op. 11, for cello and piano. Webern, a student of Schoenberg, rejects in these pieces the sometimes lavish ornamentation of the previous century. Moore's free, relaxed bowing made the variations in touch sound (and look) almost magical.

Haydn seek

Another student-teacher relationship appeared in the program: Beethoven, who wrote the "Variations on 'Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu,'" Op. 121a, was at one time a student of Haydn. Unlike his teacher, however, Beethoven exploits the full potential of the three-instrument ensemble with interesting interchanges between piano and strings.

"Music of Vienna" was certainly a suitable way to honor with music Williams' new president. The next classical music concert at the College will be "Music in the Round," October 19.

The Williams Chamber Singers raise their voices in song during Thrusday night's Viennese concert honoring President Oakley. (Albright) side looks to be a contender in next week's Beantown Invitational Tournament.

The B- and C-sides were combined in a three-half game against Bates. Due to the muddiness of the field and the inexperience of many players, the action was sloppy. Yet Williams still managed to control play.

Scrum half Daisy Hagey '88 consistently fed the line beautiful passes and terrorized the Bates scrum half with her hard hitting and smart play. The line

Williams played well, especially since at some points nearly the entire team consisted of new players. However, Bates held the Williams women scoreless until late in the third half when Haile '86, experimenting at the position of scrum half, was able to convert a penalty kick, leaving the final score at 3-0. All in all, the Killer B's and the C-sides demonstrated that Williams has depth that is going to make things difficult for all future opponents.

A fluke interception and questionable officiating led to a Hartford try to open the second half. Williams, however, was not to be discouraged. Tough scrum play behind Jeff Heilman '87, Evan Zahner '87, and Mike Goldstein '88 kept the ball in Hartford territory, setting up a crucial scrum down. Phillip Headley '86 won the hook, and Dave Koota '87 picked up the loose ball and carried it in for a score.

The final score was a combined scrum effort culminating with Goldstein's individual effort, which culminated in the final Williams try. Williams prevailed 8-4, and not a clean jersey was to be found.

The C-side game was plagued with "disallowed" trys and ten inches of mud. Connecticut opened up with an early 6-0 lead. Chris Michaels '89 came back for Williams; Greg Bronson '86 dished the ball off to Michaels who touched it down for a Williams score.

Sophomore recruit Jon Hollenberg hit a crucial penalty kick midway through the second half to put Williams on top, where they were to remain 7-6. The scoring was not over. Jeff Sher '86 scooped up one of his own pop-kicks and touched it down for the final C-side try. Tremendous play by sophomores Will Swan and Pavlos Yeroulanos helped the C-men on to victory.

Discouraged by Williams' dominance, Connecticut put in most of their A-side players, hoping to get a win. A win they got, but not before Jim Mannix '89, Mark Huffman '86, and Chris Playter '89 displayed their newfound expertise on the pitch.

scored once again to up their lead to two goals. Battling back, the Ephwomen scored two minutes later as Boddicker fed co-captain Gigi Madore '87, who out-maneuvered a defender and hit a well placed shot into the back left corner of the goal.

The team was back in the game for the second time but could not put the ball in the goal as the clock ran out. The squad's second consecutive loss left coach Melendy unsatisfied: "We played for 70, not 90, minutes, and it was not a good team effort. Although we did see some good individual efforts from Kim Hatch '88, Ashley Mace '86, and Yoshiko Fujita '87. After the Hartford game, in which we played so well, this was a letdown."

At Hartford the team did indeed put forth an outstanding effort and found itself tied with its powerful opponents 1-1 at the half. The Eph's first-half goal was came from Madore, the team's second leading scorer. As the second half wore on, the game remained tied, and an upset became a distinct possibility. The defense was playing very well and Rogers was well on her way to stopping a season-high 24 shots.

That improbable upset might actually have happened had it not been for the play of Hartford's Kathy Macnabb. Midway through the second half she scored her second and third goals of the game within the space of two minutes. After this offensive spurt, the squads remained scoreless until the game's conclusion.

Despite the 3-1 defeat, the Ephwomen had more cause for celebration than disappointment. They held their opponents to six goals under their average and matched them evenly for over two-thirds of the game. "We played a great game," said Melendy. "Our defense was aggressive and everyone played a smart game. I was very pleased."

With six games left on its schedule, the team has little time to secure a winning record. However, its performances in several games, such as the one against Hartford, gives one reason to believe that a better than .500 record is not entirely out of reach. On Thursday, the Ephwomen will attempt to repeat last year's 3-1 victory over Albany State, and on Saturday, will face the tough task of avenging last year's 1-0 defeat at the hands of arch-rival Amherst.

Damage Entry." Obviously, the Record is hard-pressed for stories if they feel that an entry water fight is newsworthy. If, however, the editors of the Record feel that they must print such a story, then they have a committment to their readers to get the facts right. Several factual errors exist in the article written by Debbie Snyder. These errors significantly change the interpretation of this story.

First of all, Miss Snyder got such "trivial" matters as the date and time of the waterfight wrong, as well as the circumstances involved in the fight. Then Miss Snyder writes, "About two hours after the fight started, an alarm went off." Where did Miss Snyder get this information? Has she or her editors ever heard of checking facts and verifying a "story" before it is written? Obviously not.

The alarm, in fact, went off less than 30 minutes after the fight started. Yet by saying that the alarm went off 2 hours later, and by adding the statements by Ransom Jenks about fire safety, Miss Snyder is implying that the residents of Sage B were involved in a waterfight for over 2 hours with callous disregard for fire safety and decorum. In so doing, she has damaged the reputation and esteem of this entry throughtout the campus.

What motivated Miss Snyder and the Record in this malicious attack on the integrity of our entry? Perhaps the reporter felt slighted by the fact that it was Sage B which had gained control of the Freshmen Quad through their lively and energetic renditions of "The Bird." Perhaps the Record was again trying to use their power to damage the candidacy of Sage B's David Garfield '89 for a College Council position.

Whatever the reasons, I feel compelled in my duty as a JA in Sage B to look out for the best interests of my entry. The Record article borders on a libelous attack on Sage B. I therefore demand a printed apology in this week's issue of the Record.

Golfers 4th in NE tourney

by Stewart Verdery

The Williams varsity golf team continued its quality play September 30-October 1 in the New England tournament, placing 14th out of 41 schools and third in the Division III category. Indicative of their competition this fall, the Ephmen lowered their tournament score of last year by 31 shots, yet only moved up one place.

At the New England's, played in New Seabury on Cape Cod, Hartford captured the team title handily with a low total of 578 for the two days. Bryant took second at 601.

Williams' top two Division III rivals both placed ahead of the Ephmen, with Amherst fifth at 609 and Salem St. ninth at 621. The golfers' score of 633 was led by Tim Frechette '89 and Tim McKone '87, both at 156. Co-captains Chas Foehl '87 and Guy Kurtz '87 shot 158 and 163 respectively, and John Kucich '88 fired a 168. Thus, in the best four out of five scoring for each day, the linksters totalled 328-305 for 633.

Noting the huge drop in score on the second day of the tournament, coach Richard Pohle again said that he was pleased with the progress of his young team. He was impressed by the quality of competition at the New England's, commenting "we made a dramatic improvement over last year's result," a 664 for fifteenth place, but did not really gain much in final standing. He said that this year it has been "tougher to play well" and place high in the multi-school events. Pohle was optimistic about the spring season as the fall team headed into their last match, the Toski Tourney at Hickory Ridge last weekend.

Tennis falls to Trinity 5-4

by Megan McNeill

The women's tennis team lost for the third time this year on Saturday, falling 5-4 to a strong Trinity team, bringing their record to 4-3.

In a match that went down to the wire, the team failed to convert a match point into a team victory in one of the doubles contests. The top doubles team of Katie Kerr '87 and Debbie Bernhelmer '86 fell in an 11-9 tiebreaker to fall 8-7.

Winning for the Ephwomen in singles were second singles player Liz Peay '86 by 8-4, number five player Jenni Koski '86, extending her undefeated record with an 8-0 victory, and number six player and co-captain Sue Brown '86 by 8-2. The only doubles team to win was Geri Hugo '86 and Liz Kellison '87.

On Thursday the team returns home to face Union.

Ephs 4th in polo tourney

by Frank Vespe

The water polo team will undoubtedly be quite happy to return to Muir Pool this weekend. The Ephs traveled to New York City last weekend to play a tournament with host Fordham University, Queens College, a St. Francis Club team, and Hudson Valley.

When it was over, Williams had won just once in four games, a 12-10 decision against Hudson Valley. The losses were 20-6 to Fordham, 12-9 to Queens, and 13-10 to St. Francis.

Co-captain Will Andrew '86, who scored six goals against Hudson Valley, was disappointed with the tournament results. "I would have hoped to have done better," he commented.

Unfortunately, several factors worked against the Ephmen. First of all, Chris Kirwan '87 was unable to play on Saturday, missing games against Fordham and Queens. Secondly, the referees called a strict game when Williams played Queens, and the Ephs found themselves far behind before they were able to recover. Finally, the St. Francis team had many more experienced players than Williams, including two Williams alums.

Other goal scorers against Hudson Valley included Will Dudley '89, who had a pair of goals; Adam Ifshin '87 with three; and Dean Pomerleau '87 with a single tally.

The Ephs' record now stands at 3-4. This weekend, the team hosts a tournament that includes Amherst, the Coast Guard Academy, and Trinity. It is the first of two tournaments to decide the Division II water polo champion of western New England.

Women outrun Trinity 23-32

The Women's cross-country team traveled to Trinity Saturday for a dual meet, and prevailed 23-32. The meet was marked by rainy conditions reminiscent of the weather that forced a cancellation of the Amherst Invitational the previous Saturday.

Freshman Karin Johnson led teammate Becky Conklin '87 to the 2-mile point, whereupon Conklin took command of the 3-mile race. Conklin's winning time was two seconds better than Johnson's 19:21. Sarah Pierce '88, recovering from illness, captured a strong fifth place for Williams. Jennie Garrett '89 and Kate Pugh '87 rounded out the scoring positions in 7th and 8th places, respectively.

On Saturday, the Ephwomen will host the prestigious NESCAC Championship Meet at the College-owned Mt. Hope Farm in South Williamstown. Eleven New England small colleges will be represented at the 1 o'clock starting time.

Harriers beat U of Hartford and Trinity

by Carter Zinn

The Men's cross country team won its first meet on Saturday by defeating host Trinity College and the University of Hartford. The final team score was Williams 26, Trinity 52, and Hartford 54.

Senior John Ellison won the race in 26:02 by outkicking Trinity's Brian Oakley (the son on new President Francis Oakley) at the finish. Tom Pingree '86 finished third overall with a time of 26:29, while senior TJ Lydon finished fifth, completing the five mile course in 26:42. Juniors Dave Grossman and Jon Fisher placed seventh and tenth respectively to round out Williams' top five.

The Ephmen had many forces working against them beyond the opposing teams. Heavy rain soaked the course and the runners, reducing visibility of cars in the area as Ted Arrowsmith '88 and Andre Lopez '87 were both interfered with by cars on the course. Nevertheless, coach Farwell was generally pleased with the victory, although he added that a few key runners will have to try to run up with Ellison if the team is to defeat tougher competition.

The Ephmen's hosted North Adams State today. On Saturday Williams will host the men's NESCAC championships at Mount Hope Farm. The team's record is now 2-3.

WUFO womps Hampshire

WUFO, despite some minor difficulties, was victorious again this Saturday. The team, after a long drive, arrived at Dartmouth, late for sectionals. Unfortunately, WUFO was supposed to be in Rochester, Dartmouth being another section.

So the team piled into their cars and drove on. When they arrived at the proper place, the rain had stopped and the sun was coming out, making it perfect for play.

The first game was against Hampshire College, and the Ephs won by a score of 21-8, thus continuing WUFO's dominance over the Hamsters. Then WUFO played Whoopie, the squad from WPI. This was a much closer game due to the fact that Williams fielded predominantly novice players. The final score was 18-17.

The significance of the victory was not lost on the Williams team. Whoopie made it to Regionals this year, meaning WUFO could have easily done the same thing with its top team. This shows a significant improvement over the past few years, and indicates that Williams will do very well in its upcoming home tournament this weekend and the college competitions this spring.

Women's ruggers open season by defeating Bates, Princeton

by Rebecca Haile

Depite hurricanes and this Saturday's foul weather, the women's rubgy club made their fall season debut in the style they are accustomed to. Two teams—Princeton and Bates—traveled far to challenge the Williams women, but both teams were sent home empty handed.

In the A-side game against Princeton, the Ephwomen, with memories of a tough Tiger club from two years ago, were out for blood. Besides possessing more experience than their foes, as well as the home swamp advantage, they completely dominated the first half with tight scrum work and beautiful line runs.

Williams' first try came as scrum half Steph Jacon '87 in a show of sheer determination, picked up a ball that was stolen by hooker Shawn Moody '87 and barreled her way through several astonished Princeton defenders and touched it down. Williams soon regained advantageous field position thanks to the running and support of linies Sara Suchman '86 and Suzanne Biemiller '87 and to the dazzling kicks of fullback Mary Peterson '87 and Becky Haile '86.

Deep in Princeton territory, Jacon had the ball out to the line, and Anne Marie Plankey '87 had a perfectly-timed assist to Anne Schmutz '87 who was there to receive the pass and touch it down for the second Williams try. Peterson converted for two points, leaving the score 10-0 at the half. Rain dominated the second half, but rain never stopped a rugger and the half was played despite the mud and water.

The orange Princeton wave came on strong, and Williams lost a little of its momentum but showed that this promises to be a season marked by strong and agressive play. Sarah Murphy '86 led the scrum with its powerful push and several merciless tackles. Sophomores Sanja Lengnick and Katie Gerber came into their own as they showed the Tigers the depth of Williams' resolve. The second half was scoreless, and the A-header into the net to win, 3-2. Four of the five goals, including Weiner's, were scored off corner kicks. The game was marked by aggressive play on both sides, though the Ephmen controlled most of the first half. Masters scored first at 17:52 into the half, heading a corner kick from Pieter Mulder '86 over the goalkeeper's hands. The ball bounced off the far post into the net.

With 1:25 left in the period, North Adams' Mirthon Manon struck back with another header off a corner. In the second half, Mike DeMorris of North Adams scored with a nice play in front of the goal to put his team ahead 2-1. North Adams was outplaying the Ephmen in the first part of the half, but Williams came back and with 22 minutes remaining, Walker blasted in a shot from the front of the goal off a Mulder assist.

Both teams played very well defensively through the tense overtimes, but Weiner broke the deadlock with only 3:27 left. Notably impressive in the match was Mike Morris '88, filling in at right back for Weiner, who was playing sweeper in place of the injured Deveaux. Said Russo, "Morris was quite effective in neutralizing their best forward". Russo particularly noted the talent of the midfielders, Denny Wright '87 and senior co-captains Mark Schroeder and Jeff McEvoy, labeling them "one of the best midfields in New England".

The Ephs are now 3-1-1 and face perenially tough Dartmouth tomorrow at Cole Field.

Soccer beats Trinity, outlasts NASC in OT

by Mats Holm and Greg Leeds

Under a constant downpour, the men's soccer team held off Trinity by a 2-1 score on Saturday in Hartford. The quality of play was hampered by the slickness of the field which made it difficult to play constructive soccer.

From the start, Trinity took control of the midfield and put the Williams backline under pressure. Nevertheless, the Ephmen scored first when Nikolai Nachamkin '88 pounded in the ball from 18 yards out as a result of a goalkeeper mistake.

The second period closely resembled the first in that Williams fought hard but didn't produce much. Trinity clearly mastered the difficult conditions better than the Ephs, and a third of the way through the half they tied the score. Williams' backline lapsed in concentration, resulting in a breakaway goal against goalkeeper Rob Blanck '89 by Trinity striker Chris Hyland. Williams, demonstrating great courage and renewed inspiration, struck back when Clark Otley '86 scored his first goal of the season, drilling the ball in with 20 minutes remaining.

"The guys showed great fighting spirit and good morale," said coach Michael Russo. Williams received a fine performance in goal from Blanck, and from Jon Deveaux '87, who returned at sweeper after an injury. Other Ephmen standouts included backs Helge Weiner '87 and Mike Masters '89, and forwards Otley and Scott Walker '87.

Struggle with North Adams

Earlier in the week, Williams battled unbeaten North Adams State through two overtimes in their third overtime game in four matches and finally emerged victorious when Weiner directed a

Overcoming Ephs' 13 point lead, Bantams defeat Williams 14-13

by Greg Keller

After taking a 13-0 lead into halftime, the football team gave up two second-half touchdowns to the Trinity Bantams to fall 14-13 on Saturday in Hartford.

The muddy field conditions hurt both offenses, leading to a total of twelve turnovers and numerous broken plays. Those conditions took their effect early as the Ephs first score resulted from a miscue deep in Trinity territory. Bantam quarterback Dan Tighe lost the ball when Eph defensive end Greg Norton '86 hit him from the blind side. Tackle Brian Nixon '87 recovered the fumble in the end zone for the touchdown. Tony Fuller '89 added the extra point to give the Ephs an early 7-0 lead.

Trinity stopped a second-quarter Williams drive when safety Mike DeLucia intercepted a Scott Powers pass at his own two-yard line. Two plays later, however, the Bantams fumbled, giving the Ephmen first and goal on the five. Tailback Mark Meyer '88 scored the Ephs' second TD on a two-yard dive with 47 seconds remaining in the half, though Fuller's PAT attempt was blocked.

Trinity's DeLucia intercepted his second Powers pass in the middle of the third quarter, returning it to the Eph 39 yard line. Four plays later, Tighe connected with John Calcaterra for a 19 yard TD strike, and the Bantams successfully converted the extra point.

Trinity struck again on their next possession after a short punt gave them the ball at the Williams 30. Tighe connected for a 29 yard pass before fullback Steve Okun crossed the goal line from one yard out. Panther kicker Mark Mignone added the winning extra point with 2:54 left in the third quarter.

Morris takes over at QB

Senior Kevin Morris replaced Powers at quarterback for Williams' final three possessions and completed seven of 16 for 55 yards, but couldn't put together a successful scoring drive.

Lewis Collins '88 led Eph receivers on the day with eight catches for 79 yards, including several for first downs. Powers was 11 for 22 for 87 yards before leaving the game in the third period.

One key to the game was the difficulty the Ephs had in establishing their running game, which was held to only 43 total yards.

Volleyball beats NASC, Union, Trinity

by Debbie Snyder

The women's volleyball team added three victories to their record this week, defeating Trinity 15-7, 15-9, 15-8, North Adams State 15-0, 15-3, and Union 16-14, 5-15, 15-7.

Williams pulled ahead immediately in the dual meet at Trinity on Saturday, as Nancy Hedeman '89 opened the game with two aces. Another ace at 14-7 by co-captain Kelly Andrews '86 finished the first game. Strong serving won the second game as well, as Laura Wefing '88 took control at 9-9 and held serve until the end of the game. Trinity won the first three points of the last game with well-placed spikes, but consistent playing, especially from off-hitters Andrews and Caroline Teer '87, enabled the team to win the meet in straight games.

The Ephwomen crushed North Adams State on Thursday at Union College, allowing them only three points in the match. There was solid playing from reserve players Maureen Brand '88, Becky Moehring '87, and Martha Hoopes '87. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin stated, "This ws a good opportunity to see how much depth we have."

Union proved to be the toughest opponent this week, forcing Williams into a third game. The first game was tied at 9 and again at 14, but the Ephwomen managed to win the final two points. Union dominated the second game from the start with strong hitters. In the third game co-captain Mary Hickox '86 pulled the offense together to win the match. Teer and Jayne also performed well at net. "Union was an important win for us," commented Hudson-Hamblin, "It was their home court and their crowd. Anything could have happened."

Williams now faces the toughest part of its season with confidence and experience. They play their last home game Tuesday night against two Division II schools, American International College and Springfield. Both teams are highly rated in New England, and for Williams to win, according to Hudson-Hamblin, "We're going to have to play the best volleyball we've played all year."

Women's soccer falls to Trinity 3-2

This past week was a study in contrast for the 2-4-1 women's soccer team. On Saturday, the squad fell to previously winless Trinity 3-2 and did not play well, according to Coach Lisa Melendy. This past Tuesday, however, the Ephwomen faced the University of Hartford, the 10th ranked Division I school in the country and only lost 3-1. Hartford had previously been averaging nine goals a game and had only been scored on once.

Against Trinity, Williams was in trouble from the start and trailed 2-0 by halftime. Both of Trinity's first half scores, ocurring at 15:01 and 28:35 respectively, came after scrambles around the goal. By halftime, keeper Beth Edwards '89 had four saves and gave way to sophomore Joyce Rogers for the start of the second half.

Neither team could score for almost thirty minutes until Lauris Wren '88 found leading scorer Chris Boddicker '88 in the goal box. Boddicker converted on the pass, booting the ball past Trinity's Kim Currey to pull Williams to within one. The score remained 2-1 until five minutes were left in the contest. At this point, Trinity

by Mike Curtin

It started out wet. The Rugby Football Club traveled to the Nutmeg State Saturday to play Central Connecticut State University and the University of Hartford and once again came away with three victories. In a mud bowl, the WRFC showed that even in the face of natural adversity they can walk away with the win.

The scoring began at 10:58 into the first half with scrum-half Roger Merriam '86 connecting on a penalty kick from 30 meters. The remainder of the half was dominated by the white horde thanks to tireless scrum pursuit which was led by John Fetterolf '86 and Geoff Kass '86 and the relentless running of the entire line. Scrummies ended the half with a near score, giving Williams the momentum they needed for the second half. Plugman Brad Bissell '86 disorientated the Central Conn. wing with a bone-crushing hit, knocking the ball loose and Tim Latimore '86, making his debut at A-side second row, kicked the ball into the try zone and chased it down but was unable to touch it down for the score. As the first half ended, the score stood 3-3.

Muddied, but inspired, Ed O'Toole '86 opened up the second half with a try. Intense mauling by the Eph scrum forced the ball out to the line where O'Toole scooped it up and stormed over two Conn. defenders to raise the tally to 7-0 in Williams' favor. After an unsuccessful conversion attempt, the Ephmen regained possession of the ball deep in Conn. territory. Merriam pop-kicked it downfield and junior wing Mark Tompkins chased it down and hit the Connecticut fullback. The ball squirted loose, and the always alert stand off Craig Kirby '86 snatched it and lunged between the posts for the score. The whistle blew. The game was over, with the Ephs scoring an 11-0 victory.

When the B-side took the field, the pitch was once again occupied with men clad in clean jerseys, but this was only to be a transient phenomenon. Steve Patterson '87 started the party. Taking a pass from stand-off Erik Valdes '87, he carried the ball and several U of Hartford defenders into the try zone, giving Williams an early 4-0 lead. Heated defense and offense in the mud characterized the remainder of the first half along with inspired play by sophomores Brad Roegge and Kurt Oeler.

VOL. 99, NO. 5 USPA 684-680 WILLIAMS COLLEGE OCTOBER 22, 1985

Council slashes organizations' funding requests across board

by Harwell Wells

The College Council almost finished the appropriation of $131,000 of Student Activities Tax funds to various campus organizations recently. Funding requests totalled more than $200,000, meaning that several organizations received major cuts.

The Council met twice to study the recommendations of the Finance Committee, approving some and sending others back to the committee for re-evaluation.

In response to protest from some of the groups, including the Feminist Alliance, which had its funds cut in half from last year, Council Treasurer David Applebaum '86, replied, "We were giving very few groups their full requests." He also said the Finance Committee thought some organizations are overbooked or unnecessary.

The Feminist Alliance cut eliminated a proposed Rape Crisis Center and decreased funds for speakers by one-third. The Gay-Lesbian Union also received significantly less money, especially in the area of speakers and publications. Eric Rosenbaum '86, speaking for the GLU, protested the cut in the publications budget from $1000 to $325. He explained that, unlike other campus organizations, the GLU cannot request that books or publications on homosexuality be kept at Sawyer Library because of the difficulty a student may feel requesting the books or checking them out.

'Not really relevant'

The Disarmament Forum complained about cuts in the speakers category, pointing out that physicist Freeman Dyson would be speaking here later this fall. Applebaum replied, "(The Disarmament Forum) presents an opinion to the campus which is not really relevant," and that the CC's Finance Committee had to ask, when 20-25 speakers were proposed, "is it really reasonable?"

The Committee on Central America was not represented.

The Anti-Apartheid Coalition, Amnesty International, the Coalition Against Militarism, the Garfield Republicans, MassPIRG and the Hunger Action Project were approved for funding, and the Disarmament Forum, GLU and Feminist Alliance were returned to the Finance Committee for re-evaluation.

Questions were raised about The Gulielmensian's low advertising revenues and $2000 shipping costs, in relation to its $6000 funding request. The funding was eventually approved, with a request to examine printing costs and advertising revenue.

The Literary Review protested its funding of only $2500. Amy Glass '88, speaking for the Review, said that the group had a good deal of renewed interest this year; she further insisted that the Review is not "the cliquish thing they say it is."

Proposal to remove two-drink limit outcome of survey, campus meeting

by Andrew Mayer

In a move designed to increase attendance at the Log, the College Council endorsed a proposal last week from the Log Committee asking the administration to abolish the two-drink limit at the Log in favor of an honor-pledge system.

The proposal was written by Log Committee Chairman Steph Jacon '87 and committee members Anne Cordova '88 and Greg Stanger '86. It passed College Council 28-2 with two abstentions and suggests that legal drinkers who want to drink beer or wine at the Log sign "a Log pledge stating that they would not give alcohol to minors and they would not drive to the Log if they were going to drink."

The proposal suggests that students who fail to abide by the pledge would lose the privelege to purchase alcohol at the Log, and offers three methods of enforcing the pledge. The first is a monitor stamping hands at the door; the second, the bartender providing a drinking stamp; and the third, a roving employee acting as a monitor. The committee suggests that all monitors or hand-stampers be Food Service employees, "in order to eliminate any peer pressure to bend the rules."

James Reicheld '87, president of the Junior Advisors, asked what additional action might be taken against someone who broke the pledge. Jacon answered that the punishment had not been decided yet, but added, "We don't want to get anyone kicked out of school."

Focus on alcohol

The proposal is the result of both the campus survey on the Log and the open forum held at the Log on Oct. 8. Some students and administrators expressed disappointment that the sole topic of the open Log Committee meeting was alcohol.

The Log Committee hopes to repeal the two-drink limit, bringing back some of last year's popularity. Chairman Steph Jacon '87 said the beer-bottle collection will soon be returned to the Log.

Several students said they believe the committee should be more concerned with getting students who cannot drink to go to the Log than with the alcohol policy.

"Which is it folks, people or beer," said Chris McGuire '86. He pointed out a contradiction in the proposal as to whether the goal of the Committee was to have unlimited beer at the Log or to get more people to utilize it.

Assistant Dean William Darrow said, "Rethinking the drink limit is a very reasonable proposal," but he stressed that the administration feels the Log should be given a little more time to work.

Enthusiastic

Jacon told the College Council that Dean of the College Stephen Fix had been responsive to the proposal. "He's (Fix is) very enthusiastic to getting some viable alternatives to what is going on now," she said. Jacon added that Fix had said he was not discounting any suggestions.

In September, Fix said that he did not want to consider renegotiating the drink limit until at least a semester has gone by.

Log manager Mike Cutler said the proposal was about what he had expected, but sees potential problems with the proposal, especially with creating a penalty strong enough to keep students from violating the pledge.

"We are leaving ourselves open for the gigantic Pandora's box to open," he said, "and all the problems we've thought about will be realized." He questioned whether or not a student would really care if his Log privileges were suspended when he can still drink at campus parties or the Pub.

The final decision about any change in the alcohol policy at the Log belongs to Williams College Vice President/Treasurer William Reed. Reed is directly liable for any illegal drinking at the Log or accidents occurring as a result of such drinking because he signed the Log's alcohol license. Jacon told the Anti-divestment group

50 reply to coalition

by John Felkner

In response to the interest in Williams' investment policies in South Africa and the recent pro-divestment protests, a small group of students have formed The Coalition for a Free South Africa, a group opposing divestment as a method of ending apartheid.

While The Coalition opposes divestment, David Walters '88, a spokesman for the group, said the group was totally opposed to apartheid and in favor of speedy removal of the white government.

Walters said that the group had received more than 50 signatures in response to a notice in the Daily Advisor asking for signatures from students opposed to divestment. He stressed, however, that the response, not the number of responses was important. Walters said that the group plans to send the signatures to the trustees and the administration.

No debate sought

The Coalition was formed about a month ago and originally consisted of less than 10 students. "We are not trying to instigate a debate to re-spark the issue, nor to become a forum for one," Walters said. The primary purpose of the Coalition is to "let the trustees and administration know, in light of the recent petition and protest by WAAC, that there are students on campus with opposing viewpoints regarding a means for improving the South African situation."

"Divestment is not the way," Walters said. "Divestment can lead to economic sanctions. These in turn can lead to a loss of employment among South African blacks, and consequently a loss of South African black and U.S. economic power.... Money is power — economic power. Economic power is political power."

The Coalition sees U.S. business interests in South Africa as an important tool for applying political pressure on the ruling government, Walters said. "If the U.S. has no business in South Africa, then we will have no say in what goes on there. South Africa is clearly sensitive to the opinions of the U.S. (and) to pressure from Congress," he explained.

Potential revolution

The Coalition also fears the potential of U.S. economic actions to promote a revolution. "We're concerned with the long run interests and aspirations of the black majority in South Africa. Consequently we oppose divestment, and we're not in favor of economic sanctions of any kind as a means for affecting change in any country. Obviously, while some blacks in South Africa want a revolution, many don't. The U.S. has no right to make that choice for them," Walters said.

Walters pointed out that not all South African blacks are in favor of divestment. "Students have an extreme lack of perspective in seeing problems in South Africa without considering problems in other parts of Africa, or the situation in Afghanistan. Divestment at Williams is purely a symbolic action. How does this help the blacks?" Walters said.

"I think many students who support divestment here feel like they've done something. They have a protest on Chapin steps and go home saying 'I've done something.' They haven't done anything," Walters said.

Dollars and sense

The College Council budget is a yearly problem, both for the Council and for those whom it underfunds. Organizations request the money they need to cover the coming academic year, and the Council provides what money it can. Inevitably, however, someone is shortchanged.

There is a fixed amount of money from the Student Activities Tax for the Council to spend. The Council distributes some money at the beginning of the year, and witholds funds to be spent as new organizations crop up, as emergency funds for those groups who simply can't get by on their original allocation, and as its own operating money. Year after year the money distributed is simply not enough.

The Williams community this year has been very conscious of offering outlets for student energy, and such encouragement should be substantiated with an increase in the money given to the College Council. Raising the Student Activties Tax might have a negligible effect on individuals, but it would have a dramatic effect on campus life as a whole.

Speaking about the SAC budget, Treasurer David Applebaum said that the new drinking law intensifies the students need for alternative outlets. This reasoning applies to all groups, not just SAC, and if the administration and Trustees are truly interested in preserving the social life on campus then it should express that commitment by monetarily supporting extracurricular activities.

Correction

The story on the class of 1989, which appeared in the Oct. 1 issue of the Record, contained two errors. The percentage of students on financial aid, 38 percent, is not the highest of any class, and the percentage of minority students in the freshman class is 13 percent, not 15 percent.

"Maturity"?

To The Editor:

The Record's "Maturity" editorial (October 8) failed to respond to the most pressing issue of the Saturday, October 5 protest: Williams and South Africa. Instead, it chose to focus on the project of protesting. Protesting is/was not the matter at hand. The matter at hand is was racism, hate, money, apartheid, people.

The Record's editorial was, to say the least, offensive to those of us who are struggling to bring another perspective to this campus. "Maturity"?! The title itself is patronizing, and suggests that we, as protestors and Williams students, might be committed to desecrating the illustrious events of our college. Contrary to popular rumor, this is not our goal. We are passionately engaged in questioning the school's decision to invest in corporations which support a racist system of hate. Contrary to popular rumor, we are not concerned with just rocking the boat. We want to raise consciousness of Williams' involvement in the injustices in South Africa through responsible means, not through alienation and hostility. Hostile methods are not conducive to the realization of our goals.

The last line of the Record's editorial expressed unfounded surprise and bafflement at even the notion of student protestors "recognizing that the trustees and administration could be coworkers." Contrary to popular rumor, we have been deeply involved in opening the lines of communication among ourselves, and between us and the administration—spending many hours exchanging concerns and formulating strategies to address the issues of the college's investment policy and racism at Williams.

Both the editorial and a letter to the editor on the same page suggest that the induction cermony might not be an appropriate time or place for political debate. When is the time for political debate?! Surely when the Williams community, including the trustees, is gathered. Furthermore, the whole notion of attending a cermony implicates us in a choice of consciously supporting the events, events which are political because they are involved in the maintenance of tradition. Tradition legitimizes systems of thought, behavior, presuppositions, and in this case, a system which supports a certain policy of investment.

To protest is to be political—to be willing to step out of the repetitive chain of legitimization and challenge a system to change. If we at Williams continue to be caught in the illusion that politics and the political can or should be confined to discrete boxes of socially acceptable time, then we, as individuals, will be tied to a self-perpetuating system which will never change.

Profit

To The Editor:

Joe Ehlers' Op-ed piece of last week seems to assume that US corporate investment in South Africa is a good thing, or at the least not harmful to South African blacks. If this is the case why has the last quarter-century seen the growth of South African governmental oppression of blacks, with no outcry from US companies? The answer, simply put, is that US companies want to make a profit, and in South Africa they profit from the cheap labor supply which apartheid in general, and influx control in particular, makes available. That corporations are beginning to complain now is a symbol of their fears for the future of their operations, not any moral or ethical opposition to apartheid. Anyone who perceives corporations as a vehicle for change (except in Chile and the Dominican Republic) is out of his mind!

Joe talks of the anti-apartheid policies practiced by American companies in South Africa. Hogwash. First off, only half of them have signed the Sullivan Principles which Ford employees described in 1984 as "a toothless system, which does not demand that apartheid be abolished, only modernized to ensure its perpetuation." Ford employs more black workers in South Africa than any other US company. Secondly, US corporations pay taxes to, and obey the laws of, the South African government. To oppose the system of apartheid in an active manner is a crime under the Suppression of Communism Act and the Internal Security Act. Anyway, how can one oppose a system from which one is profiting? With what sincerity can anyone claim that Mobil and IBM are working for the betterment of blacks when Mobil supplies the oil (despite an OPEC boycott) and IBM the spare computer parts to keep South Africa's terroristic security apparatus in power?

Summing up his argument, Joe describes the WAAC petition as "quite radical, quite dangerous, and...quite harmful to the welfare of the people of South Africa." It is interesting that Joe should perceive the attitudes of US corporations, the ACSR, and White South African appeasers like Colin Eglin (head of the Red Party) to be more persuasive than those in a position to judge the likely impact of disinvestment on South Africa, namely South Africa's black leaders. Alan Boesak, Desmond Tutu, Nelson Mandela, these are the representatives of the South African people, and they unanimously support disinvestment. What kind of signal are we sending when we take the word of illegitimate, interested, white authorities and say that black authorities are uninformed and misguided? It is not the WAAC petition, but this college's investment policies which are dangerous and harmful to the people of South Africa. We stand in support of the true representatives of the South African people, not against them.

Praise

To The Editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to praise the Italian government for its release of Abul Abbas and his companion, not because I support the PLO and its methods, but because I am relieved that the matter has finally fallen into the hands of a responsible nation that has some respect for international law and diplomacy. President Reagan's behavior from the beginning of this episode has been bigoted, belligerent, and, above all, illegal; for him to think that he has the right to pull foreign planes out of the sky whenever he sees fit is atrocious, not to mention the fact that it blatantly violates Egypt's sovereignty. Does he recognize no authority higher than his own? Craxi, in recognizing the diplomatic nature of Abbas' mission and releasing him, has taken a step in the direction of international order. Reagan, it seems, would rather institute an international auto-

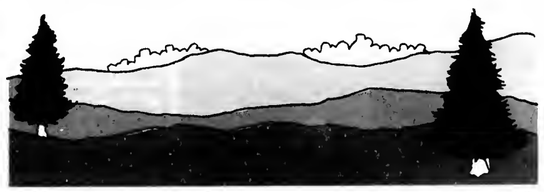
On Williams, South Africa, the President, and the Boss

by John Canty '88

We are so distant here in this valley, and for me a constant reminder of Williamstown lies in the ease with which one can lose contact with the outside. The work, the classes, the social life, the beautiful Fall that is New England, all combine so easily to preoccupy us. Yet we have increasingly witnessed reverberations around our homeland and from lands beyond our waters' edge borne in upon us as if to serve notice, if ever we should forget, that events, and the obligations they impose, cannot be eluded. Rather, they are for us to take in hand and shape, as far as our poor ability can on this planet allow.

•Since the advent of this Fall, the eyes of the United States, and indeed the world, have been cast upon the anguish of South Africa, as men and women there demand a dignity intrinsic to them and to all man, as children of a Covenant. The issue of divestment in United States corporations involved in South Africa has gained a heightened salience, with Americans of mutual goodwill heatedly debating as to what course our responsibility should lead. In Washington, a coalition of the unlike, comprised of traditional Republicans and liberal Democrats, forced a reluctant President Reagan into signing a limited set of sanctions against an oppressive and iniquitous regime. The issue of South Africa has unleashed a moralism that has been latent in our political dialogue since the 1960's; the principles of justice and freedom invoked in the debate now are claiming a higher precedence in our domestic goals.

•"...We believe that the United States Government...is where foreign policy properly should be made. Williams' connection with such efforts can only be a tangential one...." statement by the Williams Trustees, June 1985



Divestment has received interest here at Williams. At the outset of the year Williams students found in their mailboxes from the Office of Public Information statements by President Oakley, the Trustees, and the Committee on Shareholder Responsibility concerning Williams' policy toward South Africa. This view has come under strong attack, and as Summer gives way to Fall we are recognizing that the ideals which Williams teachcs are not unique to the Berkshire Valley; there are moral absolutes, there are universal truths, and our generation is seeing their shadows recur in this world landscape and in the decisions we must make. No institution has so compelled me to consider my principles as has Williams, and no institution has so challenged me to live by them. The argument that our obligations have limits suffers under Williams' own rigorous standards, and in that sense, in the most important scnse, the lesson is that to have ideals is to adhere to them. When our community engages in protest, when people give a damn, the Williams tradition excels.

•Perhaps one of the most fascinating evenings I have had here was the roundtable on the American Presidency arranged by the Political Science Department. All night we heard distinguished individuals share insights into the Presidency and national leadership, into the Roosevelt legacy, into the Reagan Administration. Neverthcless, all the panelists but one seemed to despair of the future at a time when their ideas only are beginning to trlumph. 1985 has seen Ronald Reagan, however commanding a figure on the national stage, lose dominance over the national agenda. The farm crisis, South Africa, Congressional rejection of his "chainsaw massacre" budget cuts for the safety nct, all have converged in their strength to force the White House into a series of dramatic retreats and reversals. Each of these concerns contained an underlying appeal to fairness which surfaced to force the Presidential will. Indeed, I would argue that barring a (possibic) breakthrough at Geneva, the Reagan course has largely been run. We keenly appreciate the possibilities of government and we more strenuously feel our leadership dutles in this world. These are no small marks. Only last year we saw a stylish candidate rally small voices in the night to a neoisolationist platform and a return to the corrosive indifference of the 1970's. Even if he is gradually declining in his influence, Reagan gave us confidence at a critical time. Now our vision and our goals are broader.

This renewal passes with little notice. Instead, some individuals (legitimately) worry over what they see as a hedonistic, self-centered generation. I do not see this. Some of the broad outlines, yes. But I also see a great deal of thinking. Changing a phrase from last year's campaign, we at Williams and across this land are asking ourselves: what kind of a generation are we?

•Finally, however transient my thought may be, those of the Boss endure. This past summer, due to the generosity of those individuals with whom I worked, I was able to see Bruce Springsteen at his Washington concert. On a warm August night beneath clear skies thousands of fanatics crowded RFK Stadium and their enthusiasm knew no bounds. Springsteen sang in his opening "Born in the USA." I cannot but believe that these fans know every word of the lyrics, with their cadences dealing with the American agony of Vietnam and of the trajectory's end of the 1960's brightness. Yet the fervor of that crowd went undimmed (the stadium itself shook), and it went beyond worshipping a tremendously popular rock star. While it was doubtful that we could have considered that song a decade ago, now a renascent spirit has taken hold of us, the same spirit that put old ghosts to rest at the Memorial to Vietnam Veterans, the same spirit that leads us now. In a sense we are returning to the 1960's legacy of "seeking a newer world." And in returning to it, we come ever close to that idea which our national mission demands of us.

Getting high

I'm sleeping better these days, thanks in part to Mr. David Taylor. Taylor, I fortuitously learned, is a climatologist with the Weather Services Corporation of Bedford, Mass.

In his capacity as climatologist (which seems to be fancy name for weatherman), Taylor recently went out on a limb to predict a "typically colorful" autumn season for the Berkshires. Although a bit uncertain what 'typically" means, I'm pleased by the optimistic indication.

Mr. Taylor's prediction brings to mind a dinner conversation of late, during which a friend asked, "Why do we all like mountains?"

This question turns out to be nettlesome. And provocative, if not downright baffling. That evening, mulling things over, we concluded that while the premise (mountains are pleasant) is legitimate, the reason is not so clear. During the last two weeks—while strolling across campus and watching Mr. Taylor's prediction bear fruit—I observed some things which shed light on the riddle.

For starters, it seems safe to suggest that residence amidst mountains is not a prerequisite to enjoy them. Witness, for example, the shiny tour buses, disgorging city-dwellers who "ooh" and "aah" at the colorful Berkshires while toting pocket Instamatics and Fujifilm. And what about the cavalcade of doddering autos stumbling along Main Street and threatening life and limb? Though perhaps more accustomed to the reds, yellows and greens of a Manhattan stoplight, the visitors seem to find ingenuous (if not therapeutic) pleasure in the hills.

Living here, then, cannot be the reason we like mountains, although mountains may be why we like living here. To hikers, campers and bikers, the benefits of Greylock's summit on a cloudless autumn day are uncontestable.

But what of the valley-dweller who enjoys the mountains without needing to climb, conquer or photograph them? Simply waking each morning to find their nestling presence is enough; it's as if the hills are a cozy security blanket.

Yes, mountains are nice. They make us feel good, provide a peculiar comfort and even allow Mr. David Taylor to find his way into "all the news that's fit to print."

Why do we like mountains? I stumbled upon my own reason last weekend while bustling across campus. It was sunny and crisp, a touch of fall in the air. Stopping to stare at Mt. Greylock, I realized that mountains ask us to look upward, to gaze away from the crowded and trampled scenery before us, away from discarded chewing gum, muddied newspapers and crumpled McDonalds' wrappers.

The mountains don't change anything—not really—except the way we feel about ourselves. They lift our eyes and our morale, inspiring a delicate reassurance and optimism. So next time you stare at a distant peak and admire its magnificence, ask yourself what you're feeling, and then ask why.

cracy, with the all-powerful United States at its head. I would finally like to commend the Italians for showing the courage to act according to their own consciences in a time when so many countries have become mere puppets of the imperialistic United States and Soviet Union.

Bike Rack

To The Editor:

To hoist and secure a bicycle rack on the Baxter flagstaff is quite the stunt. Funny. Perhaps even satisfying. After all, hundreds of familiar faces will look up to your handiwork.

To those who did raise the rack on the Saturday night of President Oakley's induction, I daresay your satisfaction would be less had this hundred pounds of steel crashed through the head and body of the Buildings and Ground employee who raises the flag on Sunday morning. This frightening scenario was nearly reality. The B&G worker did not look up. Had onlookers not shouted out warning, he might have been severely injured or even killed.

Feel lucky. Your trick was astoundingly irresponsible.

Practical jokes are OK, but they entail responsibility—mainly that the well-being of potential victims is not jeopardized. Think about it.

Watson Hopefuls Chosen

Williams College has nominated four seniors for the Watson Fellowship, a grant which provides a year of independent study and travel abroad. James Brown, Regina Kelly, Elisabeth Marr and Anne Southworth were chosen by a faculty selection committee.

The committee made the nominations based on the students' proposed projects, capacity for leadership, potential for creative achievement and excellence within a chosen field. The nominees will compete with candidates from 50 other institutions, and 70 recipients will be chosen.

Brown plans to make a socio-political study of the urban poor population in Bogota, Columbia and Havana, Cuba, which he said he hopes will give him insight into American poverty.

Kelly would like to study the actor's contribution to the European theater of "fantastic realism." She said she hopes to investigate how free actors feel in fantastic realism by working as an aetress or stage technician with acting companies in England, Germany, France, Spain, Yugoslavia and Poland.

Marr intends to study the changing life patterns of pastoralists in southern Peru, northern Norway or northern Nepal. She said in her proposal that studying these cultures would give her a broader and better background with which to teach high school earth science and environmental ethics.

Southworth hopes to study the Common Tern population in Brazil, following the migration of the tern to breeding grounds in Great Britain. The fellowship would allow her to pursue her commitment to environmental planning, she said in her proposal.

The winners of the Watson Fellowships will be announced by the Foundation next March.

Freshmen Officers

The six new members of College Council attended their first meeting last week, all the winners of the freshmen elections held two weeks ago.

The freshmen representatives to the Council are Kevin Hinton, Freshman Council Representative, Lauren Boeschenstein, Sarah Marcus, Brittany Peacock, Nancy Shore and Bethany Spaulding.

Marion Dawson and James McNulty were elected to the Honor and Discipline Committee, and Ingrid Dankmeyer joined the Committee on Undergraduate Life.

Kln Man Ma was elected to the Committee on Educational Policy, and Julie Jacobson, Mary Kipp and Douglas Shulman were elected to the Housing Committee.

Nuclear Freeze

Randall Kehlor, former co-director of the National Nuclear Freeze Campaign, will speak tonight at 7:30 in Lawrence Hall, room 231. He will talk about "Where to from Here? The Future of the Nuclear Freeze Movement."

Kehlor is one of the founders of the National Nuclear Freeze Campaign and will discuss the six-year history of the group, as well as its future strategies.

Kehlor's speech is sponsored by the Williams Disarmament Forum. He will also speak at the North Adams State College "Strike for Peaee" rally tomorrow.

Eleanor Harz Jorden, Bernhard Distinguished Visiting Professor at Williams, has received the 1985 Japan Foundation Award.

Jorden accepted the five million-yen award ($21,000) in Tokyo from the Japan Foundation, an organization sponsored by the Japanese government. The foundation's annual awards recognize individuals and organizations "whose contributions to mutual understanding between Japan and other nations of the world has been truly outstanding."

The Japan Times said, "(The award) cited her for long work as a linguist in the field of Japanese...(She) contributed greatly to the spread of Japanese language study."

Jorden, who is visiting Williams for the year to initiate a program in the Japanese language, is the author of the most widely used Japanese language text.

"The class here is going very well," Jorden said. "It's great fun. We have about 40 people, and we're using some new materials and audio-visual aids that I've been working on." A new text, with videodisk and audio-cassette recorded materials, will be published soon.

Jorden has been at Cornell University since 1969 and directs Japanese FALCON, a full-year, full-time intensive language program begun in 1972.

In 1982 she received an honorary degree from Williams. In May of this year, she received the Order of the Precious Crown, awarded by the Emperor of Japan.

Deans' office gives $100 to each prof. for students' entertainment

by Tom Ewing

In a step toward improving faculty student relations, the Deans' Office has announced the creation of a new fund to be used by faculty members to entertain students.

Beginning in 1985-86, each full-time faculty member will receive $100; part-time faculty or those teaching only one semester will receive $50. According to a memo sent to the faculty by Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Dean of Faculty John Reichert, this fund may be used for entertaining at home, to compensate for the cost of restaurants or caterers or to make use of Food Service's own catering capabilities.

Students chat with Vice President/Treasurer Will Reed. The Deans' office hopes to encourage such informal contact throughout the College community. (Scheibe)

Two resources were already available to faculty for entertainment: department funds and dining hall privileges. Department funds were mostly used for events for majors and were generally available to faculty to entertain students in their classes.

According to Professor Kurt Tauber, these funds were readily available to faculty to compensate for expenses incurred having students to dinner or for other student-faculty events. In general, however, these funds were only used to entertain students within the department or in a professor's classes, he said.

According to the memo, "Our hope is that these new discretionary accounts will be useful to faculty members wishing to entertain students who may not currently be in their department or courses, though these funds carry no such restrictions.

CC Survey

Several faculty members said, however, that they planned to use the new fund to entertain students in their classes. This reflects the results of a College Council survey sent to faculty in May, 1985, which indicated that student/faculty relations were best when a shared intellectual interest exists, generally developing out of a particular class.

According to Fix, the largest allocation of funds for student-/faculty interaction goes to pay for dining hall meals. The responses to the College Council survey indicated that the professors generally rated these meals as a positive factor in furthering contact between students and professors.

Assistant Professor of Geology Paul Karabinos said, "What I have decided to use it for is to take students to lunch so I can discuss (things) with them in a more informal atmosphere — how the class is going — and get more feedback."

Although he had no definite plans to use the money, English professor Lawrence Raab said, "The fund is a good thing to have in place, and I look forward to using the money." He said that while this was a modest amount of money, it is a helpful step with positive implications.

Little difference

Michael Bell, an English professor and chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life, said that although the fund might produce some new ideas, he doubted that it would make a significant difference.

The main hindrance to development of faculty/student relations is not money but energy and time, according to Tauber. He said that he said he would like to see more effort put into making student/faculty relations qualitatively better.

Many professors echoed this view in responses to the questionnaire, calling for closer and more informal contact between faculty and students, not merely more events.

Fix recognized the limitations of the new step but emphasized its potential: "This is a modest, but we hope a productive change. It is not an immense amount of money, but it is a beginning."

Reichert also promoted the potential of this new fund. "This fund makes it easier for faculty to feel that they can arrange the kind of events they want with the kind of students they feel comfortable with."

Best-selling writer speaks

by Daniel O'Connor

Rabbi Harold J. Kushner, author of When Bad Things Happen to Good People, spoke to a standing-room-only crowd in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall Oct.9.

Kushner said that none of the historical explanations for suffering were designed to make the sufferer feel better. "They were intended to defend and justify God," he said, "and God says, 'Forget about me and my reputation. I can really take care of myself.'"

"Bad things happen to good people because the laws of nature can't tell the difference between bad and good people," Kushner said. "God withheld the ability to tell the difference between good and evil from nature. He gave this ability only to man."

Kushner used the biblical story of Job to demonstrate that God cannot be both all powerful and perfectly good. "And if we must choose between a God who is good and one who is all powerful, which is the most religious attitude?" he asked.

Wrong question

Kushner said that he believes that mankind has been asking the wrong question for thousands of years: "Why do bad things happen to good people?"

"This question focuses on the past. 'Why did it happen? Who can I blame?' You can't change the past. Instead of focusing on the past, look to the future. Instead of 'Why?' ask 'What can I do about it?'" he said.

"If you have a friend who is going through a hard time, please don't wait for him to pawn his dignity and ask for help. Ask him if he wants help," Kushner said. "I'll give you a short course on what to say to him: 'I'm sorry.' You will do more by listening than by offering profound advice."

Student reaction to the lecture was mixed. Wendell Chestnut '88 called the lecture enlightening. "He presented himself well. It might have helped if I had read the book to get a rough idea of how he was going to present his speech," Chestnut said, adding that in some places he found the lecture "logically flawed."

Henry Grossman '87 liked what Kushner had to say. "Most nineteen year-olds," he said, "haven't had any tragedies. But I liked it at the end when he brought it down to a smaller level. It applied not just to tragedies but to people in need."

Visitor held by Contras

by Debbie Snyder

Steven Danbury, a member of Witness for Peace, spent almost 24 hours in the custody of Nicaraguan Contras this summer but was released unharmed. He described his experience at a slideshow, "Kidnapped by Contras," sponsored by the Committee on Central America on Oct. 9.

Danbury said that he and 28 other Witness for Peace members went to Nicaragua for two weeks in August. They went, he said, "to pray for peace in this area of conflict and to support any and all gestures of peace in this zone." He said that similar groups have been going to Nicaragua every two weeks since September 1983.

Danbury's group went to the southern part of the country to sail from El Castillo down the Rio San Juan, the river which divides Nicaragua and Costa Rica. As they sailed, they stopped at guardposts. No one at the first guardpost would speak to the group, Danbury said.

Epileptic fit

When Glass argued that $2500 would not fund two full issues of the Review, Applebaum asked about the possibility of raising funds from Literary Review Alumni. Melissa Perkins '86, said this was impossible, as the Alumni Office "has an absolute epileptic fit if you contact alumni." It was then pointed out that this does not mean one cannot contact alumni.

The final vote approved recommendations for Agora, Germinal, the GUL, Parallax, the Photo Club,the Record and WCFM. Progressive Films and the Social Science Review were sent back to the Finance Committee. The Literary Review was also sent back, following a tie vote broken by President Anza Mammen.

Funding for the Educational organizations — the Free University, the French Club, the Idea Exchange Forum and the History Club — was approved without debate.

Bob Kaplinsky '86, spoke for the Jewish Association. He argued that the cut in funding from $1985 to $1000 was a severe blow to the association and "not really justified." He pointed out that, since 1979, the group has suffered a drop of $1400 in funding, and that the budget this year would be completely spent on four speakers this fall.

The Jewish Association's request was then returned to the Finance Committee while funding for Asian Link, Baha'i Faith, the Christian Fellowship, Christian Science, the International Club, the Newman Association and the Committee for Palestinian Rights approved.

Plagiarize, please

Peer Health requested more money in order to buy a booklet, originated by Dartmouth, concerning sexual education. The cost of the booklet was questioned, with Council Vice President Amy Jeffress suggesting "Why don't you plagarize?", but the request was sent back to the Finance Committee. EMT, Lehman Service Council, Purple Key, Recycling and 10-to-1 were approved.

The Student Activity Committee's request was discussed at length. Applebaum stated that the SAC was "really vital on campus...especially with the drinking crackdown policy there might be reasons to sponsor events on campus."

Council member Andy Harris '88, said, "In light of the Feminist Alliance's Rape Crisis Center and the GLU's publications budget being underfunded, we should pull this budget and could spare $500 for the others." Applebaum then mentioned that the SAC needed a great deal of money in order to have booking flexibility, because often bids for bands are needed in a day. The SAC was sent back to the Finance Committee along with Cap and Bells and Dance Society.

All of the sports requests were approved without debate.

council last Thursday that the Log Committee had not spoken to Reed.

Log: tanking spot

Reed says that he will review any proposal submitted and looks to Fix for guidance and opinions on the issue. However, he cautioned students that he would need a compelling case to change any policies. He said, "I view the students as saying 'we want a place where we can go and get tanked.'

"We tried to create a party atmosphere without any booze," Reed continued, pointing to President Francis Oakley's inaugural ball as an example that such a party atmosphere can exist without alcohol.

At the Log Committee open forum, attended by approximately 85 students, several suggestions for improving the Log were discussed, including a bring your own beer policy, the pledge, a Log club and a roving student-monitor Log Board.

Jacon, speaking at the meeting, said, "We are here for you. We are pro-old Log. We realize that we can probably never get back what we had. We feel the (two-drink) limit is bogus."

Log a privilege

The majority of the discussion revolved around the B.Y.O.B. policy and the proposed pledge. Speaking about the pledge, Peter Dawson '86 commented, "We are privileged to have (the Log), and we're going to have to take the responsibility for it ourselves."

Jacon said, "The town is really down on the Log. They'd like to see the Log blown up, you know, burned." College Council President Anza Mammen '86, speaking at the forum, said, "I don't think there is any way of keeping the police out of here if the College doesn't control the Log. We have to give a little and take a little and therefore we go for the honor code."

James Reicheld '87, president of the Junior Advisors, said at the open meeting that he is worried that freshmen are going to Vermont and North Adams to drink. "I'm a little concerned about the freshmen attitude towards drinking. It's a little bit frightening." He feels that if ways are found to get sophomores and juniors who are legally unable to drink to go to the Log, the freshmen would follow.

post, Boca San Ricas, did, however, talk to the Americans. "They understood what we were trying to do," Danbury said, but the barge was not allowed to stay at Boca San Ricas overnight because of the danger of having Americans there.

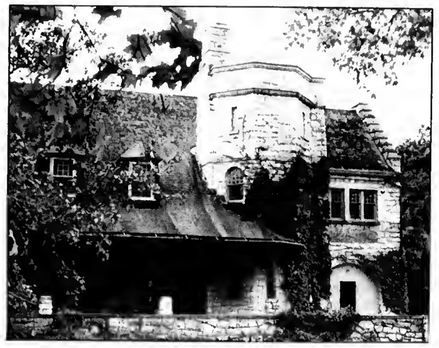
Contras open fire

As the barge started back up the river the next morning, shots rang out from the Costa Rican side of the river. The barge pulled over, and Contras ordered everyone off, Danbury said.

Contras forced the Witness for Peace members to walk for an hour through the jungle to a chief's hut and remain there all day while members negotiated with the Contras. The group spent the night on the barge, guarded by soldiers, and were released at noon the next day, he said

A radio report by a Contra colonel said that the Americans had had engine trouble and had stopped for a picnic on the Nicaraguan side of the river, he said.

"We were reminded were we Nicaraguans, we wouldn't have returned. They could have killed us all and burned the boat and sent it to the other side of the river," Danbury said.



In the second week, the group visited other towns, settlement camps and government officials, Danbury said. Reflecting on what the trip achieved, Danbury said, "We weren't there to bring anything tangible back to the United States. We were there to see what's happening, (but) the one gigantic thing proven was that Contras do operate out of Costa Rica."

The home of one-time Greek geeks: St. Anthony Hall (now the Center for Developmental Economics) was considered a first-class scholarly frat.

Ancient Greek Ephs: from Alpha to Omega

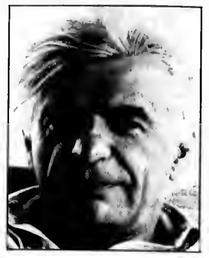
by Corinna Lamb

Although fraternities no longer exist at Williams—they disappeared over twenty years ago—during their heyday the Greek institutions dominated student life.

"One came back first and foremost as a member of Zeta Psi, not as an alumnus of Williams," said Henry Flynt '44 about his class reunions. A Williams man identified himself primarily by his membership in a fraternity, but proving himself "worthy" of this status was no easy matter.

Hazing, or the initiation of new frat members, was a pledge's nightmare. Art History Professor E.J. Johnson '59 remembered being taken out into farmland, blindfolded, and having to find his way back to the house with two other pledges. Some of the activities were more barbaric than fun. Hugh Deane '56, a member of Delta Upsilon, recalled, "You would have to sit on ice cubes, and they (older frat members) would pour cold water over your head."

Close shave



Other hazing rites included swallowing oysters that were then pulled up from one's throat on a string, midnight trips to the local cemetery and learning secret handshakes. Russell Carpenter '54, a member of Zeta Psi, recounted that one young man, who sported a beard, was ordered to shave only half his face.

Before even undergoing hazing, however, a student had to be lucky- and hardy—enough to be accepted into a frat. Fraternity rushing, endearingly termed "Hell Week," occured the week before classes started. Johnson called rushing "an absurdly awful" procedure.

For four nights freshmen visited each frat house for an hour, where they were served water, mints and cigarettes, the only refreshments permitted by the frats, ensuring that there would not be competition among them to provide better beverages. A command post was established and an older frat member would talk to a

Profile: Yves Bonnefoy

by Jane Becker

This semester's Arnold Bernhard Visiting Professor opens his office door, looking bewildered by the presence of a visitor; Yves Bonnefoy quickly excuses himself, saying, "I forgot completely (about the interview). The days are all the same for me here--Tuesday, Wednesday . . . ." This petite, wild white-haired poet shows himself to be an artist consumed by his work.

Bonnefoy is well-known throughout the world for his French poetry. He has published four major books of poetry in verse, a fifth book of prose poems, and is finishing his sixth book comprised of poems in both verse and prose. In Paris, he teaches at the College de France. He is here in Williamstown to fill a special interdisciplinary niche, teaching a course for the French department on French poets from Baudelaire until today while giving a series of lectures in English on the art and poetics of sculptor Alberto Giacometti.

This is not the first time that Bonnefoy has taught at an American college. In fact, he has spent several semesters at colleges in and outside of France as a visiting professor, among them Yale University and the University of Oklahoma. Though he notices that classes are small here and the professors know their students, he says of students, "There is not so much of a difference in place as in time." He cites "problems of generation" and a " mysterious change in the attitude towards life" of the 1960s' students compared to those of today.

Giocometti

At the College de France, Bonnefoy has no students; his lectures are open to the public. There is an audience but no class and no exams. The auditors are typically students from the Sorbonne or other Paris universities. For two years, Bonnefoy has taught a course there on Giacometti.

Bonnefoy sees his lectures at Williams on Giacometti as "objective proof" of his own interest—as a writer—in Giacometti's sculpture. Bonnefoy is in the midst of writing a book about this famed sculptor of hauntingly thin figures.

The 62 year-old Bonnefoy met Giacometti in 1952 or 1953 (he is not sure which). "It was natural to know him; he was a friend of the avant-garde painters and writers," said Bonnefoy, slipping himself into the latter category. "I knew Giacometti for twelve or fourteen years and liked him very much....Everybody did."

What is art?

Bonnefoy sees Giacometti as "one of the most striking examples of the European mind in the 1950s and 60s." He said, "He was one of the few artists to embody the common experience of poets and philosophers of his time. You could look at his work and see the mirror image of what you felt." Bonnefoy leans forward to emphasize his point, arguing that, "Giacometti was a man who was always questioning the essence of his art: 'What is art?', 'What am I doing?', 'Why am I doing it?'."

The poet insists that all of his scholastic interest in Giacometti's career is not drawn from admiration. "It's not necessarily a tribute...but reflects my fascination for painting or art itself rather than for (Giacometti's) particularly," he said. Still, his vivid description of his own experiences with Giacometti reflects the analytic yet passionate mind of an observer who is, himself, an artist.

Personal style

Bonnefoy decided when he was a child to write as a poet. He claims it took years, however, to reach a point where he was satisfied with his expression.

To stylistically classify his poetry, Bonnefoy points to those he respects: Baudelaire, Rimbaud, Michaux, Jouve and Mallarme. Of the last, he tells a tale to explain his own method of writing. When Degas, who was also a poet, complained to Mallarme of how difficult it is to write sonnets, Mallarme responded that, "You do not need ideas; you need words." Similarly, Bonnefoy says, "To write poetry, you must meet first with your words and then with the meaning."

Bonnefoy never worries about writing a text; he writes many pages of elements for a book , "molecules of language" as he calls them, before he reaches a definitive work. It takes him years to then decipher the relationship amongst all of the short elements. He says, "I do not know where the words are leading me as I write. It is a process of discovery." This discovery, for Bonnefoy, involves an analysis of his voice that is coming from "the depths of the unconscious--a region where meaning is not obvious."

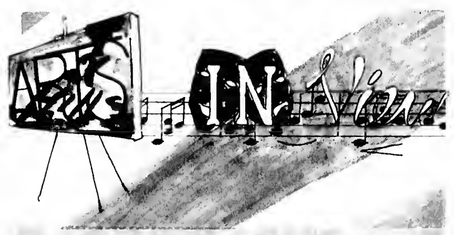
Bonnefoy hesitates to close his sixth book, saying, "it is very difficult to decide when a book is finished." Applying structure to his writings is this perfectionist's present task. The sixth book, about Giacometti, combined with a French course and lectures on Wednesday nights in Lawrence Hall keep Bonnefoy busy during his time at Williams. In January, he will return to Paris to teach at the College de France.

Cast shines in Glass Menagerie

by Elizabeth Skorcz

An almost flawless presentation of a theatrical classic is as rare as a glass unicorn, but one exists right here on the Williams campus in the current production of Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie. The show was remarkably even; acting, direction, set and costumes all were excellent.

Martha Hughes '86 shone as the mother Amanda, a former Southern belle deserted by her drunkard husband and left to raise two children, Laura and Tom, on her own. Amanda's dreams have ended in disillusionment, so she manipulates Laura and Tom, who are now adults, in order to live vicariously through them. Hughes' performance demonstrated a mature ability to convey the multiple facets of the mother's character. Whether she was nagging her children, rhapsodizing over her past, flirting hysterically with a gentleman caller or expressing the sadness of an oft-disappointed woman, Hughes was consistently compelling.



Seniors Jon Moscone, Martha Hughes and Joanna Adler star in the Williamstheatre production of Tennessee Williams "The Glass Menagerie."

The other three actors also delivered fine performances.

Eph alum's write stuff

by Vernon Squires

"Life is never good enough to be fiction," says Jay McInerney '76, whose first novel, Bright Lights, Big City, is a national best-seller and a critical success.

McInerney recently spent an afternoon at the College Book Store on Spring Street, where he chatted with inquisitive customers, signed autographs and plugged his new novel, Ransom.

Ransom is set in Kyoto, Japan, and like Bright Lights, draws upon real-life experiences. McInerney worked for two years in Kyoto, and later worked in New York City as a fact-checker for Random House publishers—employment similar to the protagonist's in Bright Lights, which chronicles a week in the dizzying lifestyle of a young New York writer.

"It's true that my work is partially autobiographical," McInerney said. "But that's the case for most writers. You have to write about what you know and care for. Only hacks write about things they don't know."

Asian link

For McInerney, the road to literary acclaim has been, in his own words, "a haphazard one." Following graduation from Williams, he sequentially toured the United States in a VW, worked as a reporter in New Jersey, took flight to Japan and finally returned to New York. Eventually, he obtained a fellowship at Syracuse University, where he completed both novels, and earned an M.A. in creative writing.

"There's really no normal path to becoming a writer," he said. "I started at a newspaper, and since then have worked for the New Yorker, at Random House and in Japan. Wherever I worked, though, it always was with the idea of writing."

From his days at Williams, where he was a philosophy major, McInerney aspired to fiction-writing. As an undergraduate, he edited a campus literary magazine and contributed to the college newspaper, then called the Record-Advocate.

Jay McInerney '76, author of the best-seller Bright Lights, Big City and Ransom.

Now, with the astounding success of Bright Lights, McInerney has earned comparisons to J.D. Salinger, Thomas McGuane and J.P. Donleavy. He remains wary of rave reviews, however, and admits to surprise at his meteoric ascendance of literary charts.

"Bright Lights caught on much more than I or my publisher ever expected—I'm not even sure why," McInerney said. "As for the reviews, I don't pay much attention to them—

Freshmen get set to stage revue

by Wayne Fritsche

The 1985 Freshmen Revue is well into its lengthy rehearsal period, with the pieces of the Caps & Bells-sponsored show starting to fall into place for the October 25 opening date.

This year's Revue is a musical version of Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona, writen by Mel Shapiro, John Guare, and Galt MacDermot, and produced on Broadway in 1971. Recent Freshmen Revues have been done in the style of cabarets, but the musical comedy format of Two Gentlemen allows for a larger cast—19 members in all—and permits a departure from the traditional Revue themes of growing up and the freshman transition.

"It's a pretty hefty production," said director Cam Smith '86. "It requires a lot of singing and dancing and acting. But because it's already been written and realized, we don't have to concentrate on rewrites and can work on the performances."

One of the biggest challenges the show has presented is the "difficulty of bringing a 60's/70's musical into the 80's," Smith said. To meet this challenge, students have infused creativity beyond performance and production, including the work of Randy Kromm '86, who is re-doing the musical's full score to suit contemporary tastes. "Some of the original songs are awful," he commented. "They sound very 60's showtune-ish. It's as if they had taken the bad songs from Hair or Godspell."

Kromm views the project as a "test for myself—it's not easy to write 25 songs in two weeks. Also, Cam wanted the show to be centered around various ethnic groups, which gives me a chance to write in different styles." To date, these "different styles" have taken the forms of jazzy rhythm-and-blues anthems, tender love ballads, obscene sambas and torch songs, harmonic choral serenades, and heavy-metal howls and grunts.

Coordinating the movement for these varied numbers (and valiantly attempting to coordinate the cast) is choreographer Mia Douglas '86. Commenting on the inexperience of most members, she said, "you can work more with emotion than with technique, which is fun. It's exciting to see people develop. The spirit is there."

This spirit is an extension of the cast's enthusiasm for the show in general. As Shirley Kagan '89 noted, "First, it's Shakespeare. Second, the music is fantastic. Third, it's hot and raunchy—we all blushed when we read the script!"

"I think the main reason the play will be great is that we are having such fun doing it," Kagan said. "We truly enjoy it."

Two Gentlemen of Verona will be presented October 25 and 26 on the MainStage of the Adams Memorial Theatre. Tickets are available by calling the AMT box office.

IN OTHER IVORY TOWERS

NASC

"Students have parties till all hours, and you go down the streets around the college on a Saturday morning and the trash is pitiful." This statement by the Mayor of North Adams suggests that all is not quiet on the North Adams front.

In response to the problems of noise, excessive drinking, traffic and other concerns allegedly caused by the social activities of North Adams State College students, residents have banded together to form CIRC, Citizens for Improved Community Relations. Fearing the wrath of NASC partiers, CIRC members wish to remain anonymous.

Among methods considered by NASC to help alleviate the problem are a $1000 "Good Neighbor" plan, developed by the SGA and funded by the college; stricter enforcement of laws and rules; and programs aimed at exerting peer pressure on the students. The SGA hopes city-student relationships will eventually reach the point where students are considered an integral part of the community and not "the other guy."

Wesleyan

"We'll get you this time: Death to the mysogynist Frat Boys"—this is certainly not a message one would like to receive. The men of Wesleyan's Chi Psi fraternity were understandably upset upon receiving individual death threats and discovering this message painted on their doorstep.

The message was one of the responses to the frat's plans to show pornographic films at a pledge function. To protest both this presentation and the rush function invitations, which "contained some terms with sexual connotations," 400 students linked arms and silently formed a circle in the rain around the frat house.

The demonstration was organized by WAVE, Women Against Violent Expression, a group which was formed the night before the vigil took place. Alanc Freund '87, a WAVE organizer, stated that the purpose of the silent demonstration was "to express one collective anger in a non-confrontational way." Members of the group feel Chi Psi exhibited "sexist and mysogynist values."

The fraternity decided that it would not show the films and acknowledged regret at having offended any of the Wesleyan community.

Yale

"Not worthy of the privilege of being presented to 40,000 people in Michie Stadium," was how West Point's Athletic Director Carl Ulrich described the Yale Marching Band's plans for its half-time presentation at the Yale-Army game last week.

Especially for Army's amusement, the Yale tunesmen had prepared a script exposing "Communist infiltration" among "top-ranking officials who had associations with subversive organizations."

Not appreciating such humor, Ullrich refused to allow the band to apppear on the field, confiscating its script and chastising the members for their lack of appropriate uniforms. The latter complaint particularly rankled the Yale Band's director, Tom Duffy, when an Army pep squad in shorts and dressing robes appeared at half-time and "flashed the crowd" with the message G-O A-R-M-Y printed on their bare chests.

To add injury to insult, the Yale football team was trounced, 59-16. (NY Times)

In Other Ivory Towers, written by Record reporters Meredith Miller and Jennifer Sills, was compiled from campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

most are irrelevent and stupid. And they're not all good; I've gotten some very critical ones as well."

"What you're really looking for is a consistent pattern of criticism," McInerney added. "If one or two people jump on some particular point, then it's best not to worry. If many people are saying the same thing, however, it might mean something."

In Bright Lights, McInerney departed from writing and publishing conventions. The story is told in second person familiar style, creating an unorthodox but effective bond between the reader and subject. In addition, Bright Lights was published only in paperback as part of a special series.

These unique approaches—which contributed to the book's success—reflect McInerney's attitude toward his writing; he scoffs at letting an audience influence his work, preferring to ground it in experience.

"I never try to guess what people want, but rather write to my own highest standard," he said. "Once you have the basics down, the fictional situation develops it own logic."

So far as advice for aspiring writers, McInerney suggests discipline and determination.

"I wish I could say it takes something really magical," he said. "But the truth is boring; writing is a lot of hard work. Although, it's more than that, too; you can't teach talent. The best advice I ever heard was 'read, read, read.' I agree, but you also have to 'write, write, write.'"

For McInerney, success has come quickly. In addition to two novels, he has had work published in The New Yorker, The Paris Review, Esquire, Vogue, The New York Times and Playboy. But he remains modest, dismissing the pressure of rapid success and casting an eye to the future.

"I just want to keep writing books, to keep writing fiction. I like to think I have something to say."

prospective pledge for a few minutes before giving him a grade of acceptability, such as A or C-. According to Carpenter,"you were rated on the basis of a ten minute interview."

However, "One joined to be with the 80% of the campus who were in frats, and many accepted frats they didn't like," Carpenter said. Sunday of Hell Week, the day before classes, the freshmen were either pledged in their frats, or rejected. Carpenter noted, "On that day you knew you were either going to be eating in a frat house or that you had already in the first week been deemed unacceptable."

Food fights

The frat houses provided most of the meals and housing for the student body. The only dining room owned by the College was the one for the non-affiliates—the Garfield Club members. Frats were responsible for feeding 80% of the campus and the freshmen ate their meals in the frat house to which they had been accepted. Because frat members and non-affiliates ate and lived in separate places the campus became divided.

Flynt recalled, "At mealtime all the frat people went one way, to Main Street, while the non-affiliates went in the opposite direction." Flynt also observed a benefit of the system, explaining, "The frats had an internal responsibility towards themselves had to hire their own cooks, purchase food, and manage a room and board operation."

It was not until 1953, when the College built Baxter Hall, that freshmen were provided with an alternative place to eat. The rules towards fraternities were changed so that students could not pledge until their sophomore year. This only intensified the divisions between frat houses. Fraternities would have an entire year to discover who were the jocks, the leaders, or the "grinds," and to recruit those who seemed to conform to each house's general image.

who has created her own private world, populated by the animals of her glass menagerie. Handling the role with sensitivity, Adler succeeded both in evoking the hidden complexities of the girl's personality, and in drawing a response of sympathy rather than scorn from the audience.

As the son Tom, Jon Moscone '86 gave a solid, though less compelling, performance. His acting included moments of particular intensity, such as when he tells Amanda a fantastic tale about his nocturnal prowls, or when he meets Laura at the door after a night of drinking. However, at times it was unclear whether to interpret his conversation with his mother as sarcasm or as an attempt at reconciliation.

Senior Paul Boocock's performance as the gentleman caller was an excellent counterpoint to the neuroticism of the family. Confident and smooth-talking, he provided just the right amount of comic relief, yet his casual good humor worked also to heighten the tragedy latent in his visit.

The set, designed by Arden Fingerhut, suited the nostalgic romanticism of the play. An especially clever touch was an old movie poster used as a backdrop; it reminded the audience of the illusions in which all of the characters took refuge. The lighting, also by Fingerhut, echoed the mood of the set and delineated the play-within-a-play structure. Its only noticeable flaw was a missed cue which caused actors and audience a moment of confusion.

Jean-Bernard Bucky deserves high praise for his direction of The Glass Menagerie. He orchestrated a show that steered clear of melodrama and left the audience deeply moved and deeply satisfied.

Describing the team's frustration with the results of the whole week, she said, "We played so well, and yet came up with one tie and two losses."

On a happier note, Williams clinched the Little Three title with a 3-1 victory over Amherst last Saturday. Co-captain Caroline Cento '86 scored one goal and Jeanne Cloppse '88 scored twice for Williams. Cento said that it was an especially good game because Amherst had a good goalie, yet Williams was able to put three shots past her. Amherst barely avoided a shut-out by recording their only goal near the end of the game. This game followed a 6-0 victory over Union the week before.

Previously, the Ephs played what Madore called "a hard fought game" against arch-rival Amherst and lost 1-0 on a goal with only ten minutes left in the game. Williams closed out the scoring when halfback Jay Hickman '86 plunged over the goal line from one yard out, set up by a brilliant 36-yard run by Rob Miller '87.

Offensively, Miller was the leading rusher for the Ephs with 70 yards in just five carries. Morris completed nine of 22 passes for 106 yards and one touchdown.

Next week the Ephs travel to Schenectady to take on Union. The week after, the Ephs will head to Wesleyan to face their first Little Three opponent. Saturday, Amherst beat Wesleyan 26-0.

O'Toole, Bronson, and Latimore all had trys. Latimore completed the scoring with two conversion kicks and a penalty kick. The final was 19-0.

The second game was a little tighter, but bone-crushing tackles by Gary Sheff '87 and Jeff Lifson '86 inspired Williams to hold strong. Tompkins and George Clemens '86 both scored trys and Greg Bronson converted on the first one. Thus the final tally was 10-0 in favor of the Ephs.

The B-side came away with an impressive 8-0 victory over the Berkshire B's. Junior linemen Steve Patterson and Dave Koota both scored for Williams. Helping them along the way were loose forwards Eugene Mazzaro '87, Mike Duncan '86, and Brad Roegge '88.

After sweeping Yale last weekend and taking the Berkshire tournament this week, the club remains undefeated as they head into the final stretch which will culminate November 9 on Cole Field against the Defectors of 1821.

Boston blanks women's rugby

by Diana Roberto

Last Saturday morning, the women's rugby club headed on a long, wet roadtrip to Beantown to face the intimidating, international champions from the Boston women's club and an incomplete but solid team from MIT. As the rain poured down, the A-side stepped onto a muddy pitch to face the oversized and experienced Boston club.

Older, but wiser, Boston was determined to prove their dominance over Williams. Yet, the Williams women were able to hold their own and provide their opponents with a challenging game. The first half was played mainly within the Williams 22 yard line with the scrum keeping the ball out of the try zone. Yet, two quick breakaways by the Boston wing gave the hosts two tries depite the efforts of Sara Suchman's '86 diving tackles. The half ended after Boston had scored once more, making it 12-0 as none of the conversions were successful.

The second half started with a Williams place kick immediately followed by an amazing, mud-planting tackle by Katie Gerber '88 which placed Williams within scoring distance. Consistent setting by Gerber and Noreen Harrington '88 in the line-outs helped the Ephs remain in possession and the line, despite the glue-hands of Ann Marie Plankey '87 and the successful squibbing by Becky Halle '86, struggled to gain yardage.

Defensive kicking by Mary Peterson '87 and her nose-plant tackling were also a great asset to the club. Yet, Boston was able to break away and score two more times, thus making the final score 20-0, an unrevealing indicator of the skillful playing of the Williams team.

Scoreless tie with MIT

The second game placed twenty Williams women on the pitch as five of them were needed to fill up the MIT side, providing the core of their strength. Thus the B's played an MIT/Williams team in an exciting, well-matched game. Accurate, timely kicks by Corinna Lamb '88 kept MIT away from the try zone as smart maneuvering and quick passing by the injured Daisey Hagey '88 got the ball out to the Williams line. The first half ended without a score.

Williams dominated the second half, coming in low and strong on the rucks and mauls and getting the ball out to the wing quickly. Fine running by Jean Janson '88 and Jane Amidon '88 kept play on MIT's half of the field, with frequent, close attempts at scoring. Unfortunately, due to the muddy conditions and the strong playing of Williams women in MIT jerseys, the game ended in a scoreless tie.

On the other hand, there was no question as to the winner of the post-game party as the Williams club transformed a boring, almost apathetic group of Boston ruggers into a singing, partying crowd. Escorted out by a military salute, the Williams club left their opponents with a dwindling party and a sincere appreciation of good play and good fun in the tradition of rugby.

Field Hockey wins Little Three

by Tom Ewing

The field hockey team's 3-1 victory over Amherst was the highlight of five-game stretch in which the squad compiled a 2-3 record. The win over Amherst followed a 6-0 victory over Union. After the Amherst game, the team tied Westfield, and then lost to Trinity and Tufts, bringing the season record to 7-3-1.

Despite outshooting Tufts 12-5, Williams ended up on the short end of a 1-0 game with Tufts last Saturday afternoon. Coach Chris Larson-Mason said, "This was the best game we played all season. They were good, but we had more offense than they did." Williams had several chances when the ball was near the goal line or actually behind the goalie, but these were not enough. "It just goes that way," said Mason.

The Tufts game marked the third consecutive game when the team did not score a goal. On Thursday, Williams lost to Trinity, 2-0. As in the Tufts game, Mason said that the Williams offense had been strong but that the Trinity defense had been equally good and was able to recover quickly and shut down any scoring threats by Williams, despite the offense's penetration.

On Wednesday, neither Williams nor Westfield was able to put any points on the board. The game was tied 0-0 at the end of regulation time and went into two overtimes. Both teams came up empty, and the result was a 0-0 tie. Once again, Mason said Williams had played well

Women's soccer, 3-6-2, beats Union, ties Tufts

by Al Mottur

With two games left in what has been a frustratlng season, the women's varsity soccer team finds itself saddled with a somewhat disappointing 3-6-2 record. The team has been inconsistent throughout the year, at one moment putting together an outstanding effort and at another struggling. In its last two games, however, it seems as if the team has put its best foot forward, defeating Union 5-2, and tying Tufts 2-2.

Against Tufts, the Ephs trailed 2-0 at the half and with twenty minutes remaining still had not scored. At this point, Tufts opened the door by committing a foul in the box thereby awarding Williams a penalty kick at 70:11. Co-captain Gigi Madore '87, took the shot and knocked it past the keeper, closing the gap to one.

As the game wound down, the Ephs found the mark again, as Lauris Wren '88 received a pass outside the box on the right wing and lofted a beautiful shot over the defenseless goalie into the upper left corner of the net. Wren's goal tied the game at two and finished the scoring for the contest.

In its previous game, the squad also found itself trailing 2-0 at the half, this time to Union. "We didn't play well, in the first half, but in the second half we were a different team," said Madore. A different team is in fact exactly what they were as they scored a season high five goals and shut out their opponents for the rest of the way, en route to a 5-2 win.

Standouts in the victory included sophomore Chris Boddicker, who recorded a hat trick, Madore, with two goals and an assist, and Lisa Phillips '88, who assisted on three of the five goals.

Before the Union game, the team faced a powerful Albany State squad and fell by a 3-1 score. The two goal margin of victory, however, was not indicative of Albany State's domination, as they outshot Williams 28-5 and held them scoreless

Volleyball

by Debbie Snyder

A tie with Siena University 15-17, 15-12, turned into a critical win for the women's volleyball team on Saturday at the Vassar Invitational. After easily defeating the three other teams in their pool, NYU 15-8, 15-12, Pace 15-10, 15-3, and West Conn. St 15-11, 15-8, Williams' thirty points to Siena's twenty-nine made Williams the winner of their pool.

The Eph lost in the quarterfinals to Yale 15-8, 4-15, 8-15, placing third out of sixteen teams in the tournament. Co-captain Lisa Jayne '86 was named to the all-tournament team. Williams also crushed Skidmore on Tuesday 15-6, 15-8, 15-11.

Siena proved to be the only real competition in Williams' pool. The first game was fought point by point. In the second game they were down 1-9 and struggled to stay in the mateh. Strong serving by Nancy Hedeman '89, including three conseeutive aces, tied the game at eleven.

The Ephwomen dispensed with NYU, Pace, and West Conn. easily, never losing control of the games. Captains Jayne, Mary Hickox '86, and Kelly Andrews '86 played consistently throughout the tournament. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin stated, "Lisa Jayne with her hard hitting, Mary Hickox sending teams to the floor, and Kelly Andrews with strong playing in the back row really held the team together."

Williams took Division I team Yale to three games but could not hold up under the Eli's strong offense. Hudson-Hamblin said, "Yale is a strong team, and we gave them a good match," adding that the match was, "Good conditioning for the NIAC tournament."

Williams faced Yale and Harvard at New Haven today.

Tennis

by Megan McNeill

In its sixth victory of the season, the tennis team showed no mercy as it rolled past Wesleyan 9-0, setting their record at 6-4.

The match was originally scheduled for Tuesday, but had to be re-scheduled due to rain. This obviously had no effect on the Ephs as they took all nine matches on Saturday. The Cardinals were unable to secure even one victory as player after player bowed to a Williams opponent.

Winning in singles were number one Mary Montgomery '88 by 6-2, 6-1, number two Liz Peay '87 by 6-3, 6-3, and number three, sophomore Annie Shulman, by 6-3, 6-0. The next three singles players came off with straight set victories to wrap up the triumph. Freshman Missy Crouchley continued her sterling play with a 6-0, 6-4 victory, and senior Jenni Koski lost only one game while falling 6-1, 6-0. Senior co-captain Sue Brown finished up the singles with a tight 7-6, 6-4 triumph.

The doubles teams of Geri Hugo '86-Liz Kellison '87, Debbie Bernheimer '86-Laura Rogers '86, and Cathy Paper '89-Ann Peterson '89 all won without much trouble. The Ephwomen next face Tufts, who they were supposed to play on Saturday before the rains came.

Water Polo

by Frank Vespe

There it was: the first league water polo tournament, one of two to determine which of four teams will go to the New England tournament. And one of the teams wasn't there.

No matter. Williams defeated the two remaining squads to get a leg up in the race for the two spots in the New Englands. Playing twice on Friday night, October 11, the Ephs edged Amherst, 10-9, and drubbed Trinity, 14-11 to take first place.

For the first time this season, Williams showed real balance, with no player scoring more than three goals in one game. Against Trinity, eight different players tallied, while seven players scored against Amherst.

The Amherst game was almost like two different games. The first game was three and a half quarters long, and Williams won it 10-5. The second was a mere half quarter which Amherst won by four goals, nearly stealing the victory in the process.

"Our main asset over Amherst was our speed," noted Will Andrew '86, who had three goals. Using this speed and a very tough defense, the Ephs slowly overpowered the Lord Jeffs, taking a 4-2 lead at the half which they extended to 10-5 midway through the fourth quarter.

Then Williams began to substitute, perhaps a bit too aggressively. Amherst began to press the attack and rapidly closed the gap. Williams put the starters back in, but the momentum had changed hands. Finally, Amherst scored with 20 seconds to play to make the score 10-9.

According to Andrew, "We ended up hanging on to win. We made it into a better game than it should have been."

In addition to Andrew, Chris Kirwan '87 also had three goals; while singletons were registered by Will Dudley '89, Adam Ifshin '87, John Cooke '88, and Dean Pomerleau '87.

In the Trinity game, on the other hand, there was no such drama. The Ephs took command almost from the outset and never relinquished it.

Trinity tallied first, but Williams responded with four unanswered goals. After three quarters, Williams had run up a 12-6 lead and the Ephs coasted home with the 14-11 triumph.

Goal scorers included Kirwan and Andrew with three each; Dudley and Dave Johnson '88 with two apiece; and Alex Kraus '86, Ifshin, Eric Wright '87, and Jeff Reardon '89, all with one goal.

This weekend, the Ephs, who are 5-4, will compete in the second and last league tournament, competing against Trinity, Amherst, and the U.S. Coast Guard Academy, which didn't participate in this tournament.

The event will be hosted by Amherst and played at a nearby high school because Amherst's pool burned down. A first or second place finish will assure the Ephs a spot in the New Englands.

Harriers

The women's cross-country team placed third at the Smith College Invitational on Saturday. Thirteen teams competed in the prestigious race.

Team captain Becky Conklin '87 paced the Ephwomen, placing 14th with a time of 19:29. She was followed by freshmen Jennie Garrett, turning in her best performance to date with a 17th place finish and a time of 19:47. Sarah Pierce '88, Kate Pugh '87, and Sarah Hams '89 rounded out Williams' top five in 18th, 23rd, and 49th places respectively.

Kirsten Kannengieser crossed the finish line first in 18:30 to lead Smith to the team title with 54 points. Amherst's Berit Ashla finished second in 18:40. In the team competition, Wellesley placed second with 79 points while Williams garnered 121 points for third place.

The Ephwomen's next race is the Little Three meet this Saturday at Amherst. The Eph's dual meet record stands at 2-2. The team's invitational record includes a fourth place at the NESCAC Championships and a fifth place finish at the Williams Invitaional.

Golf

by Stewart Verdery

The 1985 golf team concluded its tournament schedule with a disapointing 16th place finish at the Toski Invitational October 6-7. Held at Hickory Ridge, the competition totalled 23 squads from all divisions. Army took the team portion of the event with a two-day score of 598, and Tom Pyer of Salem St. won individual honors at 144. Salem beat Amherst by one shot to capture the Division III title.

The Ephmen came in at 654, 27 shots behind Salem St. Chas Foehl '87 shot matching 77's for 154, and Guy Kurtz '87 scored well at 79-81 (160). However, due to the absence of several top-five regulars, the team total was below usual standards. Donato Dagnoli '87 filled in at 169, and John Lapey '89 finished at 171 to round out Williams' total.

The young squad should return all of the mainstays for the grueling spring schedule

Riding

by Lisa West

The Williams riding team traveled to Mt. Holyoke College on October 6 for their first intercollegiate show in the Region III, competing against such schools as Smith, UConn, Yale, Mt. Holyoke, and Amherst.

Williams placed fifth out of 19 schools. In Advanced Walk-Trot-Canter, Jennifer Rees '86 was second, and co-captain Andrea Smith '86 was sixth; Nancy Lavin '87 was fourth on the flat and third over fences in the Novice Division; Katie Kessler '88 placed third and first in the Intermediate classes, and Lisa West '89 was second and first in another section of the same division.

Rain, mud, and more success awaited the team at UConn on October 19. Theresa Spillane '88 won Walk-Trot level 1, and co-captain Jill Smith '88 and Sara Hansen '88 were third and fifth respectively in level 2; Rees was sixth in Advanced Walk-Trot-Canter; Susan Michalski '86 placed third in Novice flat; and West won Intermediate flat.

defense outperformed Williams', Masters took the ball at midfield, and ran through the entire Dartmouth defense, before scoring

The goal fired up the whole Williams team, which played much better thereafter. With 8:21 left, Masters set up the clincher with a pass to McEvoy, who hooked a beautiful arcing shot over the goalie's outstretched hands.

The goal proved essential when, in a momentary lapse of concentration by the defense, Dartmouth's Scott Sanford headed in a bouncing shot with 2:22 left to make it 2-1. Rob Blanck '89 did a fine job in goal, and he, Masters, and McEvoy were praised by Russo. "Our defense is really tightening up, and Rob is playing very well. Today we coordinated both the defense and the offense in a very solid game," Russo said.

Quarterback Kevin Morris looks deep against Tufts on a rainy, muddy day at Weston Field. (Marcus)

Football, 2-2-1, ties Tufts 7-7

by Mark Via and Dave Paulsen

Tufts senior Bob Friedman blocked a punt by sophomore Scott Powers with 4:13 left in the game to set up the tying touchdown and give the Jumbos a 7-7 tie with the football team on Saturday at muddy Weston Field. The game set the Ephs' record at 2-2-1. Last week, the Ephs defeated Bowdoin 21-17.

Against Tufts the Ephmen opened up the scoring with 9:30 remaining in the first half, as freshman halfback Maurice Holden rumbled in from the two-yard line. His run capped an 85-yard drive which featured several key passes from senior quarterback Kevin Morris to junior tight end Jim Poulsen. Freshman Tony Fuller's point after touchdown put the Ephmen up 7-0.

The rest of the game was characterized by the Ephmen's inability to capitalize on scoring opportunities. The Eph offense moved the ball well, mostly behind Holden's 103 yards on 24 carries, including one 42 yard burst, and the precision passing of Morris to split ends Tom Goodspeed '86, John Shaw '87, and tight end Lewis Collins '88. However, Fuller missed field goal attempts of 27 and 32 yards, which came after strong drives of 66 and 41 yards respectively.

The Williams defense proves very solid, preventing the Jumbo offense from producing any sustained drives. Senior cornerback Frank Morandi played particularly well, containing the Tufts option plays and breaking up many passes. Junior linebacker Dan MacDonnell intercepted a Frank Getman pass to stifle one drive and returned it 20 yards into Jumbo territory.

Tufts, which used a fishbone offense, could not generate much offensive but was able to convert on the blocked punt. The Jumbos took over the ball on the Williams two, and on the first play from scrimmage, running back Paul Dressens plunged in for the score.

Last-minute heroics

Last Saturday, senior defensive back Jeff Lilley '86 intercepted a Bowdoin pass in the end zone to quell a late rally as the squad defeated the Polar Bears 21-17. Lilley's heroics came with 1:09 left in the game and Bowdoin threatening to score from the Williams three yard line.

Bowdoin's Ed McGowan started off the scoring in the game with a 32-yard field goal on the first play of the second quarter. Williams bounced back with two touchdowns in 13 seconds. First, freshman Maurice Holden scored on a 29-yard scamper set up by a short Bowdoin punt. The Polar Bears fumbled the ensuing kickoff and Eric Churchill '88 recovered on the 14-yard line. Morris then connected with tight end Collins in the end zone.

Soccer blasts Tufts 4-0 to win seventh straight

by Greg Leeds

The men's soccer team won four straight games over the past two weeks, extending their string of victories to seven since starting out 0-1-1. Fullback Mike Masters '89 scored four goals in the four games, and Denny Wright '87 had three.

On Saturday the Ephmen trounced Tufts 4-0 in a rain-drenched game at Cole Field. Masters scored twice in less than a minute, and Eric Von Estorff '87 and Wright also scored.

Von Estorff tallied first for the Ephs at 23:20 into the first period, pushing in a pass from Clark Otley '86. Two minutes later Jon Deveaux '87 gave the ball to Wright, who pounded it in to make it 2-0.

Masters got his first goal off a direct kick, placing it perfectly in the left upper corner of the goal. The ball hit both the crossbar and the left post, and bounced into the net. Fifty three seconds later, Nikolai Nachamkin '88 passed to Masters, who blasted a shot in from the front of the goal.

The Jumbo defense tightened up during the second half, denying the Ephs any further goals. Williams controlled the entire game, however, and outshot Tufts 18-8. Brad Bryan '87 had a fine game in goal and made an excellent save towards the end of the game, diving on a close-in shot to preserve his shutout.

Comeback to nip Bates

On Tuesday Williams came from behind, and defeated Bates 3-2 with Wright scoring the winning goal. Bates went ahead by two goals, but Mike Morris '88 and co-captain Jeff McEvoy '86 each scored before Wright put in the clincher.

The Ephmen defeated both Bowdoin and Division I Dartmouth the previous week. On October 12, they easily beat Bowdoin, 4-0, in a match that was entirely controlled by Williams. Unlike previous games, the Ephs were able to score early, which gave them the advantage from the start of the match. Just 5:37 into the first period, Nachamkin scored with an assist from Scott Walker '87, beating goalkeeper Ian Torney with a hard, low drive. Wright scored eleven minutes later with another low shot off a pass from co-captain Mark Schroeder '86.

The highlight of the game was the next goal, put in by Otley with Wright assisting at 29:45 in the first half. Wright threw the ball in to Otley who raced three-fourths of the field down the sideline, blowing past every Bowdoin defender, and finally drilling the ball past the astonished Torney.

In the second half, Masters increased the margin to four, blasting in a shot off a restart of a direct kick right in front of the goal.

Earlier that week the Ephs beat Dartmouth 2-1 with goals by McEvoy and Masters. After a scoreless first half controlled largely by Dartmouth, whose

Runners second in NESCACs

by Carter Zinn

The men's cross-country team highlighted a busy two weeks of competition by taking second at the NESCAC championships held on October 12. Williams hosted the meet on a new course which winds through the grounds of Mount Hope Farm, and the clear sky and spectacular views of the course made it an ideal day for both runners and spectators.

The team responded well. John Ellison '86 continued his awesome performance this season by finishing fourth in the 72 man field in 26:10, a fast time over the tough, hilly terrain. Dave Grossman '87 turned in a characteristically gutsy performance to finish eigth, completing the five miles in 26:41.

TJ Lydon '86 and Tom Pingree '86 held off two Colby runners in the final downhill stretch of the course, finishing 27th and 28th respectively. Jon Fisher '87 wrapped up the second place for Williams ten seconds later, taking 32nd overall. Ed Tonelli '86 and David Sprague '87 were also part of the strong team performance, taking 39th and 43rd respectively.

The perenially strong Bates team conquered the eleven team field with 39 points, followed by Williams with 99, Colby with 104, and Amherst with 128. Wesleyan finished ninth with 187 points.

On october 19th, Williams did not fare quite as well on their muddy home course against New England's top-ranked MIT and Tufts. The JV finished second to MIT with Andre Lopez '87, Tim Pittman '86, and Alan Beishaw '89 finishing fifth, sixth, and seventh respectively.

Varsity falls to Tufts and MIT

With the NESCAC runners sitting out, the Varsity fell to both Tufts and MIT. The Varsity team score was MIT 15, Tufts 58, and Williams 66. Ted Arrowsmith '88, who has suffered all season from a knee injury, came off it in impressive fasion, finishing 11th overall behind a solid pack of MIT runners. Tonelli '86 and Mark Gilrain '87 both ran well to finish 12th and 16th respectively. Ian Brzezenski '86 and Dave Prockop '87 rounded out the top five.

On October 8, the team trounced North Adams at home 15 to 50. The Eph runners swept the top seven spots, with a strong performance by Brzeznski who won the race in 26:50. The sweep was completed by John Servin '88, Mac Hines '88, Terry Hults '88, and Gilrain.

On October 5, Williams started their winning ways as they sent a squad to the Greenfield Invitational and won the meet with a total of 26 points. Hines and Prockop tied for third, Tom Fitzgibbon '87 came in sixth, John Phay '87 come in eigth, and Dave Glendon '88 came in 12th.

With the Little Three Championships coming this Saturday, the Ephs are looking to return the title to its rightful spot in the purple valley and thus begin a new era of Williams cross-country dominance.

Berkshire overcome by Ruggers

by Mike Curtin

With less than three minutes to go in the finals, the rugby club snatched victory from the jaws of defeat. By pushing across three trys and converting on two of them, the Ephs stunned their opponents and amazed the spectators with a 19-13 come-from-behind victory, thus winning the Berkshire tournament for the second consecutive year.

Although every rugby win or loss is a team effort, Saturday's game saw an amazing individual effort by junior winger Mark Tompkins. Deprived of the ball most of the final game because of sloppy field conditions and heavy kicking, Berkshire was unaware of this outside threat. Williams, weary from their first two games of the day and perhaps a bit overconfident because of last week's three game sweep of Yale, was not playing the kind of poised and intelligent rugby that has become their hallmark.

Except for a penalty kick by Tim Latimore '86, all of the scoring in the first half was Berkshire's, as they scored 13. Each club held the other at bay until four minutes were left in the game. Williams was down by ten and the championship and their pride was on the line.

Williams was threatening to score, but Berkshire touched the ball down in their own try zone and was awarded a 22-meter drop out. But then the line started running and passing with precision and zeal; the pack ran fast and pursued hard; the team was working as a unit. Williams pushed the ball down deep into Berkshire territory.

Junior wing Mark Thompkins fights through the Berkshire defense. He scored twice in the game and led Williams to a come from behind win 19-13 to capture the Berkshire Tournament. (Mead)

Line captain Ed O'Toole '86 set a ruck on the five-meter line which was supported by the entire scrum. Working together, seniors Tim Faselt and John Fetteroif got the ball out to Brad Bisseli '86 who rambled towards the try zone dishing the ball off to Tompkins, who scooted past two more Berkshire defenders for his first score.

Crazed determination

Two minutes and fifty-three seconds remained the score was Berkshire 13, Williams 7. Berkshire kicked off. The Ephs fielded the ball and quickly had it out to Tompkins on the wing who was on his own 22-meter line. With a look of crazed determination in his eyes, Tompkins went to work. He juked two Berkshire defenders and outran the rest on his seventy-meter sprint which brought Williams to within two. Tim Latimore converted and with less than a minute to go, the score was tied.

Frustrated, but banking on an overtime, Berkshire kicked off. Once again heads up kicking by Craig Kirby '86 and scrum pursuit under the guidance of scrum-half Greg Bronson '86 got the ball deep in Berkshire territory. Fullback Chris Toll '86 squibbed the ball into the Berkshire try zone. It looked as if Berkshire would get it, but the ball bounced away from the Berkshire player and Steve Troyer'86 punced on it for the score. Latimore kicked the conversion, and as the refcree lifted his hand to signal the kick was good, he blew the whistle ending the game. In less than three minutes, Williams had scored sixteen points.

En route to this championship game, Williams shut out Albany Law and Worcester. In the first game against Albany Law,

Security plan garners support

by John Felkner

At its meeting last week, the Committee on Undergraduate Life added its stamp of approval to a College Council proposal for a new method for paying security officers at house parties.

The proposal asks that the College administration pay for seeurity at parties, with the source of the money as yet undetermined. The proposal points out that under the present party policy, which requires that the individual houses hire security personnei, variable hourly wages for security personnei make it nearly impossible for house officers to estimate party costs.

Taking the hiring responsibility away from the individuai houses would eliminate paperwork and encourage houses to spend funds on improving the party atmosphere, according to the proposal. Professor David Ross explained, "We want to improve the feeling among houses. We want a better feeling of equity because some houses feel that they are somewhat unfairly burdened under the current system."

Assistant Dean William Darrow proposed that the house maintenance tax be raised by $10 for each student to provide money to pay for security. CUL Chairman Michael Bell said, however, the security funds should come out of general administration funds because, "It is proper that the College provide security for social events taking place on its campus."

The CUL approved the proposai, indicating a preferenee that the money come out of generai funds.

Log idea

The CUL discussed three other matters as well: the Log Committee proposal passed by the College Council Last week; the system of student bartending at partics; and clean-up procedures after dining-hall parties.

The CUL was generally in support of the Log proposal, aceording to Bell. Suzanne Biemuller '87, said, "The two-drink limit just isn't working. We eould ask for a four- or six-drink ilmit, but we're still dilly-dallying. Even after 6 beers, people still will resent being told they can't drink."

Henry Kim '86, said, "Eliminating the drinking limit will at least bring down seniors, and the most important thing we can do for the Log is to attract people."

Implementing a system of student bartending in which trained students bartend at parties, serving alcoholic beverages only to those of legal age, might decreasc the College's liability for incidents at parties.

The committee discussed how a student would indicate to the bartender that he was of legal agc, considering several options, including hand-stamping and special tickets or cards. Darrow pointed out he had encountered little opposition to this idea when he menti-

Stable condition

Bates' dean shot in back

by Virginia Demaree

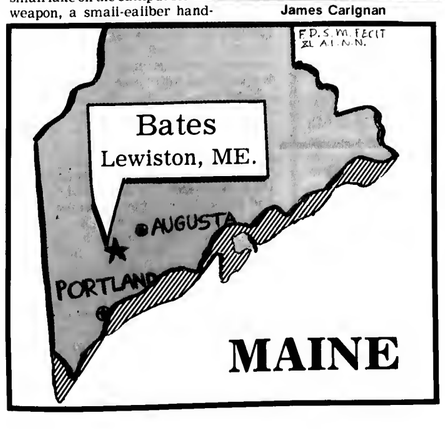
The uproar at Bates College caused by the Oct. 21 shooting of Dean James W. Carignan has subsided, although no arrest has been made and police remain close-mouthed about the investigation.

Carignan, a dean at the Lewiston, Maine college since 1970, was shot in the back early iast Monday evening as he sat in the kitchen of his home on the edge of the Bates campus, according to the Boston Globe. Carignan's 12 year-old daughter, who had been in another room at the time of the shooting, ealled the police, the Globe said.

Carignan is now in satisfactory and stable condition at Central Maine Medical Center, said Stuart C. Greene, direetor of the news bureau at Bates. Greene would not say whether Carignan had yet undergone surgery to remove fragments of a hollow-tipped bullet, designed to shatter upon impaet.

As of late Saturday, police divers eontinued to search a small lake on the campus for the weapon, a small-ealiber handgun, aceording to Karen Elias, news editor of the Bates Student.

One Bates student was questioned the night of the shooting but released, Elias said, and police now say the student is not a suspect.



Possible motives

Rumors on campus suggest motives for the shooting may involve Carignan's role as a discipiinarian on campus and as a

Parents Weekend panel plugs Arts

by John Faust

Six Williams students stressed that, in looking for a summer job, a liberal arts background is often more important than specific vocational skills in "Using Your Liberal Arts Experienee," a panel held Saturday at the Offiee of Career Counseling.

OCC Summer Job Coordinator Peggy Williams and students Chris McGuire '86, Cheryl Saiem '87, Debra Humphreys '86, Chris Strear '87, David Santis '86 and Meg Wildrick '86 described summer job opportunities available to students using liberal arts experiences.

Wildrick, an English and French double major, deseribed her internship with Time Inc., where she worked as a research reporter for Fortune magazine. One of 18 interns chosen from 30 top sehools nationwide, Wildrick pointed out that while financial awareness is important, her company ultimately seeks those who can think, analyze and learn. These are abilities, she said, developed by a liberal arts education. In particular, Wildrick noted the good pay and immediate responsibility given her as an intern. "They treat you very, very well," she said.

Political science major McGuire spoke of his work with the Senate Democratic Policy Committee in Washington, D.C., made possible by the Mead Fund, which financially assists government-oriented students from all majors. McGuire was willing to work without pay, which, he said, "opens a lot of doors." He said that he found his experience valuable in that he was allowed

by R.P. DeMott

A Williams student was struek by an automobile early Friday morning. Jocelyn Shadforth '88, was crossing Main Street on her way to work in Baxter Hall when she was hit by a car travelling east.

Shadforth was transported to the North Adams Regional Hospital and spent the night under observation in the Intensive Care Unit. She was released on Saturday.

Dr. James Corkins, Director of Health Services at Williams stitched a laceration on her sealp and treated her for a concussion, aeeording to Shadforth. She also received multiple scrapes and bruises from the accident.

Around 7:20 A.M., Shadforth said she was crossing Main Street, Massachusetts Route 2, just north of East College walking towards Griffin Hall. "I looked and saw a car near the intersection of Spring Street, usually far enough away to cross. Then there was the sound of squealing brakes and a blowing horn. The next thing I remember I was waking up," she said.

Shadforth regained consciousness at the scene of the accident and was taken to the hospital by the Village Ambulanee Serviee.

No fault

The car invoived, a 1974 AMC, was driven by Gary L. Thompson of Cobbleview Road, Williamstown. Thompson reported no damage to his car and no eharges were filed in the case, according to Police Chief Joseph Zoito. Zoito added that no fault had been aseribed to the driver.

"Three witnesses state that she walked in front of the car," Zoito said, recalling information from statements filed by the witnesses. The witnesses' statements were not available as of Monday.

Thompson's statement claims that Shadforth stepped "immediately in front of the vehicle and was struck by the right front fender." Zoito said that he thought traffic had come to a stop just prior to the accident and had begun to move again when Shadforth stepped into the street. He said that the second car in the line of traffic was that driven by Thompson.

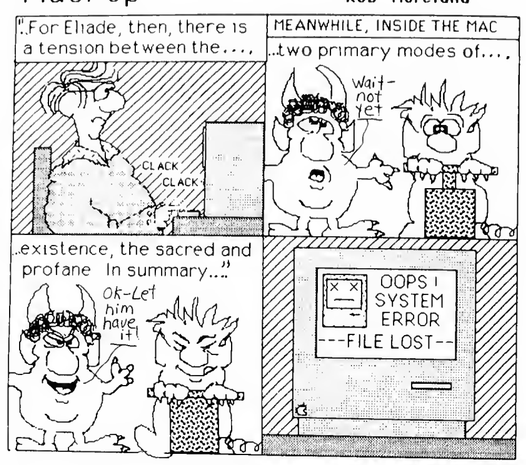
Double Jeopardy



House officers get understandably upset over the way Williams handles security at parties. While College security officers are supposedly there to ensure that nothing is destroyed and that parties remain orderly, it is the house which is billed if something gets broken, and house officers who are liable if someone is hurt. It seems that the guards' primary functions are to keep people out when the building gets full and turn off the music when the clock strikes one.

The most glaring inconsistency in the College's system is that the houses must pay twice for any damages. Although guards are supposed to be preventing damage, the houses must pay for repairs. The fee for guards is about $150 per party (depending on how many guards are needed and whether they are students or full-time employees); damage charges can be even higher, and houses must pay both if anything is broken.

Recently, however, the Committee on Undergraduate Life voiced its support for a new plan by which individual houses would not pay for security. Dean Darrow has suggested that the money instead come from a $10 per student tax, which would be added to the College's security fund. Monetarily, the burden on each student would not be very great, and house dues might decrease as a result of cheaper parties.

This plan would also solve the problem of certain houses carrying more of the financial burden for campus social life than others. Rather than one house paying for many parties which are attended by residents of other houses, everyone would be contributing to all parties. Finally, the question of liability would be solved once and for all: If the guards are employed by the College and paid for by the College, it becomes clear who should pay for repairs if the guards do not prevent damage. The College should!

Letters

Not so distant

To The Editor:

I realize that a Student Aetivities Tax of $73 per student does not eover all the requests student organizations have, and that if we do not want to have deficit spending—like the US government—we must cut some requests or raise additional funds.

However, David Applebaum's quote, that "(the Disarmament Forum) presents an opinion to the eampus whieh is not really relevant," appears to be saying something beyond the realities of limited funding.

The issue of nuelear disarmament may seem distant. After all, a nuclear missile is not going to blast off from the Science Quad. For that matter, Williamstown is not exaetly a prime target for nuclear attack.

Nonetheless this apparent distanee does not necessarily imply irrelevance. Some students, espeeially Division III majors, might find themselves involved in designing nuclear weapons systems and may want to express concerns about such potential involvement. Many students will pay taxes, of whieh a not unsubstantial portion may go to nuclear weapons, and partieipate in elections for representatives who decide whether nuclear weapons should be built or dismantled. All students, if nuclear weapons are indeed used and if the nuclear weapons explode near them, will die as a result.

Let me present a specific situation illustrating the relevance of the Disarmament Forum. An analogy has appeared on several oeeasions between the Strategic Defense Initiative ("Star Wars") and the Maginot Line, which the French thought would make themselves secure against German invasion but was instead rendered useless in 1940 by relatively easy countermeasures. A senior fellow at the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton, former US president Jimmy Carter, and British foreign seeretary Sir Geoffrey Howe (not exaetly your typical liberal) all have brought up this analogy. In a letter published in The Christian Science Monitor I also brought it up, in part as a result of a lecture about "Star Wars" eo-sponsored by the Disarmament Forum two years ago. That this oeeurred long before I heard of Carter's or Howe's use of this analogy says something about the Disarmament Forum's ability to bring out concerns about some major issues.

In short, I do not dismiss the Disarmament Forum as "not really relevant." Instead, I welcome it as an opportunity to keep us thinking about some important national and international issues on a eampus where eontact with world news is normally much too searce.

Uniformity

To the Editor:

It's eome to our attention that B&G plans to require that all building maintenance staff wear uniforms. We see no need for this, and eonsider it to be inappropriate. Forcing the staff to wear uniforms eould give the message that they are valued only for the work they do, and not for who they are. Discussions with staff suggest an intense dislike for this proposal. This also illustrates the fact that the staff should have more of a say in their working conditions and environment.

Ostensibly the uniforms will simply identify the maintenance staff as such. All staff already earry identifieation eards. It seems to us, however, that this is an unealled for taetic of labor eontrol. Surely name tags would identify staff and yet not depersonalize the people wearing them in the same way.

If uniforms are an attempt to simply provide working elothes for staff, then perhaps there is a better way to use the money ($30,000) presently allocated for uniforms. Why not direet it to the staff people themselves in the form of funds to purchase their own working elothes?

We as students would like to call upon others here to support the staff. We must realize that this eommunity of whieh we are a part is also an employer with eertain basic responsibilities to its employees.

Relevant?

To The Editor:

In the Record of October 22, the Treasurer of the College Council is quoted as stating that "(The Disarmament Forum) presents an opinion to the campus whieh is not really relevant." First, the Forum does not present a single opinion. Seeond, what campus activity could be more relevant and timely than promoting information about the military objectives and programs of the Reagan Administration, and diseussion of alternatives?

A New York Times front page headline (Friday, October 25th) reads "US Offieials Reveal Disunity on Arms Goals". Decisions made in the next few months may very well affect the future quality of life on this and other campuses. Is there no better way to spend $25 billion for National Seeurity than by initiating a program whieh extends military competition to space-based battle stations?

Fear, not courage

To The Editor:

Although the Record is usually not a forum for foreign affairs, Mr. Brainard's letter of commendation to the Italian government needs a response. International law, sinee it lacks an enforeement mechanism, provides guidelines on how a nation should aet. Regrettably, nations are not saints, they follow their own seeular interests. More importantly, international law just does not work effectively against terrorism; only countries together and individually ean stop terrorism. Obviously, Mr. Brainard does not agree with this view. Fine. The world is big enough for disagreement.

However, despite Mr. Brainard's views, a respect for international law was not foremost in the Italian government's mind. More likely, they were worried that some armed thugs, naturally a disavowed splinter group of the PLO, would kidnap a number of Italians and demand Abul Abbas in return. Fear, not "the eourage to aet according to (its) own (conseience)" motivated the Italian government. Notice that the Craxi government has collapsed, hardly a sign of public support.

It occurs to me that Mr. Brainard's letter was intelleetual bait, intended only to provoke a heated response. If so, I regret that this letter is not more biting. If his letter was sincere, I present an opposing view.

Reasons behind "fiscal anguish"

by Paul J. Mahoney

At the risk of incurring the wrath of many sincere and well-intentioned student organizations, I would like to offer a personal re-examination of the College Council budget and its evaluation by the Finance Committee, since this year's process has caused a considerable amount of fiscal anguish.

My first point concerns the word "need", as in last week's Record: "Organizations request the money they need to cover the coming academic year..." I would argue that this usage represents a common misconception of the nature of funding and the role of groups in undergraduate life. A very few groups "need" any money for nominal existence. Funding comes in, for the most part, to provide activities that enlarge their sphere of activity and increase their ability to provide outlets for student participation. Therefore, this is not necessarily money they "need", but rather money they "would like" to have.

Does every group have the right to whatever funding it wishes? Of course not, and College Council Funding Guidelines set parameters for allocating this resource. One point is very clear: new groups "shall be given equal status to traditional allocation requests." It follows that when there are a significant number of new requests, or radical restructuring of older organizations, coupled with no real increase in Student Activity Tax revenues, older groups should not be surprised if their "traditional" allocations are cut. Cuts are "really justified," for it would be nice if groups could rely on consistent budgets, but equity requires more flexibility.

In any case, it can be said that student groups should rely heavily on their own members for the activity of the organization, and not primarily on the wisdom, experience and demonstration of successive speakers and films. Speaker and film requests were grossly overinflated this year. If the only purpose of groups is to bring outside opinions and energy, then the term "Student Activity" loses a great deal of definition. As an example, a "Williams College Druid Association" could request $5000 for films on Stonehenge and speakers on religious horticulture in 5th century Ireland, yet it could easily exist without any level of funding approximating that. Any money granted would merely enhance activity, and its own perception of its importance to the campus, without being integral to any real purpose. However, I am sure the Druids would like to get whatever money they could get past FinCom. Similarly, students opposed to nuclear weapons could make their point just as effectively with 5 speakers instead of 10, or 20, without damaging the presentation of their viewpoint. The concern of Williams students over nuclear war would not disappear; if it did perhaps there would be no point in educating us anyway.

The most revealing point about the superficiality of many funding requests comes from club officers themselves, as almost every speaker request is accompanied by "Please give us the money, because if we can't get so-and-so, we'll just get someone else." Exactly. If speakers are interchangeable, it leads one to think that the point is really to get "airtime", and not to hear cohesive presentations of views. The Guidelines tell us to take into account the "specificity of the proposed allocation." If it does not matter to groups who speaks for them, why should it matter to the College whether the event is presented at all? Any group could present a list of hundreds of speakers, all of whom would be edifying, entertaining and extremely pertinent to current issues. But, does tiny Williams College need 20 speakers on any one subject? There is such a thing as intellectual overkill.

Treasurer David Applebaum has taken criticism for noting that certain issues lack relevance. Rather, I would say that in this environment, most issues have relevance, some relating to the future of the world, and others with pre-Apocalyptical matters. If a group is cut, but still allowed an ample voice, have any moral precepts been violated? Have we failed in our duty if one group is cut, even in half, so that others get a chance at the "hearts and minds" of students? I would think that we were taking ourselves much too seriously if we said we had. Our purpose is not to further the private aims of individuals. It is to facilitate the expression of Williams student interests, year-by-year, as indicated by funding requests. It is not our purpose to convince that one topic has more merit than another. We do a disservice if we limit the scope of student activity to maintain "traditional" funding levels. Students committed to a liberal arts education should not begrudge each other the opportunity to express themselves merely to increase the scope of a more personal concern. That flies in the face of the old standby justification of "the benefit of the campus as a whole."

When I say this, I realize that few groups, if given the choice, would cut funding to others (indeed, many have stated that in a pinch, the money should go to someone else). We are, however, in a pinch, and that is exactly what they do when they create protracted fights over allocations. Unlike the federal government, College Council must work within a limited budget, and five speakers going to one organization means that five less go to others. Inflated and fantastical budgets cry out for cutting because they represent ignorance of the pursuit of student concerns.

Without sounding the harsh notes of reality any louder, I must point out that this is Williams College, not the wide, wide, world. It is our option to attend this school, our choice to join or organize a group, and almost whim or personal desire in planning events. There are limitations and conflicting goals that the Finance Committee endeavors in reasonably good faith to balance. It is human to be disappointed when one's desires are frustrated, but we must try to accomplish our collective purposes, as a college of students, not of competing individuals.

Misperceptions confuse debate

by David Applebaum

Last week's Record article reviewing the College Council allocation process contained several factual reporting errors, and even more importantly, it failed to relate the real issues and problems presented by this year's budget. Over the past few years, the College Council has made great strides toward becoming a more represenatative voice for the students and their concerns as well as a more respected and influential power in the eyes of the administration. However, a misleading article such as this one creates misperceptions about the College Council amongst both students and the administration, and certainly weakens or harms our relationship with both groups.

Unfortunately, the numerous innacurate statements have been a cause of concern for those involved and for the campus as a whole. The Feminist Alliance's reduced budget recommendation did not elminate a rape crisis center. As was mutually recognized by the leaders of the Feminist Alliance and by myself as treasurer, the C.C. meeting was the first time such a service had been proposed. Surely, the Finance Committee cannot recommend funding for plans that do not exist at the time of decision making. Secondly, I have large doubts about the quote attributed to me concerning the Disarmament Forum. If those were my exact words then they were certainly presented out of context because I honestly do not believe them. The Disarmament Forum definitely presents a valid opinion to the campus and informs interested people about issues of topical concern. Thirdly, I never raised the possibility of the Literary Review's seeking funds from Alumni. This question was in fact asked by another member of C.C., and I was quite prepared to reinforce Ms. Perkins response that this is not an acceptable practice. Lastly, the quote by Vice President Amy Jeffress did in fact provide a much needed moment of comic relief during an otherwise long and tense debate. It was never intended as a serious comment and certainly does not need to be reported as a newsworthy event. I sincerely hope the Record did not view it as such, and I hope those who read the article did not construe it as a serious remark. These inaccuracies only serve to make the issues and problems of the allocation process more difficult to understand.

Even more importantly, the Record article did not objectively focus on the issues of the budget itself. The entire article seemed to be written with the attitude that C.C. and FinCom were on a campaign to reduce funding and hinder the operation of selected groups. Nothing could be further from the truth! As I stated in my introductory remarks preceeding the budget, "We (FinCom) have done our best to distribute funds equitably. We have allocated funds so as to insure the maximum benefit to the largest number of students while still guaranteeing a forum for diversity and certain individual concerns." In trying to accomplish this distribution FinCom met in excess of 30 hours over a two week period after consulting with all student groups. As was mentioned, requests exceeded available funds by over $70,000, so we obviously had a difficult task. Considering these stringent constraints, I believe the budget has been allocated with all fairness. What the Record does not mention is that only 20 out of 65 groups receved any increase in funding at all and of these, only four were increases of greater than $500. Three of these four groups were communications groups including the Williams Record, which received the largest numerical increase of any group. Because of certain internal and external factors, C.C. and FinCom deemed these appropriations to be justified.

The Record focused on cuts made to those groups discussed at the C.C. meeting and gave no indication that the vast majority of organiztions faced a similar fate, nor did they reveal and stress why the reductions were necessary. Finance Committee and College Council operated under tight constraints, and the burdens were fairly distributed, not placed upon a dozen singled out groups. I hope in the future the Record will be a little less selective and a lot more responsible with the facts it chooses to print. Furthermore, I would hope that any individual on this campus who has questions about events reported or replied to in the Record would not hesitate to discuss these concerns with any C.C. member.

South Africa Coalition's self-righteous stance

by Charles P. Goodwin

The Coalition for a Free South Africa is almost less disturbing for its apocryphal stance on South Africa as it is for its silent position on campus debate. When Dave Walters says "We are not trying to instigate a debate to respark the issue (or) become a forum for one," he is denying the democratic process on a blantantly political issue.

To debate, to open oneself and one's conviction to scrutiny, and to scrutinize others and their positions is the heart of both democracy and the Liberal Arts. A reluctance to enter into such a process—especially on an issue such as South Africa—shows an undemocratic sentiment. Williams College exists to challenge one's preconvictions not to give one the tools to justify them.

When the leaders of Black South Africa speak overwhelmingly for the nations of this world to condemn apartheid through economic sanction, one wonders how the Coalition for a Free South Africa can speak for Black South Africa.

It is a sign of hubris that a group of students in a predominantly white, cloistered liberal arts college can think that they know what is best for South Africa.

Nothing could conceiveably be more self-righteous.

The leaders of Black South Africa must take the lead, for they know what is best for the people. It is our role to listen, to debate upon our actions, to ressolve, and to act.

Microeconomics tells us that corporations are interested in profits and that if the market worked as it should, this would lead to social optimality. Apartheid is a political externality which allows corporations to enhance their profits by partaking in racism. To rectify this situation, we, as people who have an exogenous preference for justice and human equality, must bring market pressure upon South Africa and corporations doing business there. We must take the profit out of apartheid. This may be done through the humiliation of divestment, through public denouncement, and through the boycott.

Change will come to South Africa. Apartheid cannot last. The longer change is postponed, the greater the tendency for an outright revolution for an oppressive, perhaps, Lenninist, perhaps fascist dictatorship. Appealing to the conservative's instincts, the United States does not need another Iran, especially an "Iran" whose vital resources are found in large quantity in only one other nation, the Soviet Union.

On one point, the Coalition for a Free South Africa is right. Too many people have signed a petition, held a poster, or chanted a slogan, and then gone to sleep. If we are to be a moral community, if we have any conscience, we must continue to aid and support South Africa's Blacks as they struggle for justice.

I hope that Mr. Walters and his anonymous followers will consider the enormity of their position and change their minds. I appeal to them to put aside their fear of change and to accept the choice that their consciences dictate.

If they have made the right choice, they should not be afraid to stand publicly by their convictions.

Purple Valley Blues: More juniors go away

by Harwell Wells

More students than ever before are spending some part of their junior year away from Williams, according to Assistant Dean Sheila Spear. Students' reasons for this mass exodus range from just wanting a change to "They can't stand it here," Spear said.

Spear, who is in charge of advising students hoping to study away or abroad, said, "The number (of students going) away has increased every year," but she expects a plateau will be reached soon at about 200 students each year.

Two reasons more students have wanted to go abroad recently, Spear said, are the exceptionally strong dollar of the last couple of years and the feeling of many students that this is their last chance to go abroad. Spear said, however, she thinks students are wrong to believe that.

Spear pointed out that the number of college students going abroad in general has been rising, and, "For the first time, our students are getting turned down by programs" that formerly accepted all Williams applicants.

Questioning culture

Spear has several goals for students who go abroad. She said she hopes, "to see people (who go abroad) prepared well as students and guests of another culture." She said she also hopes students would "question their culture and learn about the differences."

Dorothea Hanson, who coordinates the Weston Study Abroad Center, said that the study abroad programs have attracted more than one-fourth of each junior class. Hanson said that a majority of the people gone for a semester or year, "say they should have gone away for a year."

In explaining the larger number of students going away, She said that Third-World programs are enjoying an increased popularity and that overseas "Pre-med and science possibilities are getting a lot better."

Ned Ladd '86 spent a semester studying physics at Berkeley. "I still like Williams a lot, but I wanted to get away. Four years is a long time to spend in the same place," he said. Ladd said he chose Berkeley because of its difference from Williams. "I went to as foreign a place as I could think of," he said, characterizing Berkeley as a place in which students are more faceless.

Appreciation of Williams

In leaving Williams, "You have to prove yourself all over again," Ladd said. "Berkeley is one of the best physics places in the country, and it became more obvious I had gotten a good education (at Williams) from my good Berkeley grades."

Bruce Bullock '86, who spent the spring of 1985 studying film at Loyola of Los Angeles, said he wanted to study film in more depth than he could at Williams. "I thought it would be fun," he said.

Debra Humphreys '86, who studied film at Columbia last spring, said she felt studying in New York was a wonderful experience. Humphreys said in addition to studying film, dissatisfaction with Williams was a factor in her decision. "I very much wanted to be away," she said, adding that she "even considered transferring."

Humphreys said she thought by being new to Columbia she would, "see the good and overlook the bad parts," of the school, as well as appreciate Williams more. She said she did enjoy Columbia and "I didn't miss anything about Williams at all."

Howland relates trauma of college days

by Debbie Snyder

In a talk designed to discuss some common problems among students and also give Williams' psychological services exposure, John Howland, M.D., director of Psychological Services, spoke last Wednesday on "Coming of Age at Williams: Common Developmental and Clinical Issues in College Students."

Howland said he wanted to, "Make it (the Health Services Center) so it's not misperceived. Teach people about important issues and increase the center's accessibility. And that happens if the staff is visible." He said he is concerned that many students are unaware of existence of Psychological Services, and that those who do know about it think it is only for very sick people.

Howland stressed that every 20 years a person goes through a major transitional period, and one of those periods occurs when a person is between 18 and 22 years old. Three crises, related to issues of identity, autonomy and intimacy arise from this change, he said. Certain symptoms of these issues, such as separation anxiety or weight problems, are particular to a college environment, Howland said, explaining that these symptoms are usually worst in the freshman and sophomore years.

The issues of identity get mixed up with sexuality so that people say they do not have time to get involved in a relationship, Howland said. "People come in to the office and say, 'I don't know who I am,'" he said, commenting that this is a legitimate problem.

Communication

Howland also stressed the importance of communicating one's problems to someone else. "One thing that helps is articulating what's wrong," he said, adding that the listener does not have to be a psychologist.

Students said they recognize the changes mentioned in the program. Robin Flagg '86 said, "You do have to make an adjustment but not necessarily in a negative sense. People are there for friends who can't make it on their own."

Having observed students for many years, part of the time as a freshman advisor, Head Reference Librarian Sarah McFarland also said she recognizes problems for students that are acquired at Williams and problems that are brought with them. "I see kids that are depressed, who can't get motivated to study and who have problems with social relationships," McFarland said.

McFarland said she feels problems based on adjustment go away as students adapt to Williams but that the problems students bring with them from home may remain. Commenting on the College's role in helping students with their problems, she said, "The College has brought in more psychologists, and they are meeting with the JA's, but they could do more."

close contact with major decision makers.

Non-traditional jobs

Salem, a French major, spent her summer as head cook at Putnam Camp in New York's Adirondacks, where she was responsible for coordinating meals on a large scale. She stressed OCC's role in helping her find the job and pointed out that the office has more to offer than traditional internships.

Strear, a pre-med chemistry and English major, outlined OCC's shadow program, a plan allowing students to follow an alumnus through all phases of is job. Strear spoke of his time in the program, spent at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute, as "an amazing experience. It solidified my desire to be a doctor."

Humphreys, an art history major, worked at Michael Blackwood Productions and at WNYC-TV in New York City. She said that in most cases, the choice of major is unimportant and that a definite decision with regard to careers in not particularly necessary. "There's no reason why you should know what you're going to do," she said.

A liberal arts experience in any major creates a lot of options, Humphreys said, but she added that finding jobs can be difficult. "It's very time consuming, and it can be frustrating, but these things really do pay off," she said. "You find out what you like and what you do well."

Name packs punch

Santis said that his skills as a psychology major were more important than business skills in his capacity as staff supervisor for the customer education department of AT&T in New Jersey. The business world, he said, looks for those who can think and write clearly and is turning to liberal arts students. It is for this reason, he said, that the Williams' name carries a great deal of weight there.

"Students don't have to be anxious about what they are going to do," Williams added. "They should enjoy it here and take courses because they like them and really want to learn. That's what liberal arts is all about."

mediator in labor disputes in Maine, Elias said. Carignan had recently helped negotiate a settlement in a strike at the Bath Iron Works, she said. "The first day, there were all sorts of rumors," Elias said. "Once it appeared he would be OK, the shock wore off."

"Everyone is very in the dark," said Cathy Squires, a sophomore at Bates. "There's been a lot of speculation and rumors, with a hesitation to believe anything." Squires said that Bates students seem convinced the assailant was not a student. "People are saying, 'Who would shoot the dean?'" she said. "It's too hard to imagine."

Elias said that Carignan is well liked at Bates. "The improvements and increase in the college's rating since 1970 have been a lot of his doing," she said.

Police have been swarming the campus since the shooting, Elias said, and the assistant deans have had bodyguards. "We have added no additional Bates security, but there has been an increased police presence on campus in conjunction with the investigation," Greene said.

Bates President Thomas Hedley Reynolds told the Boston Globe the shooting was very unusual. "Even during the really rough times of the 1960s, I don't know of a dean who was shot at," he said.

Profile: Sex prof Virginia Greendlinger

by Kathi Rosenbaum

She's been jokingly referred to as "the Dr. Ruth of Williams College." Dr. Virginia Greendlinger's role here, however, is not that of sex therapist; instead, she is professor of the first human sexuality course ever offered by the Williams psychology department.

Greendlinger noted that despite the ground-breaking nature of the course, "I've had support and extreme cooperation from everyone in the psychology department and I've been given complete latitude regarding lecture material, class films, etc."

Although they may not be representative of the Williams student population as a whole, "the students in my Human Sexuality class appear to be interested in the psychology of relationships and intimacy," Greendlinger observed. "I get the feeling from students that they want to know more, and they're asking a lot of unanswerable questions."

Greendlinger, a social psychologist, is at Williams as a visiting professor for only this year; she was in private practice for ten years before receiving her doctoral degree from SUNY Albany in 1985, where she also taught for two years.

Of the Williams students she has come into contact with thus far, Greendlinger remarked, "They are very much like students at other universities in their sexual identities and behaviors; they are also more responsible than other students and I have more respect for the maturity level of Williams students compared to that of students at other schools."

She added, however, "Williams students tend to view the College as a moralistic place and sometimes tend to hide their sexual needs, such as by sublimating them through studying."

Greendlinger also believes that the location of Williams itself can affect sexual norms on campus, and noted, "The geographic isolation of Williams has a stultifying effect on students' sexual attitudes and behaviors."

Research on coercive sex

A startling statistic pertaining to college males spurred Greendlinger's own doctoral research, which she worked on at SUNY Albany with social psychologist Donn Byrne. "I was appalled by the statistics," stated Greendlinger. "Like most individuals five years ago I tended to equate rape with violence by strangers. However, I then came across a series of articles (Malamuth, 1981) about research done with male college students, one-third of whom said yes, they would rape if guaranteed they would get away with it."

Greendlinger corroborated these statistics in her own research with SUNY Albany students in 1983. In addition, she stated, "We found that the best indicator of a man's willingness to rape and the best postdictor of prior sexual aggressiveness is the extent of violence and coerciveness in conscious sexual fantasies." She added, "This doesn't necessarily mean that we all act out our fantasies," and pointed to alcohol use and belief in sexual myths as other possible factors contributing to coercive sexual acts.

Although her doctoral research involved males, Greendlinger noted, "I became interested in the women who are involved in coercive sexual acts and the parameters that make them vulnerable to rape. Through correlational research I found that these women do share some common features—for example, situational determinants such as picking up men at parties, and attitudinal determinants such as dressing provocatively and flirting."

Greendlinger would like to explore further these signals that women may inadvertently communicate to men. "I'm especially interested in relations between men and women and what cues women are giving off that make them selectively vulnerable to coercive sexual acts," she explained. "We have to try to understand these cues that are given off unwittingly because they carry over to other relationships and give rise to misinterpretation by the men who are seeing them."

Other areas of research that interest Greendlinger—in addition to communication issues between males and females—include hitchhiking and violent pornography.

Intimacy and sex

The forerunners in the growing field of sexuality research were William Masters and Virginia Johnson, whose names are familiar by now to most of the public. Last summer, Greendlinger participated in a week-long sexuality seminar for professionals taught by Masters

Williams frats: Part II The Greek way of life

by Corinna Lamb

Part two of a three-part article on the fraternity system that previously existed at Williams.

Stereotyping of houses existed throughout frat history. In 1833 the first frat, Kappa Alpha (which burned down in 1968) was established, and as others followed they began to distinguish themselves. Several alumni from the 50's remember the various houses' reputations, which changed very little over the years. For instance, Alpha Delta Phi (Perry) and Delta Upsilon (Garfield) were known as the B.M.O.C. (Big Man On Campus) houses, containing the all-American types and many campus leaders. Delta Kappa Epsilon, or "Deke" house (Brooks), was the jock house.

Chi Psi (Spencer) and St. Anthony Hall (Center of Development for Economics) men tended to be scholarly and from old, established families. Phi Gamma Delta was the College's version of "Animal House." According to Phil Wick '56, a member of Chi Psi, Phi Gamma refused to accept the College's decision to eliminate frats and sold its house to the town rather than give it to Williams. It is currently the Williamstown Town Hall.

These reputations were not rigidly adhered to in accepting applicants since being a member of a jock house did not necessarily require being a star athlete. All too often, though, the individual's personality became overshadowed by his house affiliation. As Wick said, "You were pigeonholed—you were categorized by where you lived and with whom. Unfortunately it was difficult to break out of the frat to make new friendships."

Most of one's friends were made within the close-knit environment of one's own fraternity. "Even today memories of the frat system are imbedded in people's minds," said Russell Carpenter '54. "At class reunions some alumni will refuse to come because it's being run by another frat." Regardless of these divisions, frats supplied a college man's non-academic life.

Where the girls are

"Man is a gregarious being, and needs a social life," said Alvin Duerr, Class of 1893, at a National Interfraternity Conference. During Williams' frat days, the social life revolved around several major weekends during which women were "imported" from nearby schools. "Girls were not friends, girls were dates," Carpenter said. College rules forbade women to spend the night in the frat houses, although E.J. Johnson '59 recalled one frat brother of his whose girlfriend stayed for weeks on end, kept hidden away from the campus police.

Other pranks were played by the frat brothers, such as installing a tape recorder in the ladies' room and then playing it back afterwards to hear what men's dates thought of them. "Pig Night" was a particular highlight—the worst looking women from Bennington College were invited to a frat party and the man with the ugliest date won a keg.

Road-tripping to nearby women's colleges was frequent. "The social life was an effort. If you didn't have a car, or no money to pay for gas, you stayed in Williamstown," said Carpenter. He also noted that drinking was a common pastime, and remarked, "We used to go to Vermont and load up our wagons."

She's a Val-ley girl: senior soprano Valerie Anastasio acknowledges applause at the end of her solo performance during Friday night's Berkshire Symphony concert. (Fang)

Soprano sings notably

by Jennifer Sills

The audience at Friday night's Berkshire Symphony concert may have noticed, with pleasure, that there was something different about this concert compared to performances of recent years. The difference was soprano soloist Valerie Anastasio, a senior music/psychology major at Williams College. For the first time in four-and-a-half years, a student, rather than a hired professional, performed the traditional solo piece in the symphony concert.

Anastasio was chosen to solo upon the high recommendations from music experts such as Terrence Dwyer, her vocal instructor, and Kenneth Roberts, professor of music and head of

The Freshman Revue reviewed: "Two Gentlemen" too ambitious

by Elizabeth Skorcz

This year's Freshman Revue, a racy rock adaptation of Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona , was an ambitious undertaking that came off as good entertainment despite some weaknesses. The original music by Randall Kromm '86 was the highlight of the show. Kromm deftly manipulated modern idioms such as blues, salsa and country to create a delightful contrast to the Shakespearean prose while capturing the raw emotion in the original play.

The two gentlemen of Verona are Proteus and Valentine, both suitors of Sylvia, daughter of the Duke of Milan. Proteus has turned his back on his former lover Julia in order to court Sylvia, however, and when Julia follows him to Milan, she rebukes him for his betrayal.

These four leads did not exhibit vocal skills on par with Kromm's compositions, but they sang with engaging feeling. Julia (Shirley Kagan) had lovely tone but little power, whereas Sylvia (Selena Tan) had a somewhat unsure pitch but admirable projection. Regrettably, the best singer in the cast, Rebecca Salazar, was cast as Lucetta, the servant and friend of Julia, a role that gave her only one duet in which to show off her talent. Proteus (Michael Baratta) had some trouble at the low end of the register, but when he shed his nervousness, his singing was pleasant and capable. Other characters, particularly Thurio (Paul McGreal) and Eggiamour (Keith Ritzie), compensated for their lack of natural vocal endowments by playing for comic effect. Unfortunately, the amplified band was situated directly on stage and sometimes overwhelmed the vocals.

Most of the vocal weaknesses disappeared during the chorus numbers, which were consistently tuneful, spirited and rousing. Some of the most memorable moments in the show were the chorus' first entrance, when they proceeded in with flaring Bic lighters to "I'm going to write a symphony," the funk number "What does love pack?" and the salsa following Thurio's attempt at a declaration of love.

Senior Mia Douglas' choreography caught the earthy, funky flavor of Kromm's music. Even though the dancers looked stiff at times, the movements still read well, especially in Sylvia's solo, the composition of a love letter to Eggiamour, and in the chorus' grasping, circling dance to Sylvia's song asking that people see her for who she really is.

Director Cameron Smith '86 deserves praise for coaching the cast into a visible ease with their Shakespearean lines. What might have been stilted recitation and affected mannerisms worked instead as real dialogue and fine acting. Smith also brought out the humor in the bard's comedy, and devised some wonderful comic effects, such as providing the Duke of Milan with a pocket-size cordless phone, and draping Valentine's rope ladder, with which he plans to sneak into Sylvia's chamber, around his shoulders so that he looks like a surreptitious hunchback.

The set, designed by Libby Miles '86, was reminiscent of West Side Story, another musical adaptation of Shakespeare, in the way it evoked a tough, back-alley atmosphere. The multiple levels of the jungle-gym set allowed for dynamic staging, particularly during chase scenes. The lighting, designed by Lenore Doxsee '87, was disconcerting, however; three spotlights fixed to the set glared into the audience's eyes.

oned it at a meeting of house presidents.

The committee discussed a letter from Jim Hodgkins, director of Food Service, about growing problems with getting dining halls cleaned up after parties. Since 1979, clean-ups have been the responsibility of a student party-supervisor.

Hodgkins said in the letter, "(This system) has been steadily failing in the last two years, and this year so far has been troublesome. Dining rooms are not getting cleaned up sufficiently (if at all)."

Hodgkins suggested returning to the use of department employees as party clean-up supervisors. Bell advocated compliance with Hodgkins' wishes. The wages of the clean-up supervisor would be charged to the party host.

and Johnson; she remarked of the former, "He's truly a unique man who is really respective of the individual—he's like anybody's ideal father."

Greendlinger emphasized the value of Masters and Johnson's research, which presented a great deal of objective data about Americans' sexual attitudes and behaviors—a subject of great interest and relevance to many adults.

"Our sexual relations are fundamental to us," Greendlinger commented, adding, "but that's the nature of intimacy." Williams students, too, believe that emotional closeness between sexual partners is important, Greendlinger observed. She noted, "Students here are looking for intimacy as an important component of relationships."

Dancercise gets hearts pumping

by Laura Gasiorowski

As both the media and the public focus more attention on health and fitness, exercise is fast becoming an important aspect of daily life. The market is deluged with books, home gyms, aerobics videos and workout records, suggesting there is an exercise program designed for everyone—from the seven year-old to the expectant mother.

The preoccupation with fitness has not escaped colleges, including Williams. One of the most popular forms of exercise offered here is Dancercise, a class combining aerobic excrcise with "spot" exercises and simple dance steps choreographed to the latest popular music.

The aerobic workout, which follows a warm up, lasts about thirty minutes. Not only does the routine help improve coordination and grace, but it also develops cardiovascular capacity, which is especially important for athletes.

Dancercise requires no special skills or athletic talent, which is why instructor Melissa Matthes '86 first took a Dancercise class during her freshman year here. "I was a spaz," she said. "I almost didn't want to come to college because of the physical education requirement." Now, along with fellow seniors Madeleine Hughes and Ann McDonald, Matthes teaches Dancercise to other students.

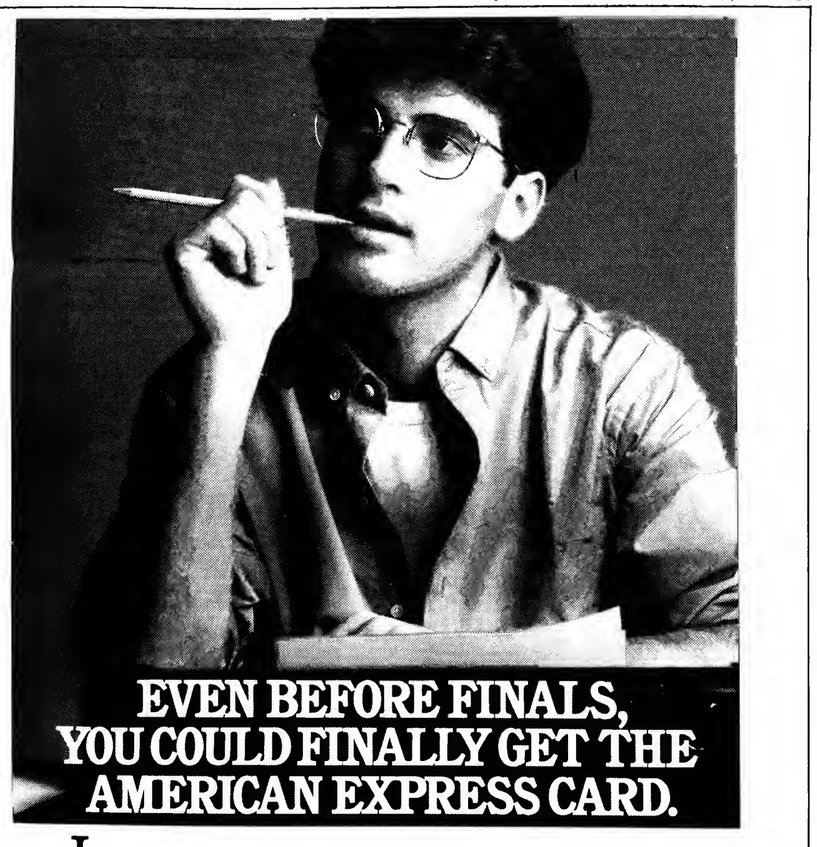
It's a hard job to stomach: Dancercise instructor Melissa Mathes '86 leads the class in abdominal exercises. (Marcus)

All three instructors view Dancercise as a sport, as exercise and as an expression of the body. Sandra Burton, assistant professor of physical education and coordinator of dance, argues that Dancercise is a valuable form of exercise not only for its long-term physical benefits, but also for its role in increasing bodily awareness.

"Dancercise gets together large groups of people motivated to move. It gets them in touch with what's happening with their bodies," explained Burton. "Dancercise is a great introduction to dance. You learn about your body, coordination, grace, and health."

The Dancercise instructors strive to make the routines interesting, fun and inventive. They attend regular workshops conducted by Sandra Burton and Judy Drozd, the artistic director and a professional dancer. These workshops are designed to help instructors with improving their routines and to aid Dancercise "interns" in developing their own technique and routines.

Students wishing to become instructors must attend these workshops and audition for a spot as an instructor. In addition, all of the faculty and students involved in Dancercise try to keep up with the latest developments and medical information in the field.



Sexercise?

Despite the commitment of regular Dancercise participants, the instructors sometimes feel that it is not taken seriously enough. Matthes admitted that this was also true when the program began three years ago under the direction of student Kerry Traylor '84. "We used to call it sexercise," she joked, "but it really is for fun and fitness. There is no emphasis on the Christie Brinkley body, and it should not be a class for just women."

The men joining the afternoon classes help to shatter the image of Dancercise as a "female" sport. The large class size indicates that this is no passing craze, and the grimaces are indication enough that Dancercise is tough physical activity.

"I went up there (to the gym) to do Dancercise with crew for fun, as a joke," said Scott Brower '88. "We found out it is a lot harder than we thought."

"The importance is in motivation," said Matthes. "We work hard to train at cardiovascular pulse; the exercises improve posture, the dance helps with grace. It is legitimate. The body beautiful may or may not be a consequence."

Anastasio

the Choral Society.

In selecting a soloist capable of performing with an orchestra, members of the Williams music department took into consideration past recitals and performances, as well as recommendations.

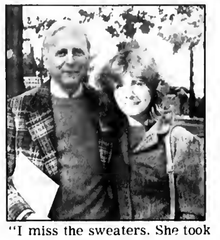
Professional effort

Anastasio lived up to the honor when she sang Friday night with professionalism. Her tone quality and musical expression were beautiful and her stage presence reflected that of an experienced performer.

When asked how she felt about singing with the symphony, Anastasio said she jumped at the chance. "I like to sing. The more chances I get, the better," she said. By her own choice, she sang Rodrigo's "Cuatros Madrigales Amatorios," having selected it from a list of suggestions sent by friends who sing and vocal instructors.

"I loved it! It was something a little different and not frequently performed," she said. "The songs are perfect—short, beautiful, expressive, modern, wonderful!"

Indeed, the songs offered room to express different moods, the nuances of which Anastasio caught admirably. Her acting ability, too, was evident, making the performance both enjoyable to listen to and also pleasant to watch.



Hoping to pursue a career in music—possibly singing in musical theater or light opera—Anastasio said that soloing with the symphony was a big step for her career. Although many talented sopranos present competition for positions, a special performance situation such as the Symphony offers excellent experience that Anastasio hopes will be helpful in launching her career.

The women's varsity eight boat setting up to race at the Head of the Charles Regatta.(Khakee)

by Jennifer Goodman

The women's crew team completed a very successful season last week at the Head of the Charles Regatta. The Boston race, 3.1 miles long, is the largest fall regatta in North America. Three women's boats competed: a youth eight, an alumni eight, and a varsity eight on a course lines with many cheering Ephs.

In youth competition, Williams placed seventh out of 14 boats, and the varsity boat finished eighth out of 31 crews. CJoxswains Lorri Williams '88 and Sophie Gorski-Popiel '87 performed well on a tactically difficult course. Both boats were thwarted by slow competitors who refused to yield to faster Williams crews early in the race. Undaunted by stiff competition, the alums showed their enthusiasm for Williams and the sport itself on and off the water.

At the Mt. Holyoke Women's Regatta the week before the Charles, all of the varsity women participated. Williams' first boat was second in the morning head race to Smith and placed fourth in the afternoon final. The two JV boats finished fourth and seventh in their division. A third-place team finish reflects a strong program consisting of returning varsity, seniors who were away last year and two boats of sophomores.

Chris Cruz, in her second year at Williams, was joined by novice coach Kip Ballow to build a sturdy foundation of technique and enthusiasm with both varsity and first-year rowers. As November's early dusks send the oarswomen to the weight room and straps them onto ergs, they look ahead to cherry blossoms in Washington, D.C. and the spring racing season.

IM soccer

by Amy Glick

IM soccer? Does Williams have an IM soccer league? Yes! Better known as "keg soccer," the league was founded three years ago seniors Bill Tinsman and Jim Ward. The league is a social group, too (you knew there was a reason everyone knows the league by "keg"). The Friday night games are followed by a party which typically includes traditional beverages and dancing to "The Femmes."

The league finished up this year's season last week with a tournament to determine the champion. THe regular season, as they say, was "just the beginning" when the practices and games are casual. But the level of play is competitive, especially since many of the participants are former varsity and JV players. During the tournament games, almost everyone gets serious about the competition. Except maybe the Red team, otherwise known as the doormats. In one of the most exciting tournament games, sophomore Dave Greenberg's Blue team narrowly defeated classmate Brooks Foehl's White team 3-2; Blue took an early two goal lead, but then White unexpectedly scored two goals within five minutes. A shot by Alex Vitale '86 in the last fifteen seconds won the game for Blue.

Tinsman's "Purple Haze" beat senior Cliff Ruprecht's Burgundy team in the second of the cold and muddy 1-0 semifinal games on Friday. In the final game on Saturday, Blue emerged victorious 1-0 over Purple.

With over one hundred participants this year, more (and more girls) than the two previous years, Keg soccer is well on its way to becoming an institution at Williams. Bill and Jim have passed on responsibility for organizing next year's league to sophomores Pete Grose, Foehl, and Greenberg. This year, a trophy has been established to be awarded to the winning team's captain. The "Tinsman Award" will be engraved with the name of the winning team and captain as well as the winners fore the previous two years.

Women's harriers

The women's cross-country team traveled to Amherst on Saturday for the Little Three championships and finished second behind a strong Wesleyan squad. The Cardinals racked up 32 points to take home the trophy, followed by Williams with 43 and Amherst with 54.

Wesleyan's Alegra Burton, a 1984 NCAA finalist, led the three-mile race from start to finish with a time of 17.20. Captain Becky Conklin '87 led the Ephwomen in sixth place with a time of 18.55. She was followed one second later by freshman Jennie Garrett in seventh. Kate Pugh, battling back from mid-season illness, captured ninth place in 19.11. Karin Johnson '89 and Sarah Pierce '88 rounded out the Ephwomen's top five finishers in tenth and 11th places, respectively.

Following a rest weekend the team will host the annual Alumni race on November 9. This team's final race of the season is the Division III New England Championships on November 16.

Tied at 12 in the third game against Amherst, Laura Wefing '88 and co-captain Lisa Jayne '86 combined strong serves and powerful spikes to defeat the Lady Jeffs 15-4, 11-15, 15-12 for first seeded Williams' only win in the N.I.A.C. tournament at Mount Holyoke on Saturday.

The team fell to Mount Holyoke 4-15, 0-15 and to M.I.T. 3-15, 2-15. On Tuesday in two well played matches the Ephs beat Harvard 15-9, 15-13 but lost to Yale 13-15, 7-15.

Caroline Teer's '87 excellent serving in the first game against Amherst enabled Williams get several quick points. Amherst fought back from 8-11 in the second game with hard spikes. Williams came back from being down 0-6 to tie the game at eight, ten, and 12.

Holyoke and M.I.T., both very strong teams, never gave Williams a chance. Holyoke, playing with the home court advantage, took control of the game immediately. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin was not disappinted with the team's performance, stating, "We could have done a little bit better, but all four teams are very strong. We played our own level and ended up on the losing side." M.I.T. went on to crush Holyoke and win the tournament.

The Ephwomen played excelently against Harvard for their first win against the Crimson in four years. Teer replaced co-captain Mary Hickox '89, who had academic conflicts, as setter. Jenny Ause '88, back from an injury, started and played very consistently. Williams was down 6-10 in the second game, but Teer's serving and freshman Nancy Hedeman's spiking tied it up at 13. Yale was also an excellent match with long rallies and well-played defense by both teams.

Williams' record for the season is an impressive 19-9-1. Tri-captains Jayne, Hickox, and Kelly Andrews '86 held the team together with stong all-around games. Hudson-Hamblin said, "We started with a very strong, mature team and kept improving. It was one of the best seasons we've ever had."

Tennis

The women's tennis team finished up their season this weekend with an eighth place finish at the New England Championships. Senior co-captain Sue Brown, classmate Jenni Koski, and the doubles tandems of Katie Kerr '87-Debbie Bernheimer '86 and freshmen Kathy Paper-Anne Peterson fared the best by reaching the semifinals of their respective flights.

Number one player Mary Montgomery '88 reached the quarterfinals of her flight, while number two Liz Peay '86 reached the semifinals of the consolation bracket. Number three player Annie Shulman won one match before falling, while freshman Missy Crouchley finished up a fine season at number four by also reaching the consolation semis. Koski and Brown then provided the top singles results at numbers five and six, respectively, with their semifinal finishes.

In the doubles, the top team of co-captain Liz Kellison '87 and Gerl Hugo '86 fell in the first round. Kerr and Bernhelmer then made the semifinals in the second doubles, while two freshmen teamed up at number three doubles. Paper and Peterson reached the semifinals of their flight.

"I thought it was a good tourney for us," said coach Sean Sloane. "The caliber of women's tennis is just improving by leaps and bounds." The finish came after sixth-place finish last year.

The women's field hockey team celebrates a goal in action earlier this year. (Albright)

Field hockey, 8-3-1, ends season with win

by Tom Ewing

The field hockey team finished its season with a 5-0 home victory over Russell Sage Wednesday to complete the year with an 8-3-1 record.

The victory marked a return of the potent Williams offense, which had been held scoreless in their last three games. Sophomore Sybil Frankenberg led the attack with two goals, while Suzanne Falcone '88, Kirsten Neuse '89 and Kirsten Rooks '87 each recorded one goal. Senior co-Captain Jean Hakmiller said: "It was good to end the season with a win, even if we did not make the playoffs." Williams missed a playoff berth by one place as a result of a 1-0 loss to Tufts University last Saturday.

Hakmiller said it was a very good season, although the team was unable to qualify for post season competition. Looking ahead to next year, she said, "We have a strong team and there was a lot of depth this year, so they should be able to fill the holes left by graduating seniors."

The life and times of a women rugger; the real story behind rucks and scrums

by Corinna Lamb

My decision to play Rugby created an uproar among my family and friends. "I don't want you breaking your nose!" cried my mother, when she heard that I had joined the Women's Rugby Club. Other people's responses were no better. My father, who had himself played rugby in college, told me "to make sure and come back in one piece." My dancercise addict friends were simultaneously awed and appalled. "Rugby players are animals, Corinna" warned one friend. (Well, it's no coincidence that my last name is Lamb.) "That game is for sado-masochists," said another of my wimpy acquaintances.

Undaunted by this optimistic advice, I headed down to Cole Field for my first practice. I was relieved to find that the rugby players were not, for the most part, Arnold Schwartzenegger look-alikes, but average-sized, athletic women. At 5'5", I was in the middle of the height range. Not that these women weren't strong, as I found out when we learned how to tackle.

Otto, Bubbs, and Slink

On the first day, however, we did fairly light training. We then sat down and learned each others names—and in some people's cases their bra size. Almost all the old ruggers had nicknames, such as Otto, Bubbs and Slink.

Over the next few days we learned the basics of the rugby game: that the ball cannot be passed forward, how to strip and bind, as well as the various positions in the linc and scrum. I was told I would make a good hooker, which they explained was the player in the scrum who literally hooks the ball back with her foot. Not entirely comfortable with that title, I chose instead to play line. There is a friendly rivalry between scrummies and linies. The scrum is generally regarded as more "down and dirty," perhaps because one's facc is very near to other parts of a teammates anatomy. Linies tend to be smaller, and have to sprint more with the ball.

In our first scrimmage, still a little shaky about the rules, I had to stop and think for a moment when the ball was thrown to me. I was anxious not to repeat my mistake in tenth grade of almost scoring a goal for the other team in field hockey—forgetting that we had switched sides during half-time. Luckily, I wasn't so clueless this time.

As the weeks went by, I grew more attached to the sport. Though whenever I tackled anyone I was the one who ended up on the ground, I was learning to run quickly when passed the ball.

Amazons and used bags

Our first match was against the Alumnae, otherwise known as the "Used Bags." I tackled a six-foot amazon, who made me look like a Munchkin in comparison. The next time I played was against M.I.T. in Boston. We arrived in the pouring rain and the B and C sides watched as our A-team (no pun intended) battled it out against Boston Women's Club. New meaning was given to the term mud slinging, as I watchcd our white rugby shirts turn grey.

M.I.T. hadn't brought enough women, so half our team was drafted. I got to kick the ball three times (not that I was counting or anything.) I was psyched to play in my first away game, even in there was a manhole cover in the middle of the field.

But undeniably my favorite part of rugby is Beer Practice, which takes place in the graveyard (always prepared for the worst). Drinking beer (Diet Coke for some of us younger members) and singing crude songs which would make Hugh Hefner cringe may not be everyone's idea of a good time—one girl switched to keg soccer after our first beer practice. But I like the camaraderie and the friendly spirit of this weekly ritual, when the men's and women's teams socialize. Of course, the women's songs are just as wild as the men's, if not wilder (though this is an ongoing debate.)

Rough and tough? Yeah, but now that I've found it. I wouldn't give up rugby for anything.

Tufts to score.

The Jumobs drove the ball hard and brought it to within inches of the Eph try line. Williams came through with the inspired defense necessary to hold off such a drive, and were finally able to get it out of their territory and win the game. The A-side record is now 7-0.

The B-side game, played on Cole Field against RPI, was won a little more handily: 25-0. Starting slow, but steadily gaining momentum, the B-side proved the can and will play with anybody.

Williams' first points were credited to senior Tim Latimore's foot on a penalty kick. This was soon followed by senior Michael Zullas' first try in competition. There was a scrum-down five meters outside the RPI try zone. The Williams pack pushed over the ball and in the subsequent melee, Zullas found the ball and fell on it for the score. Latimore converted and the score was 9-0. Dave Koota '87 joined the fun with a score assisted by nice passes from Erik Valdes '87 and Steve Patterson '87. The score at the end of the first half stood at 11-0.

The second half opened with another scrum try much like the first one. The time, however, Davis Davis '87 was the man who found the ball and pounced on it. The conversion was good, and Williams had increased its lead to 17.

Koota returned an early favor as he fed Patterson who broke through the RPI line and continued to run 60 yards leaving dust and frustrated defenders behind.

Comfortably ahead, but determined not to give up their shutout, the Killer B's dug in and played amazing defense. This effort was epitomized by Mike Goldstein '88 who, coming from nowhere, pulled down an RPI player just as he was about to cross the try line. The B's preserved their shutout and their unblemished record of 5-0.

At the post-game festivities, a rather vociferous RPI rugger said, "I've always said if you can't win on the pitch you gotta win off it." The reply from Chief of Protocol was succinct and apt, "Well, you're O and 2."

showed his speed by courageously holding the Wesleyan man off, and flew across the finish line in 25.21 for second place. Grossman cruised in for a fourth place time of 25.26. After Amherst's runner, Lydon, Tonelli, and Fisher finished sixth through eighth.

Brzezenski finished 14th overall in 26.27, followed by Levine, Gilrain, Sprague, Arrowsmith, and Lopez. In all, the Ephmen captured six of the top eight spots in a convincing return to their dominant form of years past.

In the junior varsity race, Williams swept the top five spots to get the whole team in the winning mood. Dave Prockop '87 won the race, followed closely by Tim Pittman '86, Mac Hines '88, Alan Belshaw '89, and Dave Glendon '88. The JV race was never a contest, as the quality of the Williams runners in the contest revealed the Ephs' depth and talent.

Coach Peter Farwell summed up the whole day, quoting a former Eph runner who said the night before the race, "For some reason, the Little Three seems to mean more to Williams, so we race a little harder."

Water polo qualifies for NE championships

by Frank Vespe

The Williams water polo team will be competing in the New England tournament, representing Division II West along with Amherst. The Ephs gained their place by beating Trinity 15-5 on Sunday to place second behind Amherst in the second Division II West tourney. In their other game, Williams was upended by Amherst 6-5.

The Trinity game was relatively close until one of the Bantam players fouled out early in the third quarter. This seemed to open the flood gates for the Ephmen, who scored almost at will thereafter. After piling up a sizable lead, Williams was able to substitute liberally, and every player got into the game including Sue MacCormack '88, the Ephs' only female player. Dave Cantor '89 scored his first goal of the season, and Will Andrew '89 paced the team with eight goals.

It was Andrew who summed the game up best: "It was just a blowout," he said.

Against Amherst, however, the Ephs did not fare so well. "Just about everyone on the team had about a half dozen shots on goal," noted Andrew. "We just couldn't connect." Lacking their usual offensive spark, Williams was edged by the Lord Jeffs, 6-5. The defeat wasted a strong three-goal performance by Adam Ifshin '87.

Next weekend, the Ephs, who are 6-5, will travel to Brown to participate in the New England tournament against the top two teams from Division II East, as well as Amherst. Teams in the running in the East include Boston College, Boston University, the University of Rhode Island, and the University of Connecticut.

Amherst will be the other representative of Division II West; whether Amherst or Williams will be the top western seed in the New Englands will depend on Amherst's game with Trinity. The team with the better differential of goals scored to goals allowed will be the number one seed and will play the number two seed from the East on Saturday. The championship game and the consolation game will be played on Sunday.

Football falls to unbeaten Union 20-10

by Dave Paulsen

The football team turned in what coach Bob Odell termed "a gutty performance" on Saturday but still suffered a 21-10 defeat at the hands of the nationally-ranked Union Dutchmen. Union, now 7-0 and ranked fifth in the nation in Division III, was led by the standout performance of quarterback Mike Gargiulo, who threw for 132 yards and two TD's.

Union, boasting a team much bigger than the Ephmen, was overpowering for much of the game. But the Ephs hung tough, and in fact, had several chances to score late in the game. As Odell noted, "We asked no quarter, and we gave no quarter."

In addition to the sting of defeat, the game was costly for the Ephmen in another regard—injuries. Freshman tailback Maurice Holden '89 went down with a sprained ankle, sophomore tight end Lewis Collins '88 bruised his ribs, junior offensive tackle Taylor Watts injured his knee, and senior defensive back Frank Morandi injured his knee and sustained a concussion. "I don't ever want to play on that damn astroturf again," said Odell.

The injury to Morandi was at least partly responsible for the first Dutchman touchdown. With the tenacious Morandi on the sidelines midway through the first period, Gargiulo picked on an untested cornerback to complete a 38-yard pass to set up the first Dutchman score. Halfback Todd Walker culminated the drive with a one-yard touchdown burst.

Williams came back with a scoring drive of their own, which was aided by a Union defensive holding penalty when the Ephs were forced to punt. The automatic first down kept the drive moving, and senior Tom Goodspeed came in and booted a 24-yard field goal with 14:57 left in the first half.

Union's George McEvoy hauled in a three-yard toss from Gargiulo for the Dutchmen's second touchdown with 6:17 remaining in the half to give Union a 14-3 advantage at halftime. Union scored early in the fourth quarter for a 21-3 lead.

Refusing to give in, the Ephmen came back with a touchdown of their own, when quarterback Kevin Morris '86 connected with split end Andy Jeffrey on a 15-yard aerial. Goodspeed's conversion closed out the scoring at 21-10.

Williams had other scoring opportunities late in the game, set up by short Dutchmen punts and a Union fumble recovered by the Ephs' Eric Churchill '88. But the aggressive Union defense stymied these late scoring attempts.

For the Ephs, junior Rob Miller picked up 35 yards on six carries. Morris completed 10 of 35 passes for 88 yards and one touchdown on the day, but the statistics are deceiving, as several of his passes were dropped by Eph receivers. In addition, Morris paid heavily each time he went back to pass, as a swarm of Dutchmen menaced him all over the field.

Odell was quick to single out Miller as well as junior tight end Jim Poulsen for their fine offensive performances. Defensively, Odell praised the entire unit, while noting that junior linebackers Dan McCarthy and Dan MacDonnell played particularly strong games.

The Ephs, now 2-3-1, begin Little Three play on Saturday when they travel to Wesleyan for a 1:30 game.

Blanking Conn. College, soccer moves up to 8-2-1

by Greg Leeds

Junior Denny Wright scored two goals to lead the men's soccer team to a 3-0 victory over Connecticut College on Sunday at Cole Field. Williams is now 8-2-1 following a 1-0 loss to Babson earlier in the week.

Wright's goals came in the second half, following a scoreless first period. Nikolai Nachamkin '88 scored twice in the first period but both goals were called back due to offsides calls. Clark Otley '86 assisted on the Ephs' first goal, passing to Wright in front of the goal just 4:51 into the second period.

With 28:09 remaining, Wright put in a shot over the goalkeeper's hands following a corner kick from Pieter Mulder '86, giving the Ephmen a 2-0 margin. The final goal came when Mike Masters '89 faked out Connecticut's defense with a pass off the back of his foot with his back to the goal. Senior co-captain Jeff McEvoy picked up the pass, dribbled around the goalkeeper, and pushed the ball into the open net. It was a nice goal for McEvoy, who had missed several earlier opportunities.

"It was a very convincing win for us," said assistant coach Mats Holm. "We never gave them any opportunities, and we should have had them in the first half. We were all over them." He praised the efforts of McEvoy and Wright, and Jon Deveaux '87, who played a fine game defensively.

The Ephmen lost at Babson on Tuesday in a frustrating game—a game they controlled but lost 1-0. Williams outshot Babson 24-9, but Babson goalkeeper had one of his finest games, making 20 saves. After John Wallace scored 16:58 into the first period, Babson played very defensively, denying the Ephs any goals.

Williams is now 8-2-1 going into the final three games of the regular season: Springfield tomorrow, then Wesleyan on Saturday, and Amherst.

Runners take Little Three

by Carter Zinn

One year ago, in a dramatic upset, the men's cross-country team lost the Little Three championship to the Cardinals of Wesleyan. It was the first time in 14 years that the Williams runners failed to capture the title. But on Saturday, those who hoped that last year's loss would mark the end of Eph cross-country dominance were harshly disappointed.

Under a clear, crisp sky, the Ephmen thoroughly dominated their rivals on Amherst's home course to win back the coveted crown. The men took five of the top seven spots, scoring a team total of 20 points to Wesleyan's 55 and Amherst's 58.

Before the race began, an Amherst runner disguised in a Wesleyan uniform stole the team's mascot, the Bear, in an attempt to deflate the Ephmen's morale. It's theft only served to fire Williams up more.

After only half a mile, the Ephs had established a leading three-man pack of John Ellison '86, Tom Pingree '86, and Dave Grossman '87 running with Amherst's top man. As coach Peter Farwell had hoped, the front runners were strongly supported by a large pack of Eph runners shadowing the top Amherst and Wesleyan men.

As the race moved past the mile mark and out of the forest, it seemed that any number of Williams runners could have moved up to help out the leaders, as co-captain TJ Lydon '86 moved out of the pack to replace a fading Grossman.

After the two-mile mark, the racers came careening down a concrete road and with Ellison losing his substantial lead over the Amherst man, followed by the now blazing Grossman running with Pingree, with Lydon following closely. At this point Ed Tonelli '86 and Jon Fisher '87 began to move with authority, and long, powerful strides down the hill to separated themselves from the Wesleyan and Amherst runners.

Depth takes its toll

After three miles, the course turned back into the forest, and as the racers crashed through the leaf-covered, narrow path, the top Amherst and Wesleyan runners began to falter. It was at this stage that not only their superior training, but this years squad's depth began to really make itself evident.

The crowd gathered at one juncture in the forest began cheering wildly as around the corner came Ellison, fifty yards ahead of Wesleyan's Stu Abramson, who was closely followed by Pingree and Grossman, who looked unstoppable.

After Lydon, Tonelli and Fisher powered around the turn in a strong Williams string of runners. Ian Brzezenski '86 and freshman John Levine made aggressive moves on their white and red clad opponents. Even Williams' last runners were competing like every spot counted, as David Sprague '88, Mark Gilrain '87, Ted Arrowsmith '88, and Andre Lopez '87 all ran strong, finishing well up on their rivals packs.

At the final dash out of the woods and up and around the playing fields, the only question that remained for the Ephs was how much they were going to win the meet by, and how well they could shut out their opponents' top men.

Ellison takes title

Ellison emerged from the forest first, and was a lone purple jersey as he moved around the green horizons of the lower soccer field, over a hundred yards ahead of Pingree and Grossman, who were being moved on by Wesleyan's Abramson. Next came Amherst's top man. After that came Lydon, who seemed to be running just as strong as he was at the start, then a kicking Fisher, closely followed by Tonelli, both having their best races all season.

Ellison won the race in 25.06; Abramson kicked past Grossman, who had given everything he had trying to hold him off. Pingree

Undefeated, ruggers top Tufts 11-6

by Mike Curtin

The Rugby Football Club continued its winning ways this weekend by beating both Tufts and RPI. The A- and C-sides traveled to Medford to play the Tufts Jumbos while the B-side remained at home to play RPI's A-side.

The game in Boston began sluggishly as neither club could advance the ball steadily or capitalize on the other's mistakes. Towards the end of the first half, however, the Ephs began to get their collective heads into the game. The entire pack aided the line by spreading the Jumbo defense thin with scrum runs and terrific pursuit. Thus as the first half ended in a scoreless tie, the Ephs had the momentum which would carry them through the second half.

The scoring began early in the second half with Steve Troyer '86 lunging over the try line with the ball and touching it down for Williams' first four points. The score came off a scrum-down deep in Tufts' territory; Phil Headley '86 won the hook and plugman Brad Bissell '86 picked the ball out of the scrum and took off downfield, drawing the entire Tufts defense in. He dished the ball to line captain Ed O'Toole '86 who then tossed it to Troyer for the score.

The second Williams score was also the result of good scrum running. Senior scrummies Jeff Lifson, John Fetterolf, Paul Hogan, Pete Aiken, George Clemens and Tim Faselt all working together, gained enough yardage and wore down the Tufts defense so Mark Tompkins '87 could do once again what he's done so many times this year: score.

Unfortunately, both conversion attempts were missed because of bad angles. Scrumhalf Greg Bronson '86 added a penalty kick to the Williams tally but only after Tufts had managed to sneak in a try. The score was 11-6 in favor of Williams, but there was still time for Women's soccer wraps up season

by Al Mottur

After playing well in its closing weeks, the women's varsity soccer team finished the season 4-7-2. Despite the losing record, many players felt good about this year's team, saying that it was a talented unit. "We just needed to put on the finishing touches," said first year coach Lisa Melendy.

In its last four games, that talent started to mesh as the squad went 2-1-1, most recently defeating North Adams 1-0. Earlier in the week, the team faced New England power, Mt. Holyoke and lost a hard-fought contest by a score of 2-0.

Chris Boddicker '88, the team's leading scorer with twelve goals, provided the game winner against North Adams early in the first half. The goal was the result of good team passing down the field which brought the ball to Boddicker deep on the left wing. She out-maneuvered her defender and shot the ball into the upper right corner of the net at 8:37 of the half. The Ephs outshot their opponents 17-13 and goalies Joyce Rogers '88 and Beth Edwards '89 combined for nine saves, shutting out North Adams.

Loss to Mt. Holyoke

Earlier in the week, the squad faced a dominant Holyoke team which had an 11-1-1 record going into the game. The Ephwomen put forth an outstanding effort and according to Melendy outplayed their oppponents in several stretches but still fell short, losing 2-0.

Both Holyoke goals came in the first half, at 34:45 and 43:17 respectively, effectively putting the game out of reach. Melendy said, "They're an excellent team. We came out strong and played really well. We did a good job of containing them and, for the most part, played our game. We just couldn't find the mark offensively."

Her first season at Williams completed, Melendy still retains the enthusiasm she evinced at the outset of the season: "We are a young team and we showed a lot of promise. We have talent, but we just couldn't quite jell. Our schedule was real tough, but we were in every game, and we shut out two opponents. Next year should be a good one because we lose only two seniors. We're really optimistic."

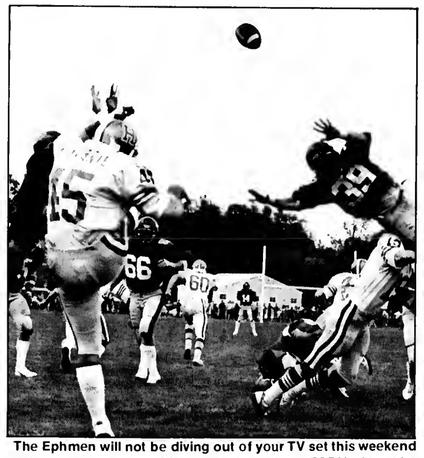
Amherst coach nixes ESPN



by Harwell Wells

Most of the nation will miss viewing the Williams-Amherst game on Saturday, thanks to a decision made by Amherst football Coach Jim Ostendarp.

ESPN, the national sports cable network, made an offer before the season began to televise the game, which is the 100th Williams-Amherst game. Attention focused on Ostendarp's decision not to allow ESPN to broadcast the game, made earlier in the year, when The Wall Street Journal ran a story on the decision in its Monday edition, followed by a USA Today piece on Tuesday.

The game will still be broadcast by satellite to 29 Williams-Amherst groups in the United States and London.

According to Ostendarp, a tenured full professor, the offer was made by ESPN after arrangements had already been made for the alumni satellite broadcast. ESPN and Budweiser Beer Corporation would have paid for the broadcast from Weston Field, according to Ostendarp.

The Ephmen will not be diving out of your TV set this weekend unless you are in one of 29 selected locations. ESPN will not be carrying the game nationwide as had been hoped. (Khakee)

No spectacular

"(Such a broadcast) doesn't show the best of both schools. We can't put on the spectacular TV demands," Ostendarp said. "It would have been different if the alumni wouldn't (be able to) see the game."

Ostendarp expressed no sympathy for those disappointed because they will not be on national television, saying, "If they want to be on TV, they can write a letter to Dr. Ruth."

Amherst President Peter Pouncey said "I do honestly sympathize with the Darp (Ostendarp). I wouldn't have seen it as such a clear-cut decision." He agreed, however, that the game is "not characteristic of (the schools') essential worth." Pouncey also said, "I am more sure the Darp was right now than when it was first brought up."

Williams Football Coach Robert Odell said "I'm very disappointed that an opportunity where we could be televised (was lost.)" Citing his experience coaching at Bucknell and the University of Pennsylvania, Odell said, "We play decent football" that would not look bad on ESPN. He said his main disappointment was for his players, who "should be recognized for the effort they put in. A lot of people don't even know who we play."

No spotlight for teams

Odell said, "It was an opportunity for them to be highlighted, (but Ostendarp) settled it. He's different."

ESPN Coordinator of Programing Information Mike Soltys said he believed the idea to televise the game came from a Williams alumnus who contacted ESPN's New York Office. "The idea didn't get terribly far, not even to negotiations," he said. As for Ostendarp, Soltys said, "He has his principles and standards and that's terrific."

Soltys and Ostendarp both cited the fact that Ostendarp refused to allow an Amherst game to be played and televised on ABC during the National Football League strike several years ago.

Odell and Osterdarp said interest in the game developed after the publication of the article in the Wall Street Journal. The article itself, according to Wall Street Journal Front Page Editor Glynn Mapes '61, came from an Amherst graduate in the Journal's Washington office.

SAC runs 16-grand debt, Council to study options

by Debbie Snyder

The Student Activities Council incurred a $16,595.31 debt last year according to student account records in the comptroller's office, although some of the debt may be tracable to other campus organizations.

Eugenia Smith, who handles student accounts, noticed the debt when checking last year's records of all organizations sponsored by College Council. Smith notified College Council Treasurer David Applebaum '86, who announced the debt at the Oct. 24 Council meeting.

Because concerts have to be paid for quickly, the SAC was not required to send vouchers to College Council for approval, Applebaum said, and various members of SAC would pay for different aspects of a concert without checking with each other to see how much was being spent.

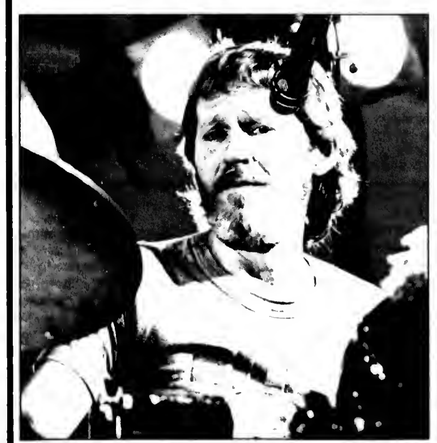
The two major concerts SAC sponsored last year, Ray Charles and R.E.M., caused a lot of this confusion and a great deal of the debt, Smith said. The concerts cost $20,000 each and lost a total of between $15,000 and $20,000, she said. Low ticket revenues accounted for part of the loss; Ray Charles was held in Chapin Hall, which seats only 1,100 people, and not as many tickets for R.E.M. were sold as SAC had anticipated, according to Smith.

No deposits

SAC Chairman Hans Humes '87 said that there was a problem with deposits from the R.E.M. concert and that no deposits were recorded after the concert. He also said that some of the cash from ticket revenues was used immediately to pay some members of the concert, so that money was never recorded.

According to Humes, other student groups and departments promised SAC between $4,000 and $5,000 to help sponsor various events, but these funds were never transferred. Humes said he anticipates that almost $5,000 of the debt will be cleared once this money is recovered. Applebaum, however, said it could be difficult to get these groups to pay now.

Poor management of SAC funds is partially to blame for the debt, Smith said. "People were not paying as close attention as they should have. No one ever came in and asked, 'How do we stand?'" she said. Applebaum commented, "The people in charge (of SAC) last year left a lot to be desired."



Shapiro: 'no debt'

Steve Shapiro, chairman of SAC last year, said, "I don't think there is a debt." He said he believes the money has been misplaced or misfiled, adding that the large amount of the debt makes this explanation seem more logical to him.

The exact amount of the debt will be determined by Thursday and announced at the College Council meeting. Members of the council will then discuss how to clear the debt, Applebaum said.

Applebaum said that he saw three probable actions. First, he said the Council would probably not increase SAC's funding very much this year. Second, ticket prices for concerts would increase, and third, the Council would probably underwrite some of the debt.

Humes said, "The best thing for us would be if College Council absorbs it, but that probably won't happen because it woud set a negative precedent for other groups." If the Council does not absorb the debt, Humes said he would prefer staggered payments over a few years or some type of arrangement that would still enable SAC to sponsor concerts. Humes added that if SAC runs out of money, they will stop sponsoring events. "We won't go into debt this year," he said.

Levon Helm, drummer for The Band, the most recent SAC-sponsored event, which Chairman Hans Humes '87 said lost $5,000. SAC will face College Council scrutiny Thursday night because of a $16,000 debt from last year. (Khakee)

Judge sets date in Yun lawsuit

by Andrew Mayer

Last Monday, a scheduling conference for the lawsuit filed against Williams College by former student Sang C. Yun was held in front of a magistrate in U.S. Federal District Court in Springfield. Yun filed suit on Aug. 14, asking for more than $3.5 million for eight complaints, including discrimination based on national origin and defamation of character.

According to Jeff Jones, the attorney representing the College at the conference, the magistrate decided that both sides have until June 30 of next year to assemble evidence. The case will be ready for trial some time in 1986. However, Jones said that being ready for trial and actually going to trial are two different things.

Jim Foley '84, now working for the Massachusetts Public Interest Group in Boston, knew Yun or "Phi" as an undergraduate. He described Yun as "a very intense person, difficult to handle." Foley said, "He came on stronger than many people were able to deal with, in ways that violated social rules."

Foley said former Dean of the College, now Director of Williams-at-Oxford, Daniel O'Connor seemed to be going "out of his way to be lenient with Phi. Other people had been putting pressure on him to dismiss (Yun) earlier. Given the pressures Dean O'Connor was facing, he made the right decision. Nonetheless, it just disappoints me that some other way wasn't available to deal with this other than expulsion."

Written allegations

In a letter received by the Record, Yun said that in the spring of 1982, O'Connor sent him a letter asking him not to come in contact with several students, including a woman with whom he had been romantically involved. On Oct. 4, 1983, Yun allegedly visited the dorm where this woman lived and was called into the Dean's office the following day, charged with violating the terms of the letter.

Yun's letter says, "For the next two days, O'Connor engages in the deceptions and threats against me to force me out of the college without the due process and the rules in the Williams College 1983 Student Handbook." According to Yun, O'Connor issued him a letter of dismissal on Oct. 6.

Although a disciplinary hearing was set, Yun claimed that the hearing was moved forward to prevent him from assembling evidence to clear himself. "O'Connor violates the college's own rules concerning disciplinary action by not allowing me to gather my evidence," he said.

Yun left Williams on Oct. 7, and said that he enlisted the help of Jonathan Hay '84 to ship his belongings to his home in Los Angeles. Yun alleged that the College locked his room, preventing Hay's entrance, opened and searched his belongings and removed O'Connor's letter of dismissal, his student handbook and his facebooks for 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Yun also claimed that on Oct. 10, "O'Connor sends me a letter with the implicit threat that, if I make contact with people at Williams, he will conclude that I

The Student Activities Council is a perennial money-loser. This year, with a newly discovered $16,000 debt from 1984-85, the SAC has become an especially thorny problem for the College Council and the students.

In order to secure bands on short notice, the SAC needs immediate access to money. Recognizing this, the College Council had allowed SAC to submit vouchers directly to the College Comptroller instead of working through the Council Treasurer. Had the Council Treasurer been responsible for the SAC, a $16,000 debt presumably would not have occurred, but SAC officers wrote vouchers without keeping track of how much had been spent. Although the current SAC officers did not incur the debt, they must assume the responsibility for ameliorating it. Forcing the SAC to submit vouchers to the Council in the future would be one way to ensure that the budget was not used irresponsibly.

The SAC does sponsor events which benefit the entire campus, and College Council should bear in mind that the SAC debt was incurred trying to fufill this purpose. The Council should not bail it out but at the same time should help its officers balance their budget.

By allowing the SAC to pay back its debt over an extended period of time and by providing non-monetary resources to help raise funds — locations, publicity, etc. — the Council and the SAC can combine forces and solve the money problem for both groups. In this way, the Council will not be spending money on one group at the expense of all the others and will be helping the SAC, the campus and themselves.

Recycling

To The Editor:

Williams College has been collecting paper to recycle for a number of years. The Center for Environmental Studies and the Committee on the Campus Environment are working to expand these efforts and futher reduce paper waste. We've enlisted the help of house presidents by asking them to have a central spot where newspapers and other paper garbage may be kept. When your collection box gets full drop it in one of the marked recycling sheds behind Driscoll, Greylock, Baxter, the Infirmary or CES. Otherwise, call CES and they will send someone to pick it up. It's a good idea to leave newspapers tied in bundles or in paper bags and boxes.

Individual students are urged to separate their trash in their rooms. All forms of paper are recyclable and should go in one separate bag. This paper bag may be dumped in the house's collective recycling box.

The actual recycling does not take place at Williams. The paper eventually goes to New York for processing. There it is repulped in water and the impurities are separated out. For every piece of paper that gets recycled, almost a whole new sheet is produced. This uses a lot less energy than making new paper out of trees that must be grown for 40-50 years and it takes only a small amount of effort on everyone's part.

If anyone is interested in Williams recycling program contact Chris Miller (x6582) or Seth Rolland (458-9021). If there are any campus environmental issues you would like to work on, come to a meeting of the Committee on the Campus Environment. Contact Chris Miller or look for our Wednesday meetings in the Daily Advisor.

Notice

To The Editor:

This letter is in response to the Halloween Party notice run by Spencer House in last Friday's edition of the Daily Advisor. The notice began "NAKED WOMEN." I have two basic statements regarding the printing of this notice:

1) Since the Daily Advisor is a function of the College Council, the Council should be held responsible for all that is printed in the Advisor, and

2) The fact that it was unthinkingly run in the campus publication shows the extent to which blatant objectification of women goes unrecognized and in a perverse way reinforced on this campus.

Considering ourselves an Ivory Tower, considering our level of academia as superior to that of less selective schools, is totally hypocritical in light of women's subjugation when published notices such as this are used to attract campus

Playing the biggest game of all

by Vernon Squires

100% Natural

O.K. folks. Here we go. No more hype, tripe or verbal volley. It's summit time.

From every corner of the land, eyes are fixed on Weston Field, where this weekend the two superpowers will square off and knock heads, eye-to-eye.

We'll see wit and might. The good guys versus the bad. Truth versus propaganda, freedom versus the "evil empire." Sick 'em boys, it's Michelob Light for the winners.

Leading the home team—the brawny Ephs of Williams College—is Head coach Ron Reagan, a theatric disciple of strong defense. Although approaching the summit with a mediocre 2-4-1 record, Reagan and the Ephs are confident, vaunting a new anti-passing defense called the Strategic Defense Initiative, or SDI for short. Gridiron experts and others in the know call it "Star Wars."

The SDI is causing much worry among foes, particularly in the nation we call Amherst. The Jeffs head coach, Mikey Gorbachev, has launched a string of protests over Star Wars, claiming that the cosmic defense fundamentally will alter the playing field.

"Hogwash," replies Coach Reagan.

Unlike previous Amherst coaches, Gorbachev is a media darling and is riding a wave of good PR. Behind the cosmetics, however, he appears to be adopting a risky and sneaky strategy for the summit. Intelligence sources claim that he has spearheaded a recruiting drive in violation of Little Three agreements. Indeed, Williams Defensive Backfield Coach Cap Weinberger has accused Amherst of secretly stockpiling scholarships in excess of limits prescribed in the 1979 Scholarship Limitation Treaty (SLT). According to Weinberger, the Jeffs now have in their arsenal six quarterbacks and ten running backs—well above accepted limits.

"They have a tremendous advantage in conventional forces," Cap said.

Coach Gorbachev, on the other hand, has countered charges by blaming the Ephs. Citing the impregnable nature of SDI, Gorbachev says the new defense will render his formal passing attack useless, and thereby increase the risk of a full-scale ground assault or a surprise "bomb" on first down.

"No defensive strategy is without offensive implications," snarled Gorbachev.

On the pages of the Eph playbook, Star Wars looks promising. Its practical application, however, is suspect. Given the multitude of Amherst passing formations, it is unlikely the Eph defense could prevent all threats.

Nevertheless, the Amherst staff recognizes the potential of Star Wars, and seems intent on immobilizing it this weekend. Gorbachev has gone so far as to offer reductions in scholarships if the Ephs will concede the SDI.

Speaking for Williams, Special Teams Coach Rob McFarlane has pressed Gorbachev for further sacrifices—perhaps benching the first-string QB and removing Amherst transfer students from neighboring colleges.

"Why should we give up 'Star Wars'?" complained McFarlane. "Just because Amherst has incompetent research departments is no reason to strangle ourselves. Besides, they're liars and cheats." Coach Weinberger did allow that the Eph coaches will consider Amherst propositions before Saturday's coin toss, but he added that the SDI will not be used as a "bargaining chip."

Coach Reagan is under intense pressure to come out ahead at this stage of the game, especially given the cost of his SDI research. The College Trustees have warned that unless the Coach makes some positive moves, funding for Star Wars will dry up. The Trustees are skeptical that the leakproof defense Reagan seeks is really feasible.

Said one Trustee, "Installing such a system without Amherst cooperation could bring on an offensive and defensive race. The Trustees will not provide a blank check for SDI."

Clearly, the weekend is shaping up as an historic one. We'll see the 100th game, a summit confrontation for control of the Little Three, the results of which might reshape collegiate athletics as we know them.

One-sided debate is useless

by Randy Capps and Tom Williams

In the past few weeks the Williams Anti-Apartheid coalition has been deliberately provoking debate about the morality of investment in South Africa. We have used the Record and College Council as forums to state our position and leave that position open to intellectual challenge from the community.

From the Coalition for a Free South Africa we have received a challenge that is both anti-intellectual and and insulting to our intentions. In the Record of two weeks ago, David Walters '88 stated that his group will use a petition to "let the trustees and administration know, in light of the recent petition and protest by WAAC, that there are students on campus with opposing viewpoints regarding a means for improving the South Africa situation." Thus the purpose of the Coalition is to present an opposing viewpoint to the trustees; yet, this anonymous group does not have the intellectual courage to argue their position in public.

Except for Walters, none of the members of the group even have the courage to attach their names to an anti-divestment petition in public. To WAAC this lack of courage suggests that the Coalition's possible arguments against divestment are too weak to stand up to intellectual criticism.

Close examination of Walters's statements in the Record shows just how weak the Coalition's arguments are. Walters fears "loss of South African black and U.S. economic power" without recognizing that divestment would cause far greater loss of white South African economic power. The political threat of this loss to the existing racist political economy of South Africa which "U.S. economic power" in the region rests upon, can pressure Botha's regime into meaningful democratic reform.

Political pressure with economic "business as usual" has failed to do this; the situation in South Africa is getting worse as a result of this. The Coalition seems to favor the status quo of worsening racial strife and violence to outright economic collapse and revolution.

In contrast, proponents of divestment favor threatening Prime Minister Botha with corporate withdrawal to force his regime to change. Nobody wants bloodshed to increase in South Africa, and WAAC is not making the "choice" for blacks that this should occur. Unlike the Coalition, WAAC speaks with the major respected black leaders in South Africa--1984 Nobel Prize Winner Bishop Desmond Tutu, imprisoned African National Congress President Nelson Mandela, his wife Winnie Wandela, and the Reverend Allan Boesak.

Where are the black leaders that speak with Walters? Where is the evidence for his proud assertions in the Record? We will never know, because his organization does not see fit to argue with people of less power that the trustees themselves. This insults us intellectually.

Moreover, Walters claims that we "haven't done anything" by protesting; yet, his petition is a response to protest. This is both hypocritical and insulting.

On one point we agree with David: too few students take part in a protest and then "go home." His group is worse still: they write and sign a petition, not even in public, and then go into hiding.

We urge all members of the community to have the courage and intellectual responsibility to stand by their positions on this issue as on all issues of controversy and importance to the college.

Juniors Randy Capps and Tom Williams are members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

Waiting for the Apocalypse

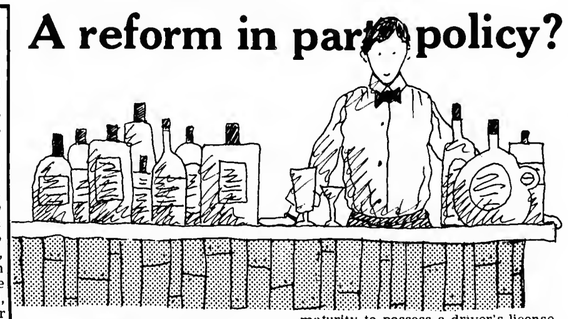
by Steve Theodore

I want you to think for a second about a word: Armageddon.

We are fascinated by the concept of the world's end. The Millenium exerts the same strange fascination that scrapes and scabs do on children. It is not, mind you, the actual prospect of universal destruction which thrills us - it is the idea of the thing. We have a kind of infatuation with Doom.

Our age takes a perverse pride in its ability to destroy itself. It is fashionable to proclaim that we are the first age which has had to face the prospect of a day without a tomorrow. Some would even say that the value and meaning of human life are threatened, even negated, by the threat of annihilation.

It is important to remember that we are not the only society which has stared into the abyss of Armageddon. Yes, we are the first people in history with the ability to destroy our world - but there have been other ages who thought themselves living in "the last of days." In the fourteenth century more than a third of Europe's population was destroyed by plagues, wars and natural disasters; the fabric of civil and religious authority unravelled. Europe waited in feverish expectation of the end which did not come. Again, in the sixteenth century, the German Anabaptists proclaimed the Millenium and the dissolution of society. In the seventeenth century the Jews of Eastern Europe followed a series of false Messiahs, and in the West other groups who thought the end was nigh fled Europe — including the Puritans and founded the Massachusetts Bay Colony.



Most Apocalyptic movements arise in response to crises of confidence. Old forms and institutions fail to provide any form of security. Church and state are seen as corrupt and oppressive, and the world as spiralling inevitably downward. The Apocalypse is not destruction, but the redemption of a broken world. Most visions of The End are not, in fact, final: "I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and earth are passed away, and the sea is no more." (Rev. 21.9) In this gulse, Armageddon becomes (almost) as much a thing to be desired as to be feared. The terror of the last day cannot be denied, but it is embraced in hope of some better day. This kind of thinking, it must be pointed out, is not confined to Christians or even believers in general; the Marxist vision of the death of capitalism fits the same pattern of apocalyptic redemption.

Do we perceive our own potential Holocaust in these terms? Certain Christian denominations do, in fact, associate nuclear war and the Second Coming. Leaving these aside, however, I think that many people still work on an unconsciously assimilated model of what The End is and what it means. For example, I would point out that everything I have ever read about nuclear war was about, not Doomsday, but the day after, or the year after, or the century after. The present administration has spent millions of dollars seeking ways to survive a nuclear war, even arranging a post-

A reform in part policy?

by Martin J. Furey '88

After reading the leading article in last week's Record, I could not help but wonder whether or not the Committee on Undergraduate Life is working to defeat its own purpose. While reasonable progress has been made with regard to the problem of security at parties, I am particularly disturbed by the suggestion that residential houses need; "...a system of student bartending in which trained students bartend...serving alcoholic beverages only to those of legal age,...(as to possibly) decrease the College's liability...."

We all know that the drinking age is now twenty-one, but we also know that social drinking is a major part of college festivities. The College is clearly warranted in not purchasing alcohol for freshman-related functions, however, I feel that the imposition of bartenders at upper class functions is a form of administrative micromanagement which will only serve to fracture the college community, and further disrupt what social life now exists. The imposition of "separate drinking rooms," hand stamps, and drinker identification cards in a community this small would probably have two results: the parties will move to dormitory living rooms, which wouldn't be socially healthy; and if the crackdown on drinking is total, the sale and use of illegal substances would probably skyrocket, which would be even less desirable.

Most people will agree that the most immediate danger of alcohol consumption is manifest when it is combined with driving. Clearly, it is irresponsible for underage students to drive to Vermont, get tanked, and drive back to Massachusetts. People who do this do not have the maturity to possess a driver's license. However, I think that a distinction should be made. Clearly it is a lesser crime for an underage student to occasionally go to a party, procure a drink or two, and walk back to his or her dormitory. This is the sort of activity that bartenders would curtail, and it is probably the least objectionable transgression of the drinking law which occurs on campus. There is no driving involved, and there are no particularly large implications in terms of personal safety as long as the drinking is done responsibly.

Indeed, the best way for the campus to adjust to the new drinking age is for the college to increase the student's responsibility to drink responsibly. Although the majority of students are now too young to drink legally, nearly all of the College's students are seventeen years of age, and thus old enough to enter into a legal contract. What if all students' entrance to upper class functions was contingent upon their agreement to a contract? In this contract, they would affirm their familiarity with the Massachusetts drinking law, and would agree to personally assume any legal liabilities which either the house hosting the party or the College might incur if they were to disobey the drinking law. The contract might read as follows:

The Massachusetts drinking age is twenty-one. The President and Trustees of Williams College, and (X) House affirm this law. The alcoholic beverages at this function are therefore intended for individuals of legal age. By purchasing a ticket to attend this function you affirm your familiarity with the Massachusetts drinking law. Furthermore, you do contractually agree to monetarily reimburse the President and Trustees of Williams College, and (X) House for any incidental or consequential damages and or liabilities which may arise if you disobey this law.

I think this idea represents a reasonable middle ground in response to the new law. It would considerably mitigate the liability that the College and the houses might incur as a result of one student's flagrant neglect of the law, while at the same time forcing the individual student to address the law and act responsibly. More importantly, though, it would not have the negative impact on the social life at the college which the proposals enumerated in last week's Record would.

S. Africa at crisis, says activist

by Tom Ewing

South Africa has reached a crisis point in which a solution without bloodshed appears almost impossible, according to Randall Robinson, director of the Free South Africa Movement.

Robinson spoke last Monday night in Chapin Hall to an audience of about 100 students, faculty and administrators. In his lecture he emphasized the need to put pressure on the South African regime to force them to negotiate a political solution.

"Events in South Africa are moving much faster than we can keep up with," he said. The situation today, with increased protests against apartheid, is significantly different from past turmoil and is causing unprecedented alarm among white South Africans, he said.

The crisis, Robinson said, makes it imperative that pressure be applied to force the government to undertake significant reform. "If the West does not act soon with sanctions, force and commitment," Robinson said, "we will see a major bloodbath in South Africa." Robinson said that the South African economy and government are dependent on the United States and the West. South Africans know this, Robinson said, and are therefore susceptible to American pressure.

Jobs less important

Robinson said, although American corporations have defended their role in South Africa by saying they provide jobs for blacks, "Jobs are not what the struggle is about. There are people ready to die for their freedom. They will risk a job at GM. They have made their commitment to the struggle."

Robinson, speaking emotionally and without notes, made a direct appeal to the audience to put pressure on Williams College to divest its holdings in corporations doing business in South Africa.

He concluded, "If you make yourselves heard and demonstrate and show that you expect U.S. foreign policy to be made consistent with U.S. principles, we will all be in your debt. South Africa belongs to all South Africans."

David Walters '88, a spokesman for the anti-divestment Coalition for a Free South Africa, said that he agreed with Robinson that the situation in South Africa is critical but disagreed with Robinson's call for sanctions. "We just don't believe the College should divest," Walters said.

Walters said that Robinson represents the views of the 1984 Nobel Prize winner Bishop Desmond Tutu and the imprisoned African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela but that these men do not represent all black South Africans. He added that his organization plans to fold in a few weeks because it has accomplished its goal of demonstrating that there is opposition to divestment on the Williams campus.

Rudolph advises CEP as curricular review begins

by Anne O'Malley

College Marshal Frederick Rudolph imparted his views about the Committee on Educational Policy curriculum review to members of the committee during its meeting last week.

Rudolph, co-author of the Association of American Colleges' report "Integrity in the College Curriculum," challenged the CEP to "look at how the College is doing what it says its doing in those magnificent paragraphs that begin every college catalog."

The CEP's study is expected to take 18 to 20 months and will consider such issues as majors, minors, concentrations, double majors, the sizes of the various departments, student-enrollment patterns, academic advising and the correlation between a student's major and his post-graduation plans.

"The question is, is it (the Williams curriculum) good enough, given the quality of our students and the world that's waiting for them out there," Rudolph explained.

CEP Chairman Thomas Jorling explained that the committee intends to begin its study with a review of the major, with the belief that that topic will lead to other areas of inquiry. Rudolph said he is concerned that in its desire to provide flexibility, the College has lost sight of sequence in its major programs.

As an example, he said the history department offers very few courses with prerequisites. A number of different courscs are offered, Rudolph said, and students are told that they have to take 'x' many. "Once you've taken enough of them, you're certified as a history major. That's not study in depth, that's taking courses," he said.

Rudolph said that he does not advocate the College's necessarily returning to its former strictly structured curriculum. He told the committee that it should be able to find in the curriculum something that represents study in depth. "You've got an excellent student body, a student body that with guidance should be able to find opportunities for study in depth that the departments don't have the imagination to support," he said.

Faculty divided

One of Rudolph's major concerns about the Williams curriculum and the problems the CEP will encounter in investigating it, he said, is the sense that the faculty is divided between the various departments.

In describing his experiences as a member of the history department, he said, "The history department dug in its heels in self-defense whenever there was a curricular review." He said that the ideal solution would be to eliminate departments all together but recognized that such an extreme measure would not be practical.

Rudolph also said he is concerned about the reduced number of students writing theses and undertaking long research projects. The committee spent some amount of time discussing the thesis in particular. "If you come to Williams

Students help political prisoners

by Jay Reed

In Baxter Hall a display case full of Amnesty International posters urges students to concern themselves with people who have been denied basic human rights. These people—"prisoners of conscience"—are men, women and children who are imprisoned because of their beliefs or religion, or because they have openly expressed their ideas. Seeking release for these prisoners, Amnesty International advocates fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners, as well as opposing torture and the death penalty.

The Williams Amnesty International group is working towards these goals. Led by co-chairmen David Walters '88 and Laleh Moshiri '87, the group already has doubled in size since last year.

To present its views on the death penalty, the group sponsored a showing on September 23 of A License To Kill—an unbiased documentary about torture and execution—and directed a panel discussion on September 30 between representatives opposed to and in favor of capital punishment. These events were concurrent with AI's world-wide campaign against all political executions.

About 40 people saw the film; acecording to Moshiri, just over 90 attended the panel discussion. She said she was pleased by the number of questions ralsed by the audience during the meeting. Interest was so keen that that the meeting was closed before some spectators even voiced their opinions.

Airgrams

The death penalty crusade forms only part of the agenda for the Williams AI group, whose main effort is focused on a year-long letter-writing campaign to help prisoners of conscience. AI sets up tables twice eaeh month in Baxter mailroom to help students write airgrams to these prisoners, many of whom are in dire need of medical supplies and legal representation.

Aecording to Walters, some prisoners are reported to have just "disappeared" from their families months ago. Amnesty International, which emphasizes its commitment to accuracy, reports that other prisoners have lost their basic human rights and many are frequently beaten and tortured.

During a recent two-day campaign, the group asked students to request legal and medical aid for four Poles imprisoned for publishing critical newspapers. On the first day, acecording to group member Steve Fagin '89, over 50 people stopped to write out the lengthy airgram. "On the second day, people just kept on coming," reported Walters. By the end of its campaign the group had amassed more than 120 letters.

"In over 50% of the cases something happens," said Walters. "Prisoners get released, or their conditions improve. They get lawyers and medical attention. There is a positive change."

In explaining why she leads the Williams AI group Moshiri remarked, "I grew up in Iran, so protecting human rights has always interested me. I saw these things. I heard about them. There were people I knew—university professors—who were locked up because of their beliefs."

Ephs channel energy into television station

by Caroline Koeppel

President Oakley doing music videos? Dean Spear hosting a late-night show? Well, maybe not. But don't despair, you didn't hook up that cable line (what cable line?) for nothing. Juniors Penny Schenk and Steve Theodore are organizing a club that will provide a student-run television station for the Williamstown community.

The group will broadcast on channel seven, the public access channel provided by Cox Cable in North Adams. The company offers a studio for community use on a first come, first serve basis. However, few students know about the service and even fewer would be able to organize productions single-handedly. Ignoring such an resource seemed to both Theodore and Schenk to be overlooking an important student activity.

"Let's face It—if my crummy high school could have a television station, then there seemed to be no reason why Williams College should not," Theodore said.

Although a video course taught by Vaughn Grylls, Art 318, is now offered, enrollment and use of the new video studio and facilities are limited. The art department does not have enough money to hire monitors to provide much studio access. The TV club hopes to cooperate with North Adams State College, which has a television studio. Professor Joseph Ebiware, who teaches courses in communications and television at NASC will assist in instructing club members. The club hopes that Williams will provide some funding to encourage intercollegiate cooperation.

"Not only will the club make people more aware that the public cable access is available for their use, but it will also help organize students with an interest in television," Schenk explained, adding that the club's activities would provide a new medium in which art can be extended and projected.

A primary objective for the club will be to provide an availa-

Ways to mind your own business

by Alexandra Shapiro

For Williams students tired of spending summers as waitresses and lifeguards, a summer job managing a lucrative business could be in the offing. Under the auspices of the Southwestern Publishing Company and College Pro Painters, college students throughout the country have participated in just this type of entreprenurial experience.

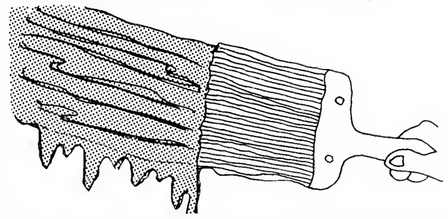
"It's a very, very tough job, and it involves full commitment of the whole summer," said Peter Haupt '87, one of several Williams students who managed for the Southwestern Company last summer. "You learn the type of stuff you don't learn at Williams College, and it helps you to appreciate the College more."

Southwestern chooses 300 managers from 1000 student applications. Each manager is assigned to a specific area, and the students work in teams of seven to eight people, selling school handbooks.

Students are usually placed in an area of the country that is new for them. Scott Robinson '87, who is from Iowa, and Gwen Garcelon '87, from Maine, both said they enjoyed getting to know the area of California where they worked. Becoming well acquainted with a particular neighborhood, combined with the effect of talking to potential customers from "all walks of life," was a valuable and perspective-broadening experience for many students.

Although Southwestern does provide an initial loan and is always available for advice, the students are on their own as far as managing their operations. The rewards are based totally on self-motivation because the financial benefits are a direct result of the students' time and effort. As Robinson pointed out, "If you work harder, you make more money."

Fringe benefits



Southwestern does have some ineentive bonuses, such as vaeation trips awarded to teams which sell a certain number of units. Williams students have an excellent track reeord as efficient, hard workers, and last year all of them won a trip to the Bahamas.

Other benefits to the job lnelude developing communications skills. Said Haupt, "Selling ideas is important whatever you do, and the Southwestern job helps you learn that."

Recruiting and interviewing for next summer's team positions will soon be underway. By talking to friends and aquaintances, Robinson is trying to attract interested students on a casual word-of-mouth basis. Garcelon will be combining a similar informal approach with a wider drive, including presentations and seminars, signs, requests for recommendations and phone calls.

College Pro

College Pro Painters, which offers college students the opportunity to manage their own painting companies, has a more strenuous recruiting process usually involving an interview and a test. Two or three out of every ten people are asked back to a follow-up interview, and the majority of those granted the second interview are offered jobs. Both the interviews and the test involve 'role playing,' through which the interviewers try to find out how the student will react in a variety of management situations.

The recruiters are current and former managers selected by College Pro, although any former manager may volunteer to recruit. The recruiting process takes place early in the academic year and the hiring is usually completed by December or January. This year's recruiting drive begins Wednesday, November 6, with a presentation at OCC; interviews will be held November 7.

Eric Churchill '88, who managed an operation last summer and is currently recruiting for the summer of '86, pointed out, "I'm looking for people who are motivated enough to be looking for a summer job early in the game, not the ones who start thinking about a job during spring vacation—those kids are going to be painting for me."

Once the managers are hired they undergo a training program in the spring, and begin making arrangements (hiring painters, planning budgets, opening bank accounts, etc.) for their outlets. The students maintain good contacts with the College Pro executives and can get help and advice if they need it, but each manager's company is separate from College Pro as a whole. The managers make their own hours, which vary from as little as 20 hours per week to as many as 60. College

'Song of Ascent 2' comes to stage

by Jane Becker

Sandra Burton's multimedia piece "Song of Ascent 2" will take place at DownStage Thursday, Friday, and Saturday at 8 p.m. Featuring a twelve person cast, this project is the second in a series of Burton's own exploration of Biblical Psalms.

Burton, who is head of the Williams Dance Department, co·centrates on the emotional content of the psalms, in which she finds historieal significance.

"The psalms record and communicate the emotional state of the people and the times in which they existed," Burton said.

The project also examines the meanings of the word "ascent." Burton's "Song of Ascent 1" was commissioned by a library in Queens, New York to celebrate a woman's hundredth birthday. Appropriately enough, this first piece treated "ascent" as the tracing of genealogy. The other meaning Burton hopes to convey is that of climbing upward, both physically and socially.

The thirty minute performance uses movement, music, visual art and speaking—all crucial elements in the series. The focus for "Ascent 2" is a comparison of the voices in the psalms to those of contemporary poets, specifically to Sylvia Plath and Henry Dumas. Burton juxtaposes the words of the poets in the Bible with those of these modern artists.

Within this melange, Burton incorporates contemporary songs of Joan Armatrading and Godley and Creme. Ouisa Fernholtz, a Berkshire Symphony violinist, accompanies portions of the piece as would an ancient Greek upon his stringed psalter.

Burton invited her cast to aid in the creative process. For instance, some have taken the poems she gave them to read and have composed music for them. Cast member Bruce Bullock '86 said, "I have learned about integrating movement into performance to reflect the

Frat History: Part III

by Corinna Lamb

Conclusion of a three-part series.

Social life was very different, however, for "non-affiliates," those students who did not belong to frats, either by choice, or as was more often the case, because they had been rejected. These unassociated men formed the Garfield Club, which met at Currier. Though frat brothers were not blatantly rude to the non-affiliates, they were aloof to them, causing the Garfield Club members to feel left out and discriminated against. "They were, in effect, the unchosen," said Henry Flynt '44. Added E.J. Johnson '59, "There were unhealthy social attitudes—there was an intolerance to difference."

The recognition that a sector of the college community was being unjustly separated from the rest of the College led to a reevaluation of the frat system in the early 1960's. The exclusivity and homogeneity of the frats came to be seen as a weakness in the school.

Significantly, it was the students rather than the administration who proposed the abolition of frats, and it was not women."

One aspect of frat life missed by alumni is the closeness of student-faculty relations in past years. "There used to be more socializing between faculty and students, such as when one night a week each house would invite professors and their wives over for dinner," said Wick.

Some alumni still believe that the social life at Williams was better with frats. Deane concluded, "There was more camraderie in the frat system than there is now—a lot more mingling with people both on campus and with other campuses."

in appreciation the College allowed the frat men to rename the building. They chose to name it after Phillip Spencer (the original founder of Chi Sci at Union College), who had been hanged at sea due to his captain's fear that he was starting a mutiny.

In speaking of today's Williams Carpenter said, "It's a much healthier, friendlier, more normal life than it was then. We would never have had such a happy transition to coeducation if frats had still existed because there would have been 15 little bands of opposition not quite knowing how to deal with the non-affiliates but the campus leaders and frat members who suggested disbanding the system. Russell Carpenter '54 commented, "The non-affiliates had no power base...the frats ran the institution through College Council."

Frats booted

Bruce Grinnell '62 was onc of the more active students in helping to elliminate frats. Captain of the football team and a member of Alpha Delta Phi, he was part of the Angevine Committee that met in 1962 during President Sawyer's term to reevaluate the frat system at Williams. After examining the system, the committee decided to disband fraternities.

Although the committee's decision was accepted, a significant number of students and alumni—loyal and attached to their frats—opposed it. "Many of the national frats look upon Williams as the school that first did in fraternities," observed Carpenter. Some frats refused to disband and met secretly in Bennington.

By 1966, however, frats had disappeared from Williams and their buildings were either given to the College or sold. Chi Sci was one of the first frats to give its house to the school, and

Telephone troubles

Yun further wrote that on Nov. 5 he called Williams President John Chandler and, immediately after the conversation with Chandler, called Hay. Yun alleged that as soon as he said "president said," the phone was muted out. He claimed that a subsequent phone call was also muted out.

Yun also claimed that on April 16, 1984, he sent a package to the female student involved via UPS Next Day Air, which he said was opened by College employees and examined for 11 days. He said that on April 27, the Mears House Mail Room sent the package back to him without two personal cards.

During commencement in 1984, Chandler called O'Connor one of Williams' outstanding professors and gave honorary degrees to a black woman Floretta D. McKenzie and a Korean man Kyung-Won Kim. Yun wrote, "I believe that the above were political moves by the college administration to control the public perception about the wrongs committed against me."

Yun also wrote, "I believe that Chandler's resignation and O'Connor's flight to England have to do, at least in part, with me."

holocaust post office and IRS.

I don't mean to suggest that the planners and analysts are somehow assuming that Armageddon is a goal to be sought after. What I do want to point out is that there is an enormous danger inherent in the unthought assumption that something will be born out of the destruction of our world. This assumption is dangerous because it makes it possible to resign ourselves—even if only a little—to annihilation. I started this piece by saying that we are fascinated with Doom. What I should have said is that we ignore Doom as much as we can, and concentrate on its aftermath.

This is an evasion of our responsibilities. The day after is fantasy, disquieting perhaps, but easier to stomach than The Day itself. We let ourselves wonder about the aftermath and look for consolation, rather than recognizing the full dimensions of our power and our duties. We can learn lessons in courage or cowardice from others who have stared doom in the face; but we have a responsibility that they did not. They could only wait and see; we must work out our own salvation. We must not ignore Doom, nor try to shrink it to some manageable size. We must face it as it really is.

ble television crew for events such as concerts, lectures and plays. Schenk and Theodore hope to organize regular shows using the three-hour programming time, five nights a week, offered by Berkshire Cable. The club also wants to take advantage of the five minute slot available to the community on Cable News Network's twenty-four hour local news service.

"The program will be more community than Williams oriented," Theodore said, "since the station broadcasts to the five northern Berkshire towns. After all, there are only couple of dozen TV sets on campus." Schenk and Theodore hope to activate the club before January.

conceptual framework of the piece." More fundamentally, he said, "I learned how to dance. This is the first show I have ever been in dancing."

"When I think about dance, I think about theater," said Burton. Complementing the performers is visual art done by Anne Cortez '85 and lighting design by Barry Lovell '88. "Song of Ascent 2," is the first of Burton's series to be performed in Williamstown; tickets will be on sale one hour before the performance at the DownStage box office.

Pro does offer incentives to successful managers in the form of rebates.

Both Churchill and Adam Ifshin '87, the other College Pro recruiter for Williams, emphasized that the jobs provide a great deal of room for creativity and for reacting to the specific needs of a particular outlet's market when selling painting services. According to Ifshin, "People with finance and business majors from places like UMass tended to be less successful than Williams people."

Like their counterparts at Southwestern, College Pro managers develop confidence in their own abilities to make decisions and see them through. Churchill emphasized that the first few weeks are the toughest, when any and every complication seems to occur, but he said that by the end of the summer his outlet was practically running itself. Ifshin stated, "It's a lot of anxiety, and you learn to really value your free time," but he too pointed out that second-year managers are more relaxed because of their experience.

and don't have that kind of experience (writing a thesis or undertaking some other project in a major field), it seems to me that you're paying a lot not to," Rudolph said.

He did not go as far as to say that students should be required to write a thesis, because "The thesis has never been a requirement at Williams. It's been an opportunity."

Rudolph also talked about the quality of teaching at Williams. He said he believes that there is currently an excessive concern with piling up subject matter and coverage and that teachers should try to incorporate skills such as writing, listening and speaking into their courses. He told the committee, "The important thing is to get them (faculty) stirred up — thinking about how they're teaching."

In closing, Rudolph encouraged the committee as it begins its endeavor. "You've got a new, fresh president," he said. "It's a good time to be working on the curriculum. A lot of other things have been done here. We don't need any more buildings."

Blaze guts store

Fire completely gutted the interior of the Colonial Village Package Store early Tuesday morning. The cause of the fire has not yet been determined, according to the Advocate.

Liquor bottles exploded because of the heat, the Advocate said, adding fuel to the fire. Gerry Lincoln, owner of the store, told the Advocate he had lost $70,000 worth of inventory, which was insured for only $30,000.

The fire broke out around 2:30 a.m. Tuesday, and firefighters declared the store a total loss after quenching the blaze. Barbara Bump, owner of the Sewing Nook, next door to the package store, told the Advocate that smoke and water destroyed her inventory, which she valued at $40,000.

A heater in the ceiling of the store was completely destroyed, according to the Advocate. Lincoln said that he had turned the heater on for the first time last Sunday.

Spencer bleeds best

Spencer-Brooks-West walked off with the great pumpkin after winning the Vampire Sweepstakes at last week's Red Cross bloodmobile blood drive. Nearly 30 percent of the residents of the housing group gave blood, the largest percentage of any house on campus.

Fourteen percent of the Williams student body, 276 students, gave blood last Tuesday and Wednesday, and more than 50 of those students were first-time donors.

Gladden and A-Gar-Wood placed second and third in the Sweepstakes, with 24.7 and 23 percent, respectively. Other housing units with more than 15 percent participation were Carter, Mark Hopkins, East, Prospect and Fayerweather.

The Red Cross collected 300 units of blood during the two-day drive. Thomas Halg Jr. received a five-gallon pin, Jim Wondoloski Jr. received a two-gallon pin, and Kirsten Rooks '87, Mary Petersen '87 and Jean Fox '88 received one-gallon pins.

The pumpkin was donated by Sam and Elizabeth Smith, owners of Caretaker Farm on Hancock Road attendance. Who was the notice supposed to attract—party animals? intelligent women? desperate men?

I am currently reading some of Catherine A. MacKinnon's works, and some of her observations of societal norms hit so strongly on this point that I wish to cite a few examples:

□ A woman is a being who identifies and is identified as one whose sexuality exists for someone else (...i.e., men). Women's sexuality is the capacity to arouse desire in that someone.

□ Women are only walking embodiments of men's needs.

□ Sexual objectification is the primary process of the subjection of women.

The notice submitted by Spencer House is such a glaring example of the sociological phenomenon MacKinnon is discussing that I still can hardly believe it was run. I believe those responsible from Spencer House owe a public apology, though my real desire is that they wake up to see the warped perspective they embrace. I also believe the College Council should exercise discretion in the future and that they too owe an apology for providing the public forum in which such heinous sexism was published.

Waste

To The Editor:

I truly loved Julie Convisser's Op-Ed article "Putting Waste in Perspective" (October 1). I grew up in South America, where making do and being resourceful is a way of life. I live in the US now, caught up in the wastefulness, but quite aware of it.

Thank you for the article. It gives me hope.

Success

To the Editor:

Friday night the Williams Film Society showed The Rocky Horror Picture Show. After understandable reservations on the part of the College, the movie was an outstanding success for the second year in a row. Over 500 people were able to enjoy and participate. We would like to thank the students for cooperating with the Film Society and with Security. We would like to especially thank Security, and most of all Jean Thorndike, without whose backing and help the show never would have gone on.

All Women

To the Editor:

A brief note to the organizers of the (fleitious?) "Affluent White Males"/"He-Man Woman Haters" parties:

There is really no need to feel threatened by an all womens party. In a (mostly) male dominated society, such gatherings are very supportive and empowering for many women. The gender power imbalance in society is not the fault of any one of us—man or woman. We are all caught up in it. Women's support and celebration of each other are important parts of liberation from powerlessness. And that shouldn't be threatening. The vision of women interacting with each other and with men from a position of power is an exciting one—something worth supporting and even working towards.

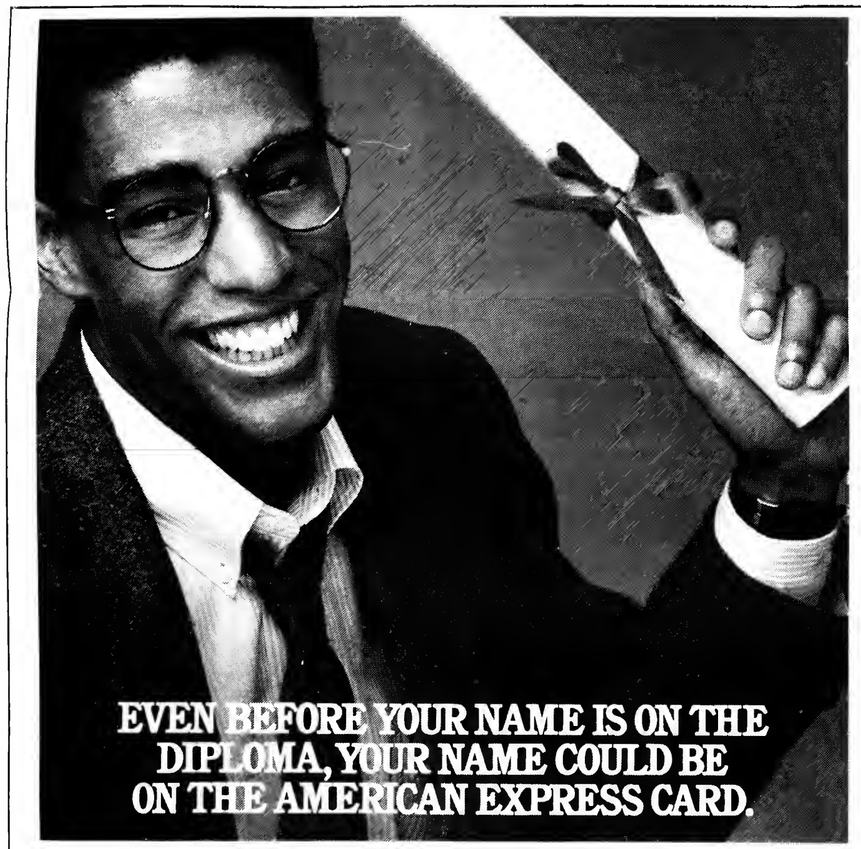
Security

To the Editor:

Frankly, I wouldn't use last week's Record editorial to housebreak a puppy. In this editorial, the Record posited two "ideas," one of which was issued by the CUL: first, if damage occurs at a party where security officers are present, the College should be liable (The Record's suggestion); and second, each Williams student should contribute equally through a ten dollar tax to pay for security at house parties (CUL's suggestion). Common sense suggests we ought to re-examine such an iniquitous proposal.



It takes small imagination to visualize the absurdity of the Record's liability proposition. Since, under the plan, security officers would be commanded to prevent all damage, constant surveillance inevitably would follow. Innocuous trips to the bathroom or intimate retreats for conversation would be accompanied by Orwellian eyes of security officers. Moreover, if someone did find himself in private, he could be certain that any destructive enterprise would be paid for by "Uncle Eph."

Holding security—and ultimately the College—responsible for damage at parties is ridiculous. Security does not inflict damage. Students do. Given even a modicum of judgement, a rational mind will conlude that the perpetrator of a crime should pay, and not a security officer acting in good faith (especially since most security officers fall short of omniscience). Finally, if the person responsible for damage cannot be ascertained, the hosts of the party must pay; they are not infants cloaked in naivete. They are adults fully aware of risks, particularly those inherent in hosting a large party. If unwilling to face these risks, they have no business throwing a party at all.

The CUL's proposition—shared financial burden—is a second assault on the mind accustomed to intelligence. That every student should pay an equal amount for party security—irrespective of attendence—is inequitable, yet the Record dangerously backs such a scheme. Coercing non-participants to assume financial responsibility is tantamount to theft.

The two propositions befriended in the Record's editorial (ironically entitled "Double Jeopardy") make it difficult to believe that thought preceded composition. Asking for a party environment in which we may act as children, devoid of responsibility for our actions and in need of constant supervision, is like asking to live in a playpen.

(warnings). During a timeout for a referee injury, the Ephs regrouped and afterward played with much more composure.

"It was not an artistic victory by any means, but we'll take it" said coach Michael Russo. "Our defense played well, and we're delighted to win after last year's loss."

Shutout of Springfield

In contrast to Saturday's game, on Wednesday Williams defeated Springfield 4-0 in a talent-displaying match. In reference to the Ephs' first half play, Russo said "They played the best soccer I've ever seen at Williams."

Senior Clark Otley opened the scoring just 1:30 into the game, pounding in a shot off an assist from Nachamkin. Nachamkin again assisted on the second goal, passing to Denny Wright '87, who made it 2-0. Six minutes later Nachamkin had his own goal, scoring off a deflection of a shot by senior co-captain Mark Schroeder.

Mike Morris '88 finished the Eph scoring with an unassisted goal, making a half-field sprint through the entire Springfield defense before putting it away.

Williams will probably participate in the ECAC tournament, meaning they will play Thursday or Friday before meeting Amherst for the Little Three title on Saturday.

nated the entire half, most of which was played in the Cardinal zone. The Williams pack controled both line-outs and serum downs, continually having the ball out to the baeks who were wearing the red defense down. The Ephs first try came off a loose serum. After pushing Wesleyan back a good ten meters, Tim Faselt '86 picked up the ball and tossed is to Ed O'Toole '86. O'Toole dished it off to Chris Toll '86, who had joined the line from his position at fullbaek thereby creating an overload, who gave it to Mark Thompkins '87 who ran past two Cardinal defenders and somehow squirted through three more for the score.

This rejeuvenated Williams who then began to play even harder. Highlights of the game included O'Toole blocking a kick with his face, Bissell picking balls out of scrums as if they were cherries on a tree, and Faselt with a break away run. This run brought the ball deep into Wesleyan territory. Gary Sheef '87 took the ball and headed toward the try zone. He was tied up just inches from the line. The reslut was a scrum down. Wesleyan, realizing they could not push the Williams pack, collapsed the serum. In most instances this would have been a regular penalty, but since Williams would have socred, the referee awarded the Ephs a penalty try.

B's blank Cards

Maintaining their unblemished record as well, the B-side shut out Wesleyan's B's (many of whom were Williams C's) 21-0.

Sophomore Austin Kelly began the scoring with a long overdue break away try. Tim Lattimore '86 hit the conversion, and Williams took an early lead 6-0. Neither side could put the ball in the try zone for the remainder of the half. Play was heated by both scrum and line, but the Ephs just could not get everything to work at the same time.

The second half, however, was a different story. Feeling they had something to show their Little Three foes, the B-side came out swinging. Steve Patterson '87 started it off with yet another try. Taking the ball from scrummie Mike Duncan '86, Patterson powered his way through the Cardinal serum and touched the ball down for four points. The sure-footed Lattimore '86 added the conversion and Williams led 12-0.

Shortly thereafter Lattimore scored again this time on a penalty kick. The game continued to be fierce and the hitting hard, but Williams' defense, behind Channing Headley '86 and Kurt Oeller would not budge. The final score came off a Wesleyan line out. The ball was thrown in and was being batted about. Loose forward Gene Mazzaro snatched th ball out of the air, ducked his head, and stormed into the try zone with three Cardinals on his back. Again Lattimore added the conversion to make the final 21-0 Williams.

Both sides are undefeated and eagerly awaited next Saturday's match on Cole Field with the Lord Jeffs of Amherst.

Fencer Cho third at Albany

by Yuji Shinozaki

The Williams Fencing Club continued its impressive performance last Sunday at SUNY-Albany. During the past two years Gordon Leeds '86 and Tae-Cho '87 have dominated most of the Hudson-Berkshire Divisional competition. Both have also qualified for the National Championships two years in a row.

Last year, Cho and Jeff Weber '86 qualified for the National Junior Championships. Cho finished an impressive 20th place out of 120 top national fencers in that competition. He was also ranked as one of the top 20 fencers in the nation in his age group.

Last Sunday, the Williams Fencing Club continued its successful trend at SUNY-Albany, despite the fact that two of the top Williams fencers, Leeds and Weber, were unable to compete. Representing Williams was Cho, Chris Myers '88, and Yuji Shinozaki '88.

The Tournament was very long and competitive, consisting of top fencers from Canada and New England colleges. Cho started the competition poorly, losing his first two matches. However, he came back, going undefeated after that. He made it to the final and placed third. Shinozaki made very impressive performances, reaching the semifinals.

Football comeback falls short 9-6

by Mark Via

The Wesleyan Cardinal defense held off a last-minute drive by the varsity football team to back up senior Greg Zlotnick's three field goals and lift the Cardinals to a 9-6 victory over the Ephs in Middletown.

The ball was fumbled three times in the first quarter, twice by Wesleyan, before the Ephs were able to open up the scoring. They led 6-0 after senior QB Kevin Morris connected with senior split end Tom Goodspeed on a 21-yard touchdown pass. The crucial fourth-down score came with 4:37 remaining in the period.

Wesleyan bounced back in the second quarter as freshman quarterback Jim Lukowski twice drove the Cardinals to within field goal range. Behind the hard running of junior fullback Matt Nestor, Zlotnick was able to set up for kicks of 33 and 46 yards. He was successful on both attempts, with 5:49 and 0:04 remaining in the half, and in the process set a New England Division III record for field goals in a career, finishing the day with 25. The two clubs entered the locker room deadlocked at six.

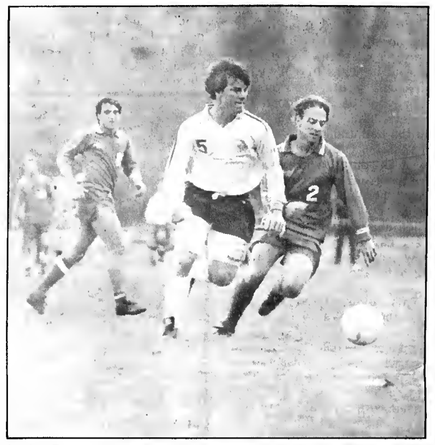
Following a silent third quarter, Wesleyan took a 9-6 lead with 9:22 remaining in the game as Zlotnick sent a 34-yard field goal sailing through the uprights. Williams then set into motion a strong comeback attempt which was thwarted by the defensive heroics of Cardinal safety David Hill. Quarterback Morris marched his team from their own 23 all the way to the Wesleyan 35 before Hill intercepted a pass intended for Goodspeed. The Eph defense held firm, however, giving the ball back to the offense in good field position. But as Morris hooked up with junior split end John Shaw on an eight yard pass, Hill appeared again and jarred the ball loose, forcing another turnover.

The Ephmen were given one final chance to turn the game around as they took over on their own 25 with 1:23 remaining. Morris engineered another drive, keyed by passes to senior split end Andy Jeffrey and tight ends Rob Coakley '86 and Lewis Collins '88, and clutch ground gains by Morris and junior fullback Rob Miller.

With four seconds on the clock and 15 yards to paydirt Morris lofted a pass to Shaw in the end zone. Wesleyan defenders knocked the ball away but the officials called pass interference against them and placed the pigskin on the two-yard line for one final play. With the clock reading 0:00, Morris' keeper was stuffed by the Cardinal defense, and Wesleyan walked away with a narrow 9-6 margin of victory.

Williams drops to 2-4-1 while Wesleyan raises its record to 3-4. The Ephmen host rival Little Three team Amhers next Saturday for Homecoming weekend.

Soccer nips Cards 1-0 behind Walker's goal



by Greg Leeds

The men's soccer team increased its record to 10-2-1, defeating the Wesleyan Cardinals on Saturday in a very physical match. The Ephmen clearly had more talent than the 5-6-2 Cardinals, but a combination of questionable officiating and Wesleyan's supportive Homecoming crowd kept the Ephs on edge the whole game. Memories of last year's 1-0 Wesleyan victory over Williams added to the tension.

Scott Walker '87 scored the winning goal off a beautiful pass through two defenders by Nikolai Nachamakin '88. Walker hit a low shot to the far side of the goal, which bounced off the post and into the net. During the first half the Cardinal defense was disorganized, but Williams was unable to take further advantage despite controlling play almost entirely.

In the second half, Wesleyan played more intensely, testing the Eph defense. The rough play, the boisterous crowd, and the seemingly one-sided officiating rattled the Ephmen, who lacked their usual discipline and allowed themselves to lose self-control. Two Williams players were given yellow cards

Rugby stays unbeaten

by Mike Curtin

The men's rugby team captured the first jewel in the Little Three crown this weekend by handily defeating Wesleyan 13-3. Although not the prettiest game of the year, it was well played and bodes well for next weekend's finale against Amherst.

The first half of the A-side game might be best classified as a game of ping-pong. Williams continually drove the ball down in the Cardinal end, but the Wesleyan fullback kicked it out as quickly as it came. The only scoring in the half came on two penalty kicks—one awarded to Wesleyan and one put through by Greg Bronson '86. The first half was a defensive battle characterized by hard hitting by Brad Bissell '86 and George Clemens '86 and scrum downs, most of which were won by Craig Blackmore '86.

The second half was a different story. Alhtough the hitting remained hard, Williams domi-

Runners 18th in New Englands

by Carter Zinn

On Saturday the men's cross-country team sent two teams to Boston to compete in the Division 1 New England Cross Country Championships. Although the Ephs were clearly mismatched against Division I competition, they ran hard and finished very repectfully, taking 18th out of the 30 varsity teams who entered.

The varsity was led by co-captain John Ellison '86 who placed 68th overall. Ellison traversed the muddy five mile course which winds around the fairways of Franklin Park in 26:20. Co-captain T.J. Lydon '86 gave a strong performance, finishing second for Williams in 26:47. Dave Grossman '87 came in third for Williams in 26:56, Tom Pingree '86 was fourth with a time of 27:06, and Ian Brzezenski '86 rounded out the top five in 27:12, finishing 121st overall. Jon Fisher '87 and Ed Tonneli '86 were close behind in 27:17 and 27:43 respectively. The team competition was won by Boston University with 44 points.

In the 'sub-varsity' race Williams placed 11th in team competition. Ted Arrowsmith '88 led the Eph pack to finish 45th overall in 27:38. John Servin'89 and Carter Zinn '88 finished 62nd and 63rd respectively, both in 27:53. Dave Prockup '87 finished three seconds later to take 64th. Mark Gilrain '87 rounded out the top five, finishing 73rd, and was followed by Tim Pittman '86 and Dave Sprague '88.

Coach Peter Farwell was pleased with the team's performance and emphasized that racing against this level of competition is a good experience for everyone who ran.

Women ruggers best Wesleyan 9-3

by Li Gwatkin

The women's rugby club won first of a two part struggle for the Little Three championship with a 9-3 defeat of the Wesleyan Cardinals Saturday.

The Williams women kept the Cards scoreless during the first half of the game as they grew used to the differences of playing on a field designed for midget league soccer that left little room in which to manuever.

During the second half, Wesleyan scored on a penalty kick, but Williams, with the golden foot of fullback Mary Petersen '87 and the quick thinking and hands of inside Becky Haile '86 was able to turn a penalty kick into a try and to score on the conversion kick. With superior knowledge of game rules, and the judgement of a helpful Wesleyan linesman, the women were able to convince the referee that they had, indeed, scored.

Williams put in a fine performance during the rest of the game, with strong pushes form the scrum and close coverage by the line which kept Wesleyan from additional scoring. A break-away by wing forward Kerry Cullen gave Williams much yardage, and the final three points were scored by yet another kick by Peterson.

The B-side experienced a heart-breaking 18-0 defeat to a larger and older Cornell Med team led by a 6'2" lock, Erica "Whips and chains." Daisy Hagey '88 almost scored when she kicked the ball almost into the try zone. Although the scrum was strong and low, and often gained possession of the ball through the flying break-away tackles of Janet Mansfield '88, the team could not hold the Cornell women.

The Ephwomen face Amherst for the Little Three title in their final match of the season Saturday at Cole Field.

Adams man bitten in late-night brawl

12 to 15 Williams students involved

by Virginia Demaree

The investigation into the Nov. 1 incident between a group of Williams students and three Adams, Mass., residents, which resulted in one Adams man losing part of his nose, is going well, Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zolto said Monday.

Police have made no arrests as of yet, but Zolto said the investigation should be completed in a couple of days, adding that no charges had been filed as of Monday morning. In a letter to the Williams community, Dean of the College Stephen Fix said, "It seems likely that all sides can and will be heard most fully in court."

The three Adams residents were on their way home from a Vermont nightspot late Friday night, Zolto said, when their car broke down on North Street, just north of the Williams campus. According to statements from those involved, Daniel Ziemba and Richard Pizani, Jr., used a phone in one of the nearby houses to call a friend and agreed to meet him at the information booth near the Williams Inn.

Ziemba and Pizani began walking up North Street toward the booth and apparently entered the Williams campus. "It appears there was an altercation," Zolto said. "As a result of that, some students followed the Adams men off the campus to the information booth, where a scuffle ensued."

Nose search

It was in this scuffle at the information booth that part of Ziemba's nose was bitten off. Zolto said that the police station received a call from a man who said he had broken up the fight and taken Ziemba to the North Adams Regional Hospital. The man asked the police to go to the information booth area to find a

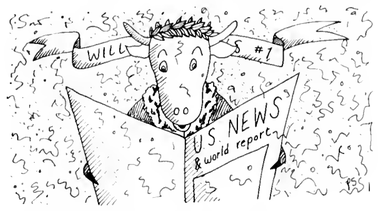
Williams #1 in U.S. News survey



by Harwell Wells

Williams College is the best national liberal arts college in the country, according to a poll in U.S. News and World Report. The article, to be published next week, ranks Swarthmore College in Philadelphia number two, and Amherst College third.

"This time, we're first," said Director of Public Information James Kolesar. Kolesar said that the magazine's circulation department called him last week to inform him of the poll's results and to inquire how many copies of the issue Willaims might wish to buy.

He said that he was also contacted by U.S. News' photo department, who wanted pictures of Williams to use in the issue. The magazine's education editor, Lucia Solorzano, refused to comment on anything about the story, even refusing to admit the poll's existence.

This is the second edition of the poll. The first, published in the fall of 1983, listed Amherst first in the category, with Williams and Swarthmore tied for second and Carleton, in Minnesota, fourth. The magazine described the category as containing what have been "traditionally the most selective of the nation's smaller schools." Other schools in this category include Wesleyan, Haverford and Oberlin.

The 1983 poll consisted of a questionnaire sent to more than 1300 presidents of four-year colleges, with more than 600 responding.

The story about the poll, the results of which already have been widely circulated in the Williams and Amherst communities, was reported by the Boston Globe as part of its' Saturday article on the 100th anniversary of the Williams-Amherst football game.

Kolesar said the story will appear in the U.S. News and World Report cover-dated Nov. 25, which will be published and distributed on Monday, Nov. 18.

Council OKs SAC budget cuts

by Debbie Snyder and R.P. DeMott

The College Council approved a budget of $22,700 for the Student Activities Council by a vote of 23-0-2 last week. The Finance Committee recommended a $4,000 cut from its original offer of $26,700 in order to repay a portion of the debt incurred by the SAC last year.

In addition, Council Treasurer David Applebaum '86 stipulated that in 1986-87 the SAC should continue to pay back the debt. "Next year, the Finance Committee will keep in mind this debt and recommend a similar figure," he said.

Applebaum said that Eugenia Smith from the Comptroller's Office told him that the debt was $16,595.31. He added that $2,000, which had been promised by the Luce Committee to help sponsor the Ray Charles concert, would hopefully be recovered.

"Genie Smith also found that there is a $2,800 deficit from the previous year for Jazz at Williams," Applebaum said. Subtracting these two figures brings last year's debt down to $11,795.31.

In presenting his proposal to the Council, Applebaum said that the debt had been paid out of Council funds and that reducing the SAC budget would repay the debt but would not punish any other group. He added that with the $4,000 returned to the Council they would have about $6,000 to spend for the remainder of the year.

"The debt of $16,000 was paid by us and we're getting $4,000 back," said Minority Representative John Calderon '87. "We lost $12,000."

Students lose big in game-time theft

Saturday afternoon, while most Carter House residents were at the Williams-Amherst football game, all of the unlocked rooms in the entry facing Route 7 were robbed.

According to Carter House President Rudy Ford '87, the thefts took place sometime between the middle of the third quarter and the end of the game. "Nobody saw anybody. Nobody was around," he said. "They (the thieves) took mostly little electronic things like walkmans and calculators." Cash was also taken, Ford said.

"Everybody lost something," said Director of Security Ransom Jenks. "I'll never know why they (students) think they can walk off and leave their rooms open and wallets lying around and expect their valuables to be there when they come back. I would hope Williams students would learn to please lock their rooms."

Suze MacCormac '88, a resident of Carter House, said she was in the house until almost the end of the third quarter and that a friend of hers had returned to her room at the end of the fourth quarter. "It (the robbery) was in that 45-minute space," she said. MacCormac said that two walkmans and about $20 were taken from her room. "They just took little things. There was so much more they could have taken," she said.

The glass in one of the doors to Carter House was also broken yesterday, but Jenks said that the glass-breaking was probably not related to the larcenies.

Dave Kane '88, a resident of Carter House, said that when he returned from the football game he met a security guard who told him to check his room to see if anything was missing. "He said that a lot of drawers had been gone through," Kane said.

Although Kane lost only about $3, he said that the thieves had taken his walkman from his room but dropped it in the living room of his suite.

Party report calls for bartenders, clean-up

by Andrew Mayer

Last week the Committee on Undergraduate Life released a four-page report recommending certain changes in alcohol and party policy at Williams. The report considers five areas of College policy: party registration, regulation of alcoholic beverages, security's role at parties, party clean-up and closing-hours.

The CUL recommended that regulations for party registration distinguish between large and small parties. A small party would be defined as an unadvertised party with no more than 35 guests, all of whom generally know one other, according to the CUL study. A large party, which could be advertised, would be one held in a public space with more than 35 guests.

The report recommends that small parties not be required to register with Security. It suggests the hosts assume responsibility for monitoring the number of guests and making sure those attending are Williams students or invited guests.

Alcohol regulation

"In the event that such requirements may seem necessary," the committee recommended additional methods of regulating service of alcoholic beverages at parties, including quantity limitation or bar service. The committee suggested, "The quantity of alcoholic beverage would be limited in some ratio to the expected size of the party."

The bar service would be provided by trained student bartenders, paid by the College at the highest rate on the pay scale for student employees. The bartenders would be expected to require proof of age and to refuse to serve an intoxicated student.

The committee clarified its perceptions of three present duties of security officers at parties. Security should be responsible for

Behind Closed Doors

By urban standards, Williams is a haven of safety, but it is not crime-free. When a student does violate College or local laws, there is often no information available on how the administration is dealing with the incident. Students must rely on innacurate rumors to discover how disciplinary policy is being applied. By publicizing the administration's reaction to disciplinary cases, decisions which seem unfair—such as allowing those who destroy College property to get slapped on the wrist while expelling those who temporarily steal fire extinguishers—may become more comprehensible.

The secrecy surrounding disciplinary proceedings makes it appear that an "all or nothing" benchmark is used to mete out punishment. Because Honor and Discipline Committee hearings are closely guarded, students hear only about peers who are expelled/suspended or peers who are punished very mildly.

While each situation should, of course, be treated individually, the College could establish broad guidelines which would let everyone know what to expect if tempted by a prank like steam tunneling or a crime like stealing computers. The letter distributed by the Dean's Office yesterday was a promising start toward developing a clearly understandable policy.

As with the Honor Code, the discipline system is only useful if students understand it and can adhere to it. By informing the campus of what is being done, while not saying to whom, the College protects those who have transgressed while prevent others from future transgressions.

No apology

To The Editor:

Last week's Record contained a letter which I found amusing, to say the least. I am referring to Mary Keller's complaint about the Daily Advisor advertisement for the Spencer House Party which began with the words "NAKED WOMEN". Yes, I admit it. I am the one responsible for that blatant example of women's subjugation. In fact, as I was writing the announcement, my very thoughts were those of attracting some cute "walking embodiments of men's needs" to our party.

No, this is not a public apology. Over-blown, self-righteous letters such as Mary Keller's hardly even deserve recognition. Announcement lead-ins like "NAKED WOMEN", "ILLEGAL DRUGS", or "FREE BEER" serve one purpose and are conceived with one intention in mind, that of catching the eyes of casual Daily Advisor skimmers. If I needed an issue as badly as Mary Keller seems to need one, I could write an unwarranted, self-serving letter about the seriousness of drug abuse and alcoholism.

There is no need for Mary Keller to feel threatened by brief announcements written in jest. "Considering ourselves an Ivory Tower," one would hope that our campus would be free of paranoia and of students who are obviously looking to be offended by something. If my perspective is "warped," then I am proud of it, but something tells me that the word "warped" was applied to the wrong person.

The Law

To The Editor:

Discussions about party regulation and drinking rules are going on in a legal never-never land.

Neither students nor Deans as individuals nor Williams as a corporate entity can make contracts that avoid legal liability.

If the law, civil or criminal, imposes duties of care and responsibility on you, you cannot make enforcable contracts to get out of those obligations. Nice idea, but it's not the law.

Above the Law

To The Editor:

At a recent meeting of the Williams Idea Exchange Forum, our discussion centered on discipline at Williams, specifically discipline relating to criminal acts. This is a matter of grave concern to all students, and the only way to deal with this threatening problem is through community awareness. We are concerned that the College's handling of criminal acts has not furthered awareness, and that the actions taken against the offenders have been mild in comparison to the severe nature of their crimes.

In the course of our discussion, many students recalled specific serious criminal and near criminal acts (grand theft-auto, assault and battery, sexual harassment, etc.) committed by Williams students in which they believed that the punishment did not fit the crime and that the actions were not adequately discussed within the community. Such treatment of these serious problems is counterproductive. Inappropriate disciplinary action (or just the perception of it) creates an environment in which such crimes are not discouraged, but ignored. Failure to discuss these issues openly prevents us from ascertaining and dealing with the true nature and extent of these problems.

We are also concerned that the Administration's visible actions may foster the impression that a Williams student is above the law. During our discussion, we observed that since the disciplinary actions taken in most cases are not made public, students may become unclear about the implementation of school policy, especially as a result of rumors. This confusion, while not the result of the College's actual stated policy, seems the result of the way policy is implemented. The impression that students will not be properly punished induces ignorance and may hinder deterence.

In light of our discussion, the members of the Williams Idea Exchange Forum strongly suggest that the College undertake an examination of its disciplinary policy. It is time for a careful and critical re-evaluation of the College's policies and their enforcement.

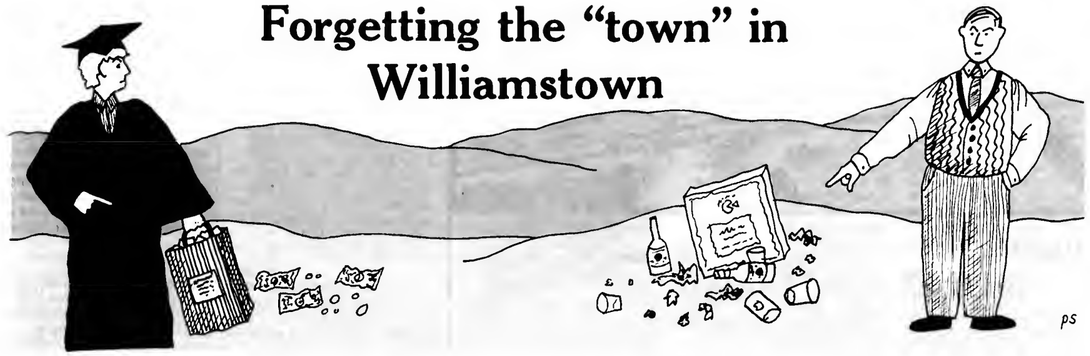
Hyperbole

To The Editor:



I am a firm believer in the equality of women. I do think that the "Naked Women..." ad in the Advisor (alluded to in Mary Keller's letter to the editor last week) was silly, but, in all honesty, there are things going on in this world more deserving of Keller's reaction. The ad was a joke. Not a particularly necessary or creative one, but not a "glaring example" of the subjugation of women.

Okay, why didn't the author write "Naked Men..."? Because the author is a male, writing from his own perspective. I think it would be a great idea if students stepped out of their own perspectives once in a while and saw through someone else's eyes the way they treat other races, genders, or ages. Would it have made any difference if the author had written "Naked Men..."? The ad was meant to catch the reader's eye, the key word being naked, not women. No contempt for the female gender was intended.

As a member of Spencer House, I'm sorry if the ad was offensive to anyone. But I'm sorrier that last week's letter was written in the hyperbolic tone it was. I'm not suggesting that Mary Keller stop writing letters, because there are a lot of "relevant" issues that need to be written about. But the antagonistic, superior tone of last week's letter will result in no good. Maybe the author of that ad will think twice next time. But more likely he will be goaded by the letter and write another ad just to get back at Mary Keller. If we could react constructively to each other, there'd be a lot less hyperbole flying around, and a lot more letters

Forgetting the "town" in Williamstown

by Dagmar Bubriski

For most of the residents of Williamstown, it would come as a distinct shock to be told by a Williams College student, as I recently was, that except for their presence here, there would be no community. An attitude of this sort obviously does not encourage a pleasant atmosphere in the neighborhood.

Perhaps more important is the fact that his attitude is posited and nurtured on the Williams campus and has become a real cause for general concern. It is very obvious in the college's dealings with the town, as well as the students' attitude toward both the college and the town. Conceited and egocentric as they may be, such feelings do not spring forth from nowhere.

I may very well boil down to "I pay a small fortune to come to this place, and I was chosen from a field of several thousand, and I am going to demand what I consider to be my rights." Implicit in all that may very well also be "and to — with you all." And so we seem to have entered the "Age of Arrogance." The evidence is all around us.

Perhaps some day a disinterested party will do an economic survey of the town and the area to see exactly wherein our economic basis may lie. Suffice it to say that outside the college payroll and a number of Spring Street businesses, realtors, and contractors, it would be difficult for most residents to assess any economic benefit derived from the presence of Williams College. Culture and recreational benefits, yes. By all means. And the benefit of a very interesting mix of people.

Situated as it is in the very midst of this attractive old town, the college has had to cope with a good many problems in its rapid growth and expansion of facilities. But many of these problems could have been greatly reduced by better communication and planning with the town. The fact that a busy state highway runs right through the town and the campus could have been taken into serious consideration, and major new buildings should have occurred on the north side of the road as previously urged by the town, and we would not have angry students walking in front of our cars every day on their way to classes to the tune of squealing brakes.

With all the land the college has acquired over the years, there is no excuse for an enormous gym to take up valuable commercial and parking space in the midst of our downtown. There is no excuse for the building of a new infirmary in the midst of a heavily congested old residential area next to a wetland. There is also no excuse for insisting on converting lovely old houses into student dormitories in a residential area and all that that action entails, or the converting of another old house in another residential area into a physies office.

To the residents of the town this all looks very suspiciously like block-busting, and is particularly surprising in an old and distinguished land-rich institution. Why does it seem that Williams does not care about preservation of fine old buildings and houses? Why do we not have historic districts in our lovely and irreplaceable downtown area? Why does the town seem to be unable to get the college to cooperate with its planning board or long-range planners? How can neighbors hope to work together for the mutual good when one of them will not participate except on its own terms?

How can neighbors hope to work together for the mutual good when one of them will not participate except on its own terms?

If there is a problem in housing the present student population, perhaps the next priority should be adequate dorm space on campus and away from all long-suffering residential areas. Why should the local taxpayers have to put up with all-night noisy drinking parties, litter all over their lawns and streets, parking of endless vehicles, ball-playing in the streets, and insulting behavior? Colleges these days are big business, and like all businesses they must be made to realize that they must adequately provide for their clients, the students, without infringing on the rights of others.

If living off-campus was made to seem a privilege, If only students who had proved themselves responsible members of society were given that opportunity, if some provision for supervision were provided, some guidance and assistance, there would be far fewer problems. The same is true of cars. There is no real need for a car on this campus. If some discrimination were used in granting this privilege, there would be less need for parking spaces. Furthermore, if serious consideration is given to good community rapport, and it is expected that students will be mannerly and considerate of others and taken to task if they are not, there may be some improvement in community relations as well as on the campus.

Basically, a resident college like Williams is a transient kind of place. The students spend four years and go on, and many of the faculty and administration do much the same. Perhaps it might be possible to conjure up some interesting ways for the college population to explore the world outside their cloistered walls and partake in some community efforts and discovery. This might engender some mutual understanding and respect.

Heard on every side of the occasion of the recent presidential inauguration were expressions of delight over the choice of Frank Oakley, a well known local resident. An acclaimed scholar, a proven administrator, and a very personable and perceptive individual, he is a long time town resident and homeowner, and he has shared the community's concerns for over 20 years. Under his leadership let us hope that Williams will at last lay down the bricks and mortar, raise high the standard of scholarly pursuit and good citizenship, and Williams will lead us once more into an era of enlightenment.

Williamstown resident Bubriski first published this Op-ed in the North Adams Transcript.

would be taken seriously. Demanding a public apology is a little farfetched, don't you think? I applaud the un-apathy, but not the antagonism. Keller's disgust and incredulity is better reserved for incidents like the recent violence between Williams and North Adams students. It should not be wasted on Spencer's joke.

Rally

To The Editor:

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coaltion would like to communicate to the college community its disappointment over the continued recalcitranee on the part of the ACSR (Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility) to change its current policy. To our knowledge a resolution to circulate a proscribed list of Sullivan Principle non-signatorles to stock managers has been proposed, but the outcome of that vote is presently unknown. If the resolution did pass, it is a good first step for the ACSR. If the resolution was defeated, however, it signals to the college community that the ACSR is content to conduct business as usual in South Africa.

WAAC views with alarm the seeming contradictions within ACSR policy and in numerous non-productive conversations with the ACSR forthcoming. In comments to individual students, Trustees have expressed the position that divestment would be giving in to student pressure, and giving in to student pressure would be a mistake. In light of the above, WAAC and representatives of the Black Student Union invite all members of the college community to attend a rally from 12:30 until 1:00 this Wednesday afternoon on the steps of Chapin, to demonstrate solidarity with the majority-sanctioned divestment petition and to voice the concern that administration disregard of student opinion will not be accepted by the student body. Professors Spear and Tauber will speak, as will representatives of the BSU and WAAC.

Correction

To The Readers:

Last week's article, "Frat History: Part III," was, shall we say, rather baffling. The Record (that is, the editor responsible for this literary carnage), offers a humbie apology in lieu of his column. O.K., I blew it. But, in true sporting fashion, readers are invited to reassemble the article to its natural configuration: the pieces are all there, the picture's just a little eloudy. Consider it a contest. The prize? A platonic truth, of sorts. Sorry, Corinna.

Student arrested

The case against a Bates College student charged with the attempted murder of the college's dean will go before a grand jury this week in Androscoggin County, Maine, according to Stuart C. Greene, director of the news bureau at Bates.

Cain Rollins, a junior at the Lewiston, Maine college, was arraigned in Southern Androscoggin District Court last week and charged with attempted murder in the shooting of Bates Dean James W. Carignan, Greene said.

Carignan was shot in the back on Oct. 21, as he sat in the kitchen of his home on the edge of the Bates campus. Carignan was released from the Central Maine Medical Center Nov. 2, Greene said.

Rollins, 20, of Peekskill, N.Y., was arrested in his dormitory room on the evening of Nov. 1, Greene said. He is being held in the Androscoggin County Jail, Greene said.

Carignan is the dean in charge of discipline on the campus, according to Greene.

College Council

At its meeting last week, the College Council approved a proposal calling for a two-fold system for punishing underage drinkers at the Log and legal drinkers who purchase alcohol for those who are underage. This discussion followed the Council's proposal, made two weeks ago, asking for the elimination of the two-drink limit with a pledge system to be installed instead.

"A fine imposed on both the undcraged drinker and the purchaser of the alcohol would provide an individual incentive to adhere to the alcohol policy," the proposal said. It also recommended that a limit be set on the number of infractions tolerated, and if the number were exceeded, unlimited drinking privileges for all students be withdrawn. "(It) would provide a group incentive to ensure that the alcohol policy is respected," the proposal said.

The Council did not mention specific fine levels or infraction limits, keeping to general terms in its discussion. It did propose that names of pledge violators and how many times each pledge violator had been caught be made public.

Seaport program

The Williams-Mystic program, which allows juniors to spend a semester living in cooperative houses at the Mystic Seaport Museum focusing on studies of the sea, will host an informational meeting Wednesday, Nov. 13, at noon in the Gibson Room of Dodd House. The program takes advantage of the institution's maritime collections, marine laboratory and coastal location, according to a press release from the program.

Four academic courses are offered: American maritime history, maritime literature, marine biology or oceanography and a multi-disciplinary seminar in the uses of the sea. Students develop maritime skills with classes in boat-building, celestial navigation or small-boat handling.

Each semester students spend ten days off-shore aboard the schooner R I Westward, doing scientific research and gaining experience on a large sailing vessel.

The Mystic Seaport program aims for a better understanding of the sea itself, the human race's need for its many resources and the impact of modern society upon it, according to the release.

Former participants in the program have carried the knowledge they gained into careers in marine science, medicine, environmental studies, teaching, museum work and law.

Chemistry contest

Chris Klipstein '89 won the second annual Dunkin' Donuts Chemical Element Sentences Contest with a 56-word entry. Professor James Skinner of the chemistry department presented Klipstein with fresh donuts in Chemistry 101 class on Nov. 4.

Second and third place winners Jane Lewis '89 and Jenny Grant '89 also received donuts. Skinner said that Klipstein's entry broke the previous college record in the contest held by Debbie Wald '86.

The contest consists of composing the longest possible sentence using only the symbols for the chemical elements.

Skinner said, "The contest confirms the College's commitment to improve the writing skills of the students."

Scholar touts feminism

by John Faust

"The challenge is whether society can genuinely be democratic and induct women as full citizens or whether it's going to remain what I would call sexually particular," Carole Pateman said last week.

Pateman, a professor at the University of Australia and Princeton University, addressed "Can Citizenship be Democratic?: The Challenge of Feminism" in a lecture to students and faculty.

Pateman said that what she perceives to be the exclusion of women from democratic political life is not a new problem. She said that theorists such as Locke and Rousseau, despite their espousal of basic democratic principles, believed that women should occupy a subordinate position to men. "It is not possible," she said, "to be both naturally subject and naturally free and equal."

No 'working husbands'

Now that women are in the public sphere, male dominance is exerted in different ways, according to Pateman. One of these is the use of phrases such as "the working wife" and "the working mother," when "the working father" is never used, she said.

Incidents of sexual harassment in the workplace also indicate women's exclusion from society and full citizenship, she said. "There really is an enormous theoretical and social distance that we have to travel before we can have anything that we could call a genuinely democratic society," she said.

Pateman finds a manifestation of polical exclusion in the issue concerning a woman's right to give and withold sexual consent. "It has been legally possible for a husband to rape his wife," she said. "At one and the same time, we have women being granted citizenship, at least formally, yet denied the status of an individual who can consent in that very important part of our lives.

"(The law believes) a woman doesn't know that when she says 'no' she means 'yes,'" she explained. If women's speech is considered unrepresentative of their feelings, Pateman asked, "How can they take part in the democratic debate as citizens?"

Answer to problem

Citing the example of what she perceives to be the masculine dress of women executives, Pateman said she believes the answer to the problem does not lie in making women masculine but in recognizing the sexes as distinct and in evaluating the attributes and contributions of each. "Only this sort of theory," she said, "holds out the hope that eventually women and men will come together as citizens in the democratic community."

piece of Ziemba's nose. Police found the nose part and it was taken, along with Ziemba, to the Berkshire Medical Center in Pittsfield.

Ziemba, who was released from the medical center Nov. 7, said that doctors had not been successful in reattaching the part to his nose, but that he has had some reconstructive surgery and will have to have more.

Ziemba declined to discuss the incident and said he had not decided whether to file charges. When asked who had started the fight, he said, "I don't want to disclose any information. I don't remember exactly what happened."

Dean of the College Stephen Fix said the College is cooperating with the Williamstown police in the investigation. No College disciplinary action has been taken against any students involved in the incident. "When a student allegedly does something that is a cause of concern to the law and the College, both parties could take action," Fix said.

"If legal charges are brought, however, a student may request a suspension of College proceedings until the conclusion of the public investigation and trial," he said.

Rape counselors train

by Julie Convisser

"Rape is an issue to be dealt with—I want to find out how it can be dealt with on a personal level, and what can be done in general," said K.K. Roeder '88, who joins 22 Berkshire County women—16 of them Williams students—each Tuesday night in Pittsfield for Rape Counseling Training sessions at the Rape Crises Center of Berkshire County. At the end of the six-week training session, the 22 participants will be qualified Rape Counselor Hot-line Call Receivers/Counselors, although most of the Williams students will wait until Winter Study to begin volunteering at the Center in Pittsfield.

The Rape Crises Center of Berkshire County, which was started less than seven years ago with a government grant by one volunteer, now employs three-and-a-half trained therapist/counselors, and this past year counseled 200 clients (child victims of sexual abuse and adult victims of rape and sexual assault) and 100 "significant others" (parents and spouses of victims).

The Center has developed extensive community education out-reach programs to increase understanding and awareness about child abuse and rape. In addition, it operates the twenty-four hour confidential hot-line and offers longer-term counseling and support groups for victims and families of sex-related crimes.

The Center's primary educational mission focuses on dispelling myths surrounding sexual abuse of children and rape in order to free victims of sexual crimes from the destructive and unfounded feelings of inadequacy and shame associated with the experience. Lynn Marlowe, one of the Center's counselor/educators, said that when she goes to elementary schools to conduct awareness programs (the Center quotes statistics that one in every four American children is sexually abused), "We try to teach children the difference between 'good touches' and 'bad touches,' and that no one has the right to touch them in 'that way' which hurts and shames them. We let them know that they are totally within bounds by saying 'No!' and most importantly, that if it has happened to them they in no way brought it upon themselves."

Rape myths

Helping victims of sexual crimes to understand that they were victims of violence and in no way were responsible for the assault may be even more difficult among adult female victims of rape than among children, according to the Rape Crises Center counselor/trainers, because women are often blamed for their victimization by a public that is misinformed about the real circumstances of rape.

Rape educators statistically demonstrate that in more than half of all rapes the victim knows her assailant and the offense takes place in her own home; convicted rapists often reiterate in testimony and interviews that the victim was chosen simply on the basis of her vulnerability and availability and not at all on the basis of "attraction" to that particular victim. The Center's education programs aim to defuse common myths about rape such as "most rapes happen in dark alleys," "most rapists are sex-starved psychopaths," and "she brought it on herself by being seductive and/or stupid."

According to trainee Melissa Perkins '86, additional education about rape is essential so that men and women do not confuse rape and sex. Identifying rape as rape is the key, according to Marlowe, to lessening the psychological damage some women suffer due to self-blame over a violent or humiliating

Trumpeter Ferguson gives charged concert

by Eric Hanson

He may not be quite "The World's Greatest Trumpet Player," but he certainly has endurance. Thursday night Maynard Ferguson proved he can still screech with the best of them when he led led his orchestra in a Chapin Hall concert sponsored by the SAC and produced by Rob Moreland '87.

Sporting a pared-down 10-man outfit and a sound that has lost a little of its edge, Ferguson blew through a two-hour performance that featured both new material and many of the tunes that helped him gain prominence as a band leader in the 1960's and 70's.

Ferguson's band, traditionally young and extremely talented, moved smoothly through two sets of music that spared no player the opportunity for solos. The first few tunes featured saxophone soloists Tim Ries and Rick Marquito, and a very prominent rhythm section that, unfortunately, often overpowered the soloists.

The band settled into a definite groove by their third selection, a heavy funk chart called "Central Park" in which bassist Dave Carpenter established himself as a worthy soloist in addition to being a solid member of the rhythm section.

Ferguson himself throughout the concert shared the spotlight

A look at B&G's TLC

by Cindy Soohoo

"We take care of all the facilities (water, heat, and electricity), supply your hot water for your shower, remove your rubbish, clean your toilets and plow your sidewalk. If you get us mad at you're really in trouble," said Buildings and Grounds Director Winthrop Wassenar, who heads a staff of 120 people.

B&G is responsible for the maintenance, repair, renovation, cleaning and construction of all buildings and grounds. Its staff includes an architect, two engineers, carpenters, electricians, plumbers, painters and groundskeepers.

"I think the big complaint is heat control around the campus. Because of the design of the system, there can only be one or two temperature sensors in the whole building, and you can't balance the temperature in the rooms. The thing to do if someone is really cold is to keep calling us," said Don Clark, supervisor of mechanical trades.

The Record recently asked students: "What are your favorite and least favorite dishes served here at Williams?"

Interviews by Midori Sonoda; photographs by Chris Oldham.

"Linguini is my least favorite; it did not agree with me at all. Lasagna is my favorite because it's very hard to ruin." — Gordon Jones '89

"You mean food? Chicken cutlets are definitely the best because they taste as close as possible to Mom's cooking. My least favorite is any type of stew or goulash stuff because it's just too gravylsh." — Evan Zahner '87

"I like spaghetti and meatballs the best. You can't wreck spaghetti too badly. I hate the fish here since it's either undercooked or overcooked. It also tastes like cardboard." — Sam Beltran '87

"When the salad bar is really bad, I'm in trouble because I'm a vegetarian and that's about all they have. The veggie dishes are pretty bad. The spanikopita is good, though." — Kristl Foster '86

"I like chicken cutlets the best because you don't have to pay for them. The worst food is moussaka—you really don't know what's in it." — Lawton Hawkins '87

"My least favorite is definitely moussaka since it seems like it is leftover everything from that week and the week prior to that one. I like pasta a lot; the pasta salads and dishes have been really good this semester." — Karen Sampson '86

sexual experience. According to Marlowe, "A woman who has been raped may not be able to acknowledge that fact to herself. Women are trained to be passive...we have become accustomed to not being taken seriously, and to internalize our anger at things in the outside world into guilt."

Rape counselors/educators feel that conducting discussion about rape is important for men as well as women, since both men and women suffer from the fear, the alienation between men and women on the issue of sex, and the devaluation of intimacy and sharing that prevalent and unrecognized victimization of women causes.

Marlowe believes that college men and women can benefit from a better understanding of the rape issue, and stated, "It's especially difficult for men to talk about rape—there's a lot of resistance and discomfort, which just goes to show how men suffer over it too. So who can lose if we all learn to be more clear about sex, to take that one moment to ask, 'Are you sure? Do we want to do this?' And college women, like all women, have to understand that they have the right not to be coerced into doing something they don't want to do just as much as they have the right not to be physically forced into doing something."

Counseling training

The Rape Counselor Training Program is comprised of weekly three-hour long lecture-/discussions on myths and definitions of rape; homophobia and racism sensitivity training; sexual assault and crisis counseling; medical, police and court issues; and includes role-playing exercises. The participation of Williams students was arranged by the College's Feminist Alliance, which according to Perkins, "wanted to get involved in the larger community—not to be so isolated in the College campus. We wanted to get more involved in concrete things to help women in a real way, not simply be a forum for abstract discussion."

Some participants, like Mackie Foster '86 worry that the six-week course is not challenging or complete enough to prepare them for the critical position of Rape Crises Counselor. Marlowe pointed out, however, "It really is a terrifying thing, dealing with rape. I don't think anyone ever feels totally ready to be a counselor. Only experience can teach what training prepares you for."

Many other participants feel that their involvement—in addition to providing information and increasing awareness—has allowed them, as Ameiie Zurn '86 described, "to gain perspective on themseives in the larger scale." Zurn continued, "Somehow it is easy here for a woman to think that money, education and privilege are a ticket out of victimization, a cushion between us and the ugliness of other worlds. We have the false sense at Williams that we have the power and strength to prevent it, like if you're a 'good girl' and do your homework it won't happen to you. But you realize that nobody thinks it'll happen to them. And nobody is 'bad' or careless enough to be raped!"

For some, the training has permitted insight into the feelings of those on campus who might suffer the psychological scars of a bad experience that they mistakenly feel they brought upon themselves. Maureen Murray '86 stated, "The scariest thing for me is not even the statistics—I was familiar with that stuff. It's the idea that there are probably women at Williams who have had an experience that they are so ashamed about and so sure was their fault that they don't even identify it as rape. There's a real scenario in our heads about rape—the creep lurking in the alley—and if a situation doesn't fit it then it may be horrible, scary and violating, but it's not called rape!"

Although rape is a grim and frightening subject, many of the Williams participants in the Counselor Training Program share Perkins' sentiments about the positive aspects of the training: "Discussing the training with men here on campus has given me an appreciation for men who are honest about their sexuality and the scariness of sexual violence, and who are not so hung up on gender identity that they feel threatened by talking about it with women. Learning about rape and how to deal with it with other women has meant that for us it is no longer a private issue, a hidden, shadowy fear. After going through this, when you get into your car at night and you pause to check to see if there's anyone lying in wait on the seat you don't have to think you are the only one who is afraid, that you are a loser or are stupid or weak. You can say: 'It's O.K. to be careful, we all have to be careful.'"

A "rape crisis" may not only be a recent experience; it may be overwhelming feelings that suddenly arise over a past experience. The Rape Crises Center of Berkshire County offers twenty-four hour confidential phone counseling at 443-0089. The Center also conducts support groups for victims of sexual assault.

between 1 and 6 a.m. Clark remarked that it is amazing how some students have figured out how to override complicated heating sysems. Students realized that plates that looked like light switches in Mission Park were really temperature sensors for the newly installed energy management system. "They put cold toilet paper on the sensors to override the system," Clark explained.

In addition to preventive maintenance, B&G must repair all the damage that occurs throughout the year. Eighteen thousand dollars is allocated to repair the damage of student housing and $4,000 is allocated for educational buildings. Damage includes such things as broken windows, sinks ripped out of the walls, or ruts made in the fields from people driving over them.

Wassenar recalled that walls have even been knocked out, noting, "About ten years ago in Greylock there was a 'Beat the Clock' party where students took large hammers and literally beat a clock, knocking walls in."

Cleaning and custodial services are a big part of B&G's duties. Custodians are assigned to buildings and are responsible for their public areas, bathrooms, adjacent grounds and trash removal. "Most of our people take tremenduous pride in their buildings," said Bob Fowler, assistant director for adminstrative and housekeeping services.

Fowler is currently working on a training program for the 54 custodians and four supervisors. He pointed out that the turnover rate at Williams is very low, and remarked, "We have some top-notch people with a lot of experience." Custodians average about twelve years working here; the national average is between one-and-a-half and two years.

"People generally like working for Williams," said Wassenar. "People care about you. There's much more of a feeling of humanity than making gidgets and gadgets."

Edifice complex

Wassenar also commented on the recent splurge in campus construction, saying, "There's been more building going on in the last two years here than during the previous twenty." Projects in process include the new gym, the infirmary on Hoxsey St., the renovation of the physics building, an addition to the art museum and the enlargement of the field behind the tennis courts. Wassenar's office is filled with blueprints and plans for the construction.

Plans for the future include renovation of the old gym, a new track on Cole Field and the second phase of the Bronfman renovation during which four new classrooms will be constructed. B&G is involved with all phases of construction, including sitting on committees, corresponding with the architect, bidding for the construction, and supervising the actual construction.

In addition to construction, B&G puts in security systems and does carpentry work. Carpenters are in the process of replacing the gingerbread decorations from the roof of Dodd which have deteriorated. "You just can't go out and buy these things. One of the pieces had to be taken down and copied. These people are craftsmen. There's a lot of pride in the workmanship," stated Fowler.

Ferguson

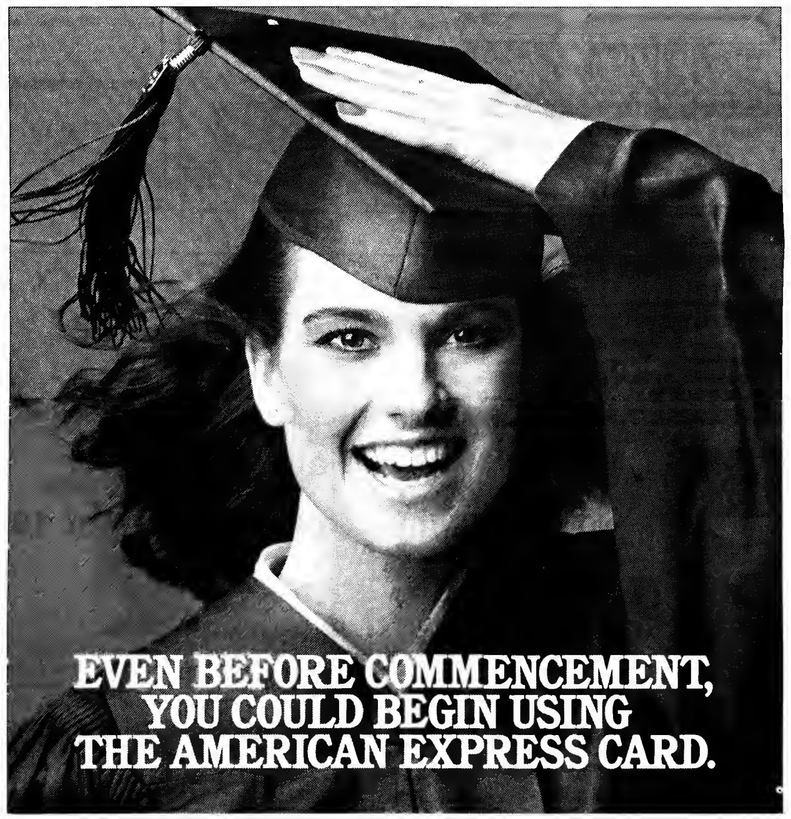
with other members of the band and, for the most part, seemed content to jump in at certain moments with blistering high notes and then withdraw.

While he has understandably lost something in the area of range and sound, he has maintained every bit of the showmanship that has become his trademark over the years. Both the raised arms and astonished "Did I play that?" look that he sports after an impressive jaunt into the upper register added a fitting touch of comedy to the show. The members of the band genuinely seemed to enjoy themselves while on stage and were casual about nearly everything but their actual playing.



Ferguson's orchestra was at its best when loudest, and it created an amazing amount of energy and intensity on its higher-powered charts. Yet while Ferguson's crowd-pleasers are traditionally driving tunes such as "Chameleon," "Rocky," and the show's encore "Birdland," he has not lost the ability to slow the pace and deliver an effective ballad, as he proved in the performance of "Beautiful Hearts." The piece featured Ries on alto saxophone and Ferguson on flugelhorn and concluded with a delicate, unamplified exchange between the two soloists in the hall's center aisle.

The show was also far from lacking in the novelty department. The audience was treated to a simultaneous alto/soprano saxophone solo by Ries, a percussion solo performed with fluorescent-tipped drumsticks, a rendition of the Beatles' "Hey Jude" with band members scattered throughout the hall, and even some scat-singing by Ferguson himself.

Despite some minor inconsistencies, Ferguson put on a slick, well-orchestrated show that rarely failed to entertain—a credit to a man who has been stretching the limits of the trumpet's range for over 25 years.

from this practice, according to Applebaum, in order to allow them immediate access to funds.

"They have never been directly accountable to the College Council's treasurer before, and thus have never organized their accounts with that in mind," said a brief about past administrations submitted by the SAC. The brief points to sloppy bookkeeping, untidy business practices and the vagueness of Financial Committee funding recommendations as reasons for incurring the debt.

"The people who were really the most at fault were the three treasurers (from last year) and none of them are on campus," said Applebaum. He added that current Chairman Hans Humes '87 had inherited the debt and had worked with the Finance Committee to remedy the situation.

The SAC will no longer use cash from ticket sales to pay expenses, according to Humes. The brief that SAC submitted says that cash was often used to finance activities and thus never appeared on the books of the treasurer. "All ticket revenues (will) go into the funds," Humes said at the CC meeting.

According to the brief, which was written by Humes and Ajata Medlratta '87, SAC treasurer, all financial aspects of the organization will now be consolidated in the hands of a treasurer who will be accountable to the College Council treasurer and to the Comptroller's Office. The brief also said that in the past various officers were able to withdraw funds, and frequently the treasurer did not have a firm grip on the financial situation.

"I really feel that this solution is the most acceptable for both the SAC and CC," said Humes. He added that while the budget would amount to half of last year's funding, "we can work with $22,000."

Humes said that he would not allow the the SAC to go into debt this year, and added that "I may go through a year and a half or two years (as SAC chairman), whatever it takes to get it in order."

maintaining order at parties but only in conjunction with the host, who should continue to bear the primary responsibility, according to the CUL. Security should continue not to be responsible for enforcing the Massachusetts drinking laws or for seeing that intoxicated students do not receive more alcohol, the proposal said.

The committee recommended that security officers monitor alcohol regulation and prevent guests from circumventing it. The security officer would inform the Deans' Office when the hosts violate their proposed method of regulation, and the house or organization would receive demerit points and not be allowed to host a party for a specific period of time, according to the CUL proposal.

Students who attempt to get drinks without being served or to intimidate the bartender would also be reported to the Deans' Office.

Clean-up crews

The CUL report recommended, "When parties are held in dining halls, hosts (should) be required to retain the services of a member of the Food Services staff." The Food Service employee, paid by the hosts, would help students with the use of facilities and equipment and supervise clean-up after the party.

The CUL also recommended that Food Service not require deposits for equipment signed out during parties, although students would be expected to pay for any damages.

Finally the CUL recommended that Saturday-night parties be allowed to last until 2:00 a.m., an hour longer than the present shutdown time. The committee also suggested that during Winter Study, the closing hour for weeknight parties be extended to 1:00 a.m., also a one hour extension.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix declined comment on the CUL study and on a College Council proposal for a system of monitoring drinking at the Log. "Just as I wanted the studies done comprehensively, I want to respond in a comprehensive way. I hope any changes we would make would be in place second semester," he said.

Water polo finishes season 8-8

by Frank Vespe

It was a strange sort of weekend for the Williams water polo team. In the Eastern Tournament, the Ephs lost two of three games; one of the losses and the only victory were both influenced by odd occurrences at the end of the game.

The team had qualified for the tourney by finishing third in the New Englands, losing the preliminary game to Boston College and beating the University of Connecticut in the consolation.

The Ephs were pounded by number one seed Johns Hopkins in the Eastern opener, 16-7. The score was 5-4 at the half, with Hopkins in the lead. "And then we fell apart," said captain Will Andrew '86, who scored four times. "After we got a couple goals down, we let them walk all over us," he noted.

In their last two games, the Ephs managed to turn things around a bit amidst some strange doings.

They defeated an inferior Cornell team by a deceiving 10-8 score. The Ephs ran up a 7-2 lead, but failed to maintain a safe margin. "We let them come creeping back at us," noted Andrew.

The Big Red had closed the score to 9-8 when the first bizarre play occurred. With a minute-and-a-half to play, Williams had the ball. A Cornell defender clobbered Andrew illegally—his action resulted in his being ejected and Andrew's receiving a four meter penalty shot.

Andrew converted the shot for his sixth goal to give Williams the insurance they needed. Other scorers for Williams were John Cooke '88 and Dave Johnson '88 with one apiece and Dean Pomeleau '87 who had a pair of goals.

The Ephs' final game was a controversial 11-10 loss to R.P.I. The Engineers led with thirty seconds to play, according to the referees, and Williams had the ball. Ten seconds later, the whistle blew ending the game right as Williams was on a break away to the goal. According to Andrew, even the referees were surprised at the shortness of the 30 seconds, but the decision stood.

The team finished the topsy-turvy season with a record of 8-8, ranked sixth in the East in Division II. The Ephmen made strong showings in the New England and Eastern tournaments to end the year well.

on the front of its sports section of Sunday. The New York Times also covered the game, as former Dallas Cowboy and Washington Redskin tight end Jean Fugett (Amherst '72) wrote a piece for their sports section describing his memories of his three Amherst-Williams games. "It was a need more than a desire to be the best," he said, "to beat Williams."

Closed-circuit television provided the ony live look at the contest, as 29 cities nationwide received the broadcast announced by Bob Lobel of WBZ-TV in Boston, Fugett, and former Colt and Patriot Jack Maitland (Williams '70). In addition, a crowd of over 12,000 attended the game at Weston field.

The Lord Jeffs threatened to make a mockery of this game when they jumped to a 35-0 lead after three quarters of play. The Ephs bounced back late in the game, however, behind the exciting play of reserve quarterback Scott Powers '88 who threw for one touchdown and ran for another in the last seven minutes of the game.

Statistically, the Lord Jeffs dominated play the entire game, racking up 426 yards in total offense to only 226 yards for the Ephs. Foye's precision passing led the way for the Amherst squad, as he continually riddled the Eph secondary with tosses to his favorite receiver John Tucci, who garnered seven aerials for 120 yards and two touchdowns. Kevin Minicus, Scott Lebo, and William Okun picked up 61, 59, and 59 yards respectively to pace the balanced Amherst running attack.

The only bright spot for the Williams offense was the play of Powers, who entered the game at the start of the fourth quarter and completed six of eleven passes for 94 yards and one touchdown, a forty-yard scoring strike to junior John Shaw. Powers was also the Ephs' leading rusher, with 40 yards on six carries, including a 20-yard scoring scamper. The Ephs final touchdown came on a four-yard run by Mark Meyer '88 with just 1:32 left in the game.

"Amherst is a fine football team. They're just quicker than we are," said Eph coach Bob Odell.

Geoff Kass got in on the next try by stripping the ball out of the scrum a giving it to Harris. Harris had it out to Lattimore, who had his best defensive game of the year, who ran the ball in for the score.

The final Williams score was another scrum try. Mike Goldstein was the scrummie who touched this one down after tough play by Mike Zullas '86 and Sean Brennan '87. Williams did not get the shutout because of two penalty kicks late in the game. The victory however was insured and the Killer B's ended their undefeated season with new jerseys.

The C game was a tough battle, but once again Williams came out on top. The final score was 10-0, a score that spells good news for the future of the club. Scoring for the C-side was done by John Hollenberger '88 and Bill Boyd '88 each getting a penalty kick and Sean Cook '88, who touched down a try in the waning moments of the game.

Eph comeback too late, Jeffs take 100th game

In a game saluted by President Ronald Reagan, Amherst quarterback Paul Foye completed 16 of 23 passes for 200 yards and three touchdowns to lead the Lord Jeffs over the Ephmen in the 100th contest between the two small-college rivals.

Prlor to the game, the players from the two squads were read a letter of commendation from the President which said, in part, "This rivalry, perhaps the longest running in small-college football, represents the best of this country's tradition of scholar-athletes." In addition, Silvio O. Conte, the Republican representative of the first district of Massachusetts, entered a statement in the Congressional Record praising the academic excellence of the schools as he marked the football rivalry. "Amherst and Williams have kept their athletic programs in perspective," he said. "These two small schools place emphasis on participation in athletics, rather than specialization."

The game received extensive national and statewide press coverage, led by highlights shown on the sports reports of ESPN and CBS. In addition, the Boston Globe ran a picture of Eph halfback Jay Hickman '86

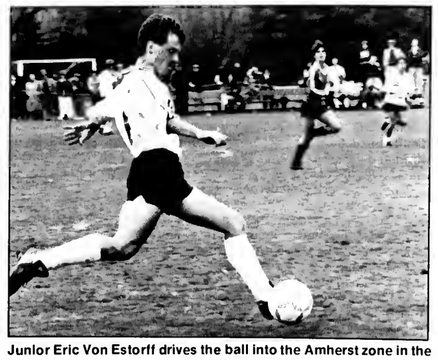
Soccer shuts down Amherst 4-0

by Greg Leeds



The men's soccer team soundly defeated Amherst 4-0 on Saturday, winning the Little Three title and ending a great season at 11-3-1. Senior Clark Otley put in two goals in his last Williams appearance as the Ephmen completely dominated the Lord Jeffs. It was the largest margin by which either team has won the match in many years.

Eric Von Estorff '87 opened the scoring for Williams halfway into the first period, pounding in a shot from close range with an assist from Nikolai Nachamkin '88. The Ephs continued to pressure the Amherst defense, penetrating several times and getting off some close shots.

With 10:50 remaining in the half, Otley scored his first goal, hitting a blistering shot when the Lord Jeff defense failed to clear the ball from the goal area. Just five minutes later, Mike Masters '89 took the ball halfway down the field deep into the Amherst zone, then passed to Nachamkin, who took a shot which was deflected. Otley was there and drilled in the final goal of his Williams career.

The Ephmen continued to control the game in the second half, and the defense was especially impressive. With 23:19 left, Denny Wright '87 scored on a shot to the far post which beat Amherst goalkeeper Josh Blum. Senior co-captain Jeff McEvoy assisted on the play.

The victory was especially impressive given the team's heartbreaking loss to Plymouth

State in the ECAC semifinal game on Friday. Neither team was able to score in regulation time or in two overtime periods, so the outcome was decided by penalty kicks. It was the fourth consecutive year that penalty kicks have decided the semifinal playoff game for Williams.

Williams was again plagued by bad luck. Plymouth State's first shooter, Domenic Durante, scored on Eph goalkeeper Brad Bryan '87. Then junior Helge Weiner's shot for Williams was saved by goalkeeper Terry Dimick. Pat Morrissey of Plymouth State hit the post on the next shot, but so did Pieter Mulder '86. Bruce Hawkins made it 2-0 for Plymouth, but Nachamkin scored for the Ephs.

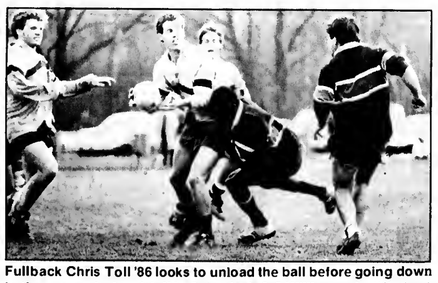
Then Mike Roberts missed wide for Plymouth, but Masters's shot was saved by Dimick. In the deciding shot, Luis Reyes won the game for Plymouth State.

Coach Michael Russo was "just delighted" with the Little Three victory, noting that it was a great finish to an excellent season. "After losing yesterday, to come back and win so decisively today was just fantastic. They are a great group of guys,I can't say enough about them."

Russo noted that seniors McEvoy, Mark Schroeder, Mulder, and Otley will be sorely missed. "They really brought us to where we are today, and I'll miss them." said Russo.

Undefeated ruggers defeat Jeffs 9-3

by Mike Curtin



By sweeping the Lord Jeffs of Amherst this weekend, the Williams Rugby Football Club finished the season undefeated and captured the Little Three Championship for the second consecutive season. All three sides were victorious on and off the pitch as Williams completed another winning season by adding another purple and black jersey to the wardrobe.

Williams came out showing the kind of fire and intesity that they had only been able to achieve in the waning moments of previous games. The line ran right at Amherst showing them from the opening kick that they had come to play. Although smaller than the Amherst pack, the Williams scrum rucked and rolled all over the pitch.

The scoring began early and set the tone for the afternoon. After some loose scrum and tight pursuit, Brad Bisell '86 plucked the ball out of the scrum and tossed it out to Ed O'Toole '86 who then passed it to Steve Troyer '86. Troyer ran it towards the try zone. An Amherst back hit Troyer, but that was not enough to stop the Eph wing. He bounced off the defector and did a 360-degree spin into the try zone. Chris Toli '86 added the conversion and Williams took and early 6-0 lead. Although play was tough for the rest of the half, neither team could put the ball in the try zone.

Amherst gets on the board

The first score in the second half was an Amherst drop-kick which cut the Williams lead to three. Not too discouraged and refusing to let Amherst get too close, the Ephs came back hard. The scrumline connection between Greg Bronson '86 and

Fullback Chris Toll '86 looks to unload the ball before going down in the grasp of a Lord Jeff in Saturday's 9-3 Williams win.(Khakee)

Craig Kirby '86 was working beautifully and a score was imminent. Unfortunately, Williams could not touch the ball down in the try zone. Instead they relied upon the steady foot of fullback Chris Toll '86 who hit a penalty kick from thirty meters putting Williams back on top by six.

The remainder of the half saw Williams holding off Amherst's attempts to score. Behind the inspired play of scrum captain Paul Hogan '86, the white dogs played harder as the game wend ona and insured the victory which topped off the undefeated A-side season.

Taking the field with the same intesity that had characterized the first game, the Killer B's began their assault. From the outset, Williams dominated and the play was mostly in the Amherst half. The scrum, in an amazing display of finessc and conditioning, rolled the ball down to the Amherst try line. Eugene Mazzaro '87 came out of the scrum with the ball seeing nothing but a score. He was held up by the Amherst defense, but passed it off to fellow scrummie Jeff Heilman '87 who dove through the defense for the score.

The next score was a result of smooth line work and the amazing apeed of sophomore winger Andy Harris. Steve Patterson '87 broke through the Amherst line opening up the field as he dished it off to Harris. Harris took the ball behind his 50 and just outran the Amherst defense for the score. Tim Latimore '86 aded the conversion and a subsequent penalty kick making the score 13-0 in favor of Williams.

The final score of the first half was due to Geoff Kass '86. Kass took the ball from Stu Weaver '87 and pop-kicked it into the Amherst try zone. He pursued the ball and pounced on it for his second try of the season. Latimore added the conversion and the score at half was 19-0.

The break at half did not stall the B's or dampen their will. Once again it was Patterson on a pass from standoff Erik Valdes '87 who broke the field open allowing Dave Koota '87 to score.

Lady Jeffs down rugby

by Anne Schmutz

Despite valiant efforts by the Williams A-side, Amherst came away victorious and left the Ephwomen shirtless. In a close struggle where neither team scored a try, the Lady Jeffs scored the only points of the game on a penalty kick to win 3-0.

The seniors played very aggressivly: Becky Haile tackled without consideration to life or limb, Sarah Murphy was an ever present force in all the mauls, Sara Suchman supported her fellow linies, and Slink Roberto looked like a professional. These efforts and those made by Eileen Holland '87 and Sonja Lengnick '88, however, were not enough to defeat their opponents.

Revenge was sweet however as the Killer B's won their game 4-0 on a try by Sara Finnermore '87. The second game was characterized by a bloodthirsty squad of angered Williams ruggers who were determined to avenge the A-side's loss and win shirts of their own. With aggressive hooking by Shawn Moody '87, Williams was able to win a majority of the scrumdowns and get the ball out to the lines who had amazing runs. Jane Amidon '88 and Mo Ford '87 had two consecutive runs that set up the game's only score in the first half.

The second half found Williams sitting on the Amherst try-line, overpowering their opponents, yet unaible to score. As the final whistle sounded, though, Amherst looked cold and forlorn as they handed over their purple and white shirts.

The fall '85 season was one filled with bad weather and tough opponents like UPenn and Boston Women's Club, but the WWRFC sitll managed a respectable record by beating teams like Princeton and University of Southern Connecticutt. In the spring, with one more season of experience under their belts, Williams women's rugby fully expects a winning season and the Little Three crown.

Junior Suzanne Biemiller pitches the ball down the line to outflank the Lady Jeff onslaught. (Khakee)

Duncan arrest in biting case, will be arraigned tomorrow

by Andrew Mayer

Michael Duncan '86 was arrested last Friday by the Williamstown Police and charged with mayhem. He was released on his own recognizance until arraignment in Northern Berkshire Trial Court tomorrow. If convicted, he faces a maximum of either 20 years in prison or a fine not greater than one-thousand dollars and two and one-half years in prison.

Duncan's arrest resulted from a week-long investigation by the Williamstown Police into the Nov. 2 fight between approximately 10 Williams students and three Adams men, in which one of the Adams men had a portion of his nose bitten off.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix was unavailable for comment. Earlier Fix said, "When a student allegedly does something that is a cause of concern to the law and the College, both parties could take action."

Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito called the investigation quite extensive but said it is far from over. Zoito said, "It was a slow start. Nobody wanted to talk to us." He added that this had slowed the investigation because "We only had one side of the story." He is now investigating, among other things, the responsibility of the other people involved.

On the night of Saturday, Nov. 2, the three Adams men, Daniel Ziemba, 18; Raymond Lemoine, 20; and Richard Pizani Jr., 19; were returning home from a nightspot in Pownal, Vt., when their car broke down on North Street. They phoned from a nearby house and arranged to be picked up near the Williams Inn.

According to Zoito, Lemoine sat on a bench near the information booth on North Street, while Ziemba and Pizani went across the street onto campus. On campus, a fight broke out and Ziemba and Pizani ran back across North Street, followed by approximately 10 Williams students. Near the information booth another fight ensued. When a car approached with bright lights, the fight ended and the Williams students fled.

At this point, a piece of Ziemba's nose had already been bitten off. The Williamstown Police found the severed portion and gave it to doctors enroute with Ziemba to Berkshire County Medical Center in Pittsfield. The doctors were unable to reattach the piece to Ziemba's nose.

Zoito said that overall he had received more complaints this year about College students than in the past, adding that most were related to noise or drinking. "I think the responsibility (for the increase in complaints) lies both with the College and the students. Why let it boil off into the streets?" Zoito said.

This North Adams wood (and the horse grazing in it) were covered by the season's first snow. The storm, which occurred late Saturday, left the area under a temporary blanket of white; by Sunday morning temperatures were well above freezing and much of the snow had melted. (Khakee)

Two W'mstn youths nabbed for thefts, some goods found

by R.P. DeMott

Two Williamstown youths will be arraigned in Northern Berkshire Trial Court tomorrow on two counts each of larceny from a building, according to Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito. Robert Derosier III, 17 and James Donlan, 18, were arrested Friday and released. In addition, Donlan was also charged with possession of stolen property.

The arrests resulted from a Williamstown Police Department investigation into the thefts from Carter House on Nov. 9, Homecoming. The police were preparing to question someone trying to sell radios at Mt. Greylock Regional High School last Thursday, and Williams Security provided them with a report of the events occuring at Carter the weekend before.

"It is going very well," said Director of Security Ransom Jenks. "I'm gratified to know that they have a suspect or more than one suspect." He added, "They (the thieves) were taking advantage of the fact that students don't lock their rooms."

The thefts took place during the second half of the football game on Nov. 9 from all of the unlocked rooms in the entry facing Rt. 7. Primarily small electronic devices such as radios and calculators were taken but $300 in cash was also reported missing. Jenks said that the process of getting back the property would be lengthy, and the cash would probably never be recovered.

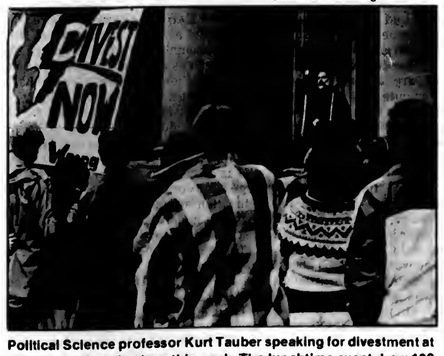
Zoito said that students who lost something in the thefts should check with the Williamstown Police. There were about twelve items recovered, according to Zoito, and people were being questioned about what they lost.

Divestment rally on steps

by Tom Ewing

A group from the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition spent 14 hours in the Admissions Office yesterday. Leaders of the sit-in hoped it would draw attention to what they see as Williams' contradictory policies: the College says it does not discriminate on the basis of race but continues to invest in companies doing business in South Africa.

WAAC also brought its message of "Don't deplore, divest" to the Williams community during a rally held last Wednesday. The rally was the first step of what WAAC hopes will be the final campaign to force Williams College to divest all of its investments in companies that do business in South Africa, according to Elaine Freedman '87, one of the speakers at the event.



In spite of rainy weather, more than 100 people attended the rally in front of Chapin Hall. WAAC has sponsored several events this year including a protest at the inauguration of Francis Oakley as president of the College.

WAAC member Dominic Kulik '86 said that the organization had two demands for the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. The first demand, he said, was that Williams divest from all companies that did not sign the Sullivan Principles (designed to set up a code of conduct for businesses to follow in South Africa). The second demand, said Kulik, was for total divestment from all companies that had investments in South Africa .

Martin White '87, a member of the Black Student Union, said that he questioned the idea that the number one small college could still have investments in South Africa. "How can Williams College be the number one college in the US and still take part in ignorance and racism?" he asked.

Professor Tom Spear of the history department asked the crowd to understand how subtle racism has shaped US policy towards South Africa. "If the 600 people killed by the government in the last year had all been white," he asked, "would the reaction have been the same?" Spear also questioned the idea that divestment was a

Survey shows strict schools suffer

by Anne O'Malley

Colleges that maintain permissive drinking policies have fewer alcohol-related disciplinary problems than schools that strictly enforce drinking laws, according to a study conducted by the American Association of University Students. "Approach(ing) student as a responsible citizen appears to have a better impact" on drinking abuse, the student group reported.

The American Association of University Students is a coalition of student governments at universities all across the country. According to Mark Koide, a senior at Brown and president of the national organization, the goals of the group are to disseminate information among its member schools and to develop research projects to examine common problems.

The alcohol study was the third major research project undertaken by the AAUS. The group sent a lengthy survey to the Deans of Students at 100 universities across the country, concerning their policies on various alcohol-related issues, enforcement of those policies, and the number of alcohol-related disciplinary and vandalism incidents on campus.

The 32 completed questionnaires indicated that alcohol seems to present less of a problem on campuses where the administration allows underage drinking.

For example, the study reported that Stanford University, which was described as having a "permissive" alcohol policy, reported no alcohol-related cases in its student courts in 1983, while the University of Wisconsin, which strictly enforces the state drinking age of 19, attributed 95 percent of its vandalism cases to alcohol.

The student group concluded that de-emphasizing enforcement allowed room for universities to develop constructive programs to deal with alcohol abuse and to "send messages of concern and respect to the students to make their own responsible choices." A large part of the study described college alcohol-related programs which have had positive effects.

Ironically, the administrations' assessments of the campus alcohol situation does not always match the students' views. When informed that his school was listed as having a "permissive" alcohol policy based on the Dean's responses, Yale sophomore Andrew Romanov said, "I don't know why."

According to Lynn Oberlander, another student at Yale, the official policy is that "if you're not legal to drink in Connecticut, you're not legal to drink at Yale." She indicated that the policies used to be more permissive, but that this year the universities had begun to require the hiring of bartenders, at a cost of $18 an hour, to enforce the drinking age.

We tried harder

Sorry Jeffs. It's like they say, "Never look back, because someone might be gaining on you." Two years ago the banner flew in Amherst; now it's our turn.

Yesterday U.S. News and World Report confirmed what those of us connected with Williams have known for years: our institution is the number one small liberal arts college in the nation. Sure, Amherst usurped this crown in '83, but nature arights itself eventually.

We know, of course, the limited meaning of U.S. News' distinction. It might boost applications and alumni contributions, as well as elliminate that grating query, "William and Mary?" And the PR folks will love it. But, if anything, the survey puts the pack at our heels.

Williams isn't on top for its good looks. The students here work very hard under excellent professors and administrators. Extra-curriculars, too, are top-notch, and athletics vigorous. People care about what they're doing.

Getting to the top is only half the job. The real trick is staying there. But for now, we're number one, and Amherst is number three. The Defectors of 1821 have been crushed.

Homophobia

To The Editor:

I'm writing to discuss the defacement of the GLU's "High Energy" poster in Sawyer this past week. This is clearly the action of some over-worked individual who's spent too much time in the library, eh? Or maybe it's just a joke? Perhaps I am unfair, or too pessimistic to believe either of these two options.

We live in a homophobic world, and Williams College is no exception. These "Ivory Towers" do not shield us from violence, sexism, pornography, or any of a long list of undesirable realities, and nor should they. We are here (or so I've always thought) to learn, to confront new ideas, to trouble ourselves with important issues, and to value and respect difference. And obviously, we're having a hard time of it.

I am deeply saddened by this blatant oppression of gays and lesbians. It does not really matter how many people were involved; one is enough. Few people missed that message.

Nobody's saying heterosexuals aren't cool. In fact, there were heterosexual people at the party. The GLU is not exclusive; anyone is welcome.

Help me out. What are we so afraid of? And can we work it out?

TLC?

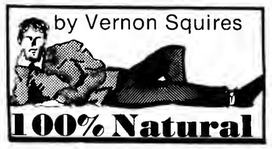
To The Editor:

Last week's article on B&G's TLC was very effective at describing the enormous amount of services that B&G supplies, but it failed to mention an area where they have displayed a great deal of neglect. I am referring to the lighting situation in the MP lot.

All year I have heard complaints about the lack of sufficient lighting along the road to the parking lot. Granted, lights at the four corners of the lot itself have been installed, which help quite a bit, but the road to the lot remains dangerously dark.

The danger became a reality for me last Monday evening when I was chased from the end of the lot's dirt road to the intersection by the tennis courts. I was lucky since the two men who were chasing me seemed more interested in playing a practical joke than in doing anything more drastic, and they turned away once I got under the lights at the intersection.

The lot area is a remote area with or without lights, but I can't help feeling that if the road had been well lit those two men would have decided against harassing me, even as a joke.



Security and the Dean's Office have urged B&G to install lights, and apparently they agree that lights are a necessity, yet the first semester is almost over and lights are still nonexistant. Once the ground freezes it will be virtually impossible for them to be installed and nothing will be able to be done until the spring. This will mean a winter of walking to and

100% Artificial: Charles and Di put on royal show

In case you missed it, last weekend Clint Eastwood ate dinner at the White House, and not just because he's buddies with President Reagan our commander-in-chief who likes Dirty Harry's verbal insignia, "Go ahead, make my day."

Eastwood, you see, was one of many celebrities and VIPs to descend on Washington in honor of Prince Charles and Princess Diana of Wales, who graced our nation with a five-day working vacation.

Now normally I wouldn't trouble to pay attention to the latest blip on our capital's social radar screen. But Charles and Di caught my eye, for their's is a royalty of peculiar breed: the Crown Prince presides over nothing, nada, zip (except, perhaps, his sons William and Henry). Yet here he is, whisking across the ocean to a starry-eyed reception befitting a legend. And then there's Di, scarcely older than we, cutting the rug with John Travolta and tough-guy Clint (do you suppose he asked her to make his day?).

There's something goofy about the whole thing. Purportedly, the Prince hustled over here for social, artistic and commercial reasons. His spokesman (spokesman?) said, however, that Charles wanted "to show the Princess the delights of Washington." That's OK with me, but Chuck ought to watch whose money he's using for a weekend fling to the U.S.A. Aristocracy, huh? Anyhow, the royal twosome did add some lustre to an otherwise dreary November week.

Sunday's White House Dinner must have been marvelous. Imagine sharing cocktails with Clint, Johnny T., Mikhail Baryshnikov, Jacques Cousteau, Dorothy Hamill and Estee Lauder. Then imagine the U.S. Marine Corps Band hammering out their version of "Night Fever" while John and Di got funky on the White House parquet. Wild stuff.

Vice President Bush got into the mood, too, barking out, "Our friends are coming, our friends are coming." Cute, George. But not so cute that the Prince could ignore old scars. Said Charles on Monday, "King George felt that he had a bit of a raw deal in history." Hey, tough luck, George III. You should have thought of that before the Stamp Act.

Times were merry, though, so the blue-blooded couple let bygones be bygones. On Monday, Charles donned "salesman" garb for journeys to a British Art Show and a J.C. Penney department store. No, he wasn't curious about the American shopping-mall mystique, but rather he was plugging imports. (Sounds familiar, eh?)

The demanding schedule didn't preclude play. With 7,000 pounds of luggage in tow, Charles and Di on Tuesday zipped down to Palm Beach so the Prince could play polo and attend yet another ball. In sporting and diplomatic fashion, Charles' team won the match before 12,000 fans who, I daresay, fell short of being polo afficianados. They just wanted to see Charley horse around. Before the game, the Miami Dolphins cheerleaders entertained, as did Mickey and Minnie Mouse on loan from Walt Disney World.

Meantime, back in Washington the National Enquirer crowd pondered the meaning of a jellybean portrait of Di—10,000 of Ronnie's favorites depicted the sweet princess, complete with root beer bean eyelashes and coconut teeth. That's gross—what if it had rained?

As a point in their highnesses favor, the dynamic duo wound up the visit with a charity ball that raised several million dollars for United World Colleges. Charles is director of the United World College movement, which provides education at six locations worldwide to promote understanding of international issues.

This event grants more respectability to an otherwise dippy anglo affair. But let's face it, the Prince is sailing a yacht with full sails and a nice breeze. At 36, he is honorably unemployed and claims his great problem "is that I don't really know what my role in life is." Bummer. I'd say being a prince is just about right.

An American in Oxford: taking on the Old School

by John Austin

This is a true—but slightly exaggerated—account of the first meeting between an American student and his British tutor at Oxford University. The student is John Austin, a junior abroad this academic year on the Williams-in-Oxford program.

He doesn't care who you are or whence you came, but being a jolly, happy-go-lucky American chap from Maryland, you tell him anyway and extend your hand. He doesn't like your hand and you can tell from his stare that he noticed your fingernails were dirty. Realizing this you cram your hand into your pocket. While you face one another he just looks at you as though you wandered into his office wearing nothing save a pair of two-size too small Fruit of the Loom.

"Refresh my memory would you—why are you here?" You're not happy about this situation at all; in fact, you're still amazed he wouldn't shake your hand. But you've been warned about British hygiene and their fetish for germs. While you're thinking how this guy probably disinfects his toothbrush in the microwave, you tell him that you're here for a tutorial, that you've got a paper to read to him on T.S. Eliot. He looks at you bored and a bit wearied, walks to his desk and begins to piddle. You now realize that you're dealing with an eccentric, the type that has been inhabiting O.U. for centuries, an odd fellow who in all probability thinks he's the Ancient Mariner or some such person. "He's living a fairy tale," you conclude. "I'd better not upset him." In violence he begins to itch his scalp, gouging at the source of his irritation with his pencil. His pencil snaps and he momentarily loses his balance. A few strands of hair, float like leaves to the floor.

"Right, right, right," he says finding his appointment book. "You're Paul, are you not?"

You're not Paul, you're pissed. "Hey, wake up dude, you got air between the ears or something? How do you think I got into Williams anyway? Read the brochure, it's pretty damn competitive to get in you know and once you get there the stress is pretty unbearable. It's tough buddy, you'd better believe it. So what if I didn't get JA and had to come to Oxford? I was playing keg soccer and writing the girls varsity hoola-hoop for the Record. I gave up all that plus a year of rec-rooms, Hill Street Blues, the Superbowl and you don't know who I am?"

Of course you don't say that. Fidgety and uncomfortable you drop your pen and bend down to get it, happy with your head between your legs. You mumble some profanities to the crevice beneath your legs, all the while wishing you were back in your pentagonal room at the Park with your dead plants. You bend back up and recross your legs a few times, sitting in a thick silence, surrounded by 30 feet of books and a fireplace that doesn't work. You begin to doodle.

"When is he going to ask me about the missiles?" you think. "I didn't put them there. I didn't even vote last election. I'm an apolitical English major, an apologist, a wimp—my big worry is humankind. I'm devoted to the improvement of the human condition." You're quiet, though. You've been told about the consequences of being cocky and brash, told to play down the fact that you're American, warned about running from store to store as though you have won two minutes of free shopping on Bond Street screaming "Wow! Everything is so cheap here." You have heard that they hate that.

And then he asks you to read him your paper. You crumble, and ask him if you should read it straight through or if you should pause for interruptions; of course, he tells you to read it straight through. So you begin to read. You finish your opening sentence and he interrupts. Your bladder seems about to burst. You want to excuse yourself and go to the bathroom, but you can't because this guy wants to argue over your use of the word "extrapolate" and its "metaphorical implications." You begin to dance, sidestepping and hurdling his rapid fire questioning. This guy is infuriated that you don't understand the distinction between an active and transitive verb. "It's probably because I haven't written any silly books on it," you think to yourself, disgusted with this guy's obsession with diction. At his every syllable you accelerate the nodding of your head, realizing that in your topic sentence alone you've justified every stereotype this guy ever had about those American-Rambo types. You can't answer any of his questions, however, because this genteel "fragile fellow" has erupted into a lather.

"Lighten up Francis," you think as you wait for him to begin to drool. "You don't want to blow any gaskets." You're worried; you realize you don't know CPR. You try to peek at your watch without being detected. Finally catching himself he wipes his mouth and says:

"Oh, I'm sorry. I said I wouldn't interrupt. I'm sorry, please continue." So you continue reading your paper. Now he doesn't say a word to you. Occasionally you overstate a point or miss it completely and he contorts his face and begins to tremble. You read on mindlessly, second-guessing that part about James Dean and J. Alfred Prufock, but saying it anyway. You finally finish. The minutes of silence you have to endure after such a reading pass quickly. You're thinking about all the idiots on the JA Committee and how it's rigged anyway. Then he laughs. You weren't listening though, you were thinking how lousy this year's JA's are, so you don't know if he attempted a joke—you doubt that—or if he was just merely laughing at that dumb American's sappy paper. But you do know that if it was a joke and if you don't laugh at it he'll be embarrassed and hate you, so looking for a handout of mercy, you grunt out a quaint little chuckle for decorum's sake. Then he tells you that you raised some "interesting" points, and that all in all it was a good first paper.

> "You've been warned about running from store to store as though you have won two minutes of free shopping on Bond Street screaming "Wow! Everything is so cheap here." You have heard that they hate that."

Then, while wandering around his office always looking away and never directly at you, he likens your paper to an "orotund commerative address," and adds, whimsically as though he were addressing himself, "a bit heavy I think." Dissatisfied with this appraisal he turns toward you, with a smirk, obviously happy in his dicovery of the right phrase and says "a bit 'high-falutin,' I think."

This guy thinks you're a Gomer. You're waiting for him to send you to the writing workshop until you realize that they don't have one. He's resumed his monologue and begins his wandering anew, circling you, making his suggestions from behind. Then he begins to talk about the danger of "autobiographical criticism, the type Americans seem to enjoy practicing," and how such a criticism depends upon the quality of the witness, implying that you made the mistake of attempting the former without the "quality" of the latter. "O.K.," you concede, "Norman Mailer I'm not. I can live with that." Then he says something condescending about the New York Times Book Review and leaves you with something about "Lionel Trilling reading Will on the Floss at breakfast with her boiled egg."

Glancing at his watch he tells you that for next week he wants you to write an essay on the Wasteland. He doesn't give you a topic. You don't ask. While gathering your things together someone knocks on his door and he tells you to "skedaddle." He shoos you from his office obviously distraught at your leaving. You leave and go the market to buy a bag of produce and begin to peddle home to Ephraim Williams House. You are sideswiped by a double-decker bus and wreck on the curb. The bus driver treats it as another dead bug splatted on the windshield and doesn't stop. Your lettuce and half your dinner is smooshed by a taxi in the fast-lane.

Recognition

To The Editor:

We would like to present a note of recognition for the extra work put in by thirteen college and faculty members in support of last spring's student initiated course, "Nonviolence and Social Change" (Sociology 488). In addition to their scheduled course load, these individuals gave their time and interest as advisors for one to three students from the course. The advisorship entailed conference upon and the written evaluation of the students' final projects; each evaluation was a large part of the final written grade submitted toward the students' transcripts.

We appreciated that the committment each faculty member made was done out of interest of student initiation and provided the necessary support for every student involved. This voluntary committment will be continued by all members on this list who will be teaching this year and will be expanded by an even larger group for this spring's class (Sociology 450). Our friends are:

Freshmen Warnings

The total number of freshmen who received warnings about their standing in at least one class was 114, or 22.5 percent. The Class of '89 has the lowest percentage receiving Freshmen Warnings of those classes currentiy at Williams.

Division III professors lead the college giving out 105 of the 138 total warnings. Thirty percent of the freshmen taking courses in the biology department were warned. Math students fared second worst; 20 percent received warnings.

Division I departments handed out only 7 warnings. These departments had 750 freshmen registrations more than either of the other divisions. Division II, where 26 warnings were given out, had 614 registrations and Division III had 631 registrations.

Help Line

Help Line, Inc. will offer Thanksgiving meal deliveries to shut-ins and other elderly people in the area. Executive Director Kevin O'Connor announced that the home meals will be available to people in Adams, Clarksburg, Florida, North Adams, Savoy and Williamstown free of charge.

Those interested in assisting Help Line in this service are encouraged to call the office at 664-6391. Volunteers are needed to help prepare meals on the evening of November 27 and on Thanksgiving morning.

The program was made possible by the efforts of Help Line volunteers, local merchants, the Salvation Army, Elder Services and Incentive Community Enterprises. It is also supported by the Williamstown Community Chest Member Agency, the Area Agency on Aging, and the United Way.

Laser Grant

Three professors have been awarded a joint research grant from the National Science Foundation to support a project on laser spectiosocopy in chemistry and physics. The grant, for $66,000, was given to Judith Halstead, assistant professor of chemistry; Kevin Jones, assistant professor of physics; and William Moomaw, professor of chemistry.

The grant will enable the College to purchase a powerful laser that can span the ultraviolet and visible spectrums. This equipment will become part of an inter-disciplinary laser center for the study of electronic energy levels and photochemistry of molecules, as well as properties of solids.

The facility will be accessible to students doing honors theses and independent study, and faculty.

Halstead, who received her Ph.D in physical chemistry from Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, plans to use the laser to study the creation of electronically excited states. Flouorescence induced by the laser is the tool that will be used to study the process.

Jones, a Williams graduate who received a Ph.D from Stanford, will study highiy excited states, close to the ionization limit, of smali molccules. One of the characteristics of these states is that the electrons move in very large, macroscopic, orbitals.

Moomaw is also a Williams graduate and serves currently as the director of the Center for Environmental Studies. His research is on the structure and mechanisms of photochemical reactions of organic molecules.

U.S. News survey out Monday, Williams #1

by Harwell Wells

"Maybe people are just becoming more aware of Williams' strengths," was one of the explanations given by U.S. News and World Report's Education Editor Lucia Solorzano for a poll in this week's edition of the magazine that named Williams the best "national liberal-arts college" in the country.

Copies of the magazine went on sale Monday. The listings, the second that U.S. News has published, were taken as a part of a poll of college presidents on the quality of undergraduate education in the US.

Williams was named first in the poll as 55.1 percent of the college presidents polled named it as one of the five best colieges in the country. Second was Swarthmore, cited by 50 percent of the college presidents. Amherst was third with 41 percent, Carleton fourth with 37.2 percent, and Haverford fifth, cited in 30.8 percent of the responses.

According to Solorzano, a Middiebury alumnae, the poll was taken by asking the presidents of the colieges in each category to rate the quality of undergraduate education other schools in their category.

Williams was first in the "national iiberal arts colieges," which Solorzano described as "the most selective schools in terms of quality of freshmen," and academic quaiity. The categ ory aiso inciudes such schools as Oberiin, Bowdoin, Weilesley and Pomona.

Chavis speaks for morals

by John Faust

"Take some action for what is right in terms of getting this institution to not only be the greatest intellectual liberal arts school ... but also to be a great moral institution that stands on the right moral principles," said Rev. Dr. Benjamin Chavis at a lecture last week.

In his talk, entitled "The Struggle for Human Rights — A Look Toward the 21st Century," the veteran civil rights activist and Deputy Director of the United Church of Christ's Commission for Racial Justice spoke to faculty, students and community members. His visit was sponsored by the Black Student Union, the political science department and the Chaplain's Office.

While commending Williams on its recent rating in U.S. News and World Report, Chavis called for campus action in addition to the debate that has ensued over the issue of the college's investment policies. Any institution whose actions even indirectly support apartheid, he said, must question its ethical standards.

According to Chavis, Americans are slow to act on most human rights issues due to "geopoiitical and geoeconomic considerations." He said, "(These) have aiways and will always determine the degree to which human rights are ensured."

To illustrate his point, Chavis said there is an inconsistency in the way the U.S. deals with people fleeing different countries. He said in one case that the U.S. accepts defectors from the U.S.S.R. to embarass the Soviets, but does not accept Haitians "because they are biack and are trying to flee a regime friendly to the United States of Amcrica." This inconsistency, he claimed, "contributes not to the ensurance(sic) of human rights, but to their gross violation."

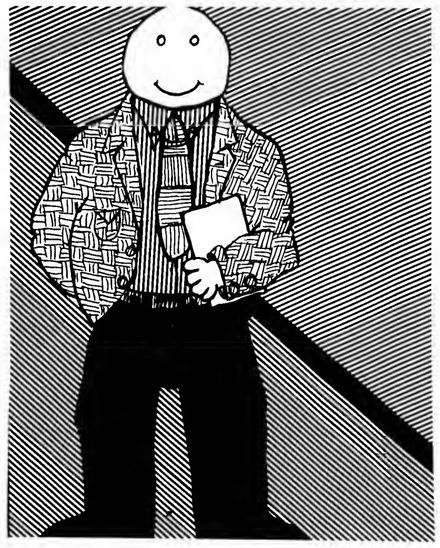
"We have not been socialized to accept or deal with contradictions in our own society," Chavis said, pointing to his treatment as an example.As explained in a News Office press release, Chavis was a member of the "Wiimington Ten." These activists were accus ed of burning down a white-owned store and shooting at police and fire officials in Wilmington, NC in 1971.

Amnesty Internationai dubbed the activists the first American political prisoners, and a U.S. Court of Appeais overturned Chavis' conviction after he spent four years in prison. Chavis pointed to memos from the Treasury Department which indicate a frameup to convict the Wilmington Ten.

There are still those who are being imprisoned here in the U.S. as a consequence of their political activity, according to Chavis. He said that his time in jail had conjured up images of a return to slavery, and "We used to go to the courts for support, but now we have to run from the courts."

"I see progressive movment inthe Third World to develop civil rights for everybody," Chavis said in his conclusion. He added, "Once you make up your mind to be free, there is no force in the universe that can turn you around.

The Food Service Department is now accepting applications for student supervisors and assistant student supervisors. These positions are for at least one year beginning January 1986. These jobs can provide you with an opportunity to do an important job for the College and gain valuable experience in the training and supervision of other people in a business environment. The compensation includes top hourly wages plus a special board plan that provides 7 free meals in a week. Those with Food Service experience are preferred.



Applications are available from any Food Service manager or the Department office in Baxter Hall, and will be accepted until November 22, 1985.

Psych services expand to shrink students' worries

by Christina Manos

Although many people may not realize it, the Psychological Counseling Services offered at Williams have a new image. Included in the new image is Dr. John Howland, MD, who this year replaced Eugene Talbot as director. Howland is the first psychiatrist to join the counseling staff. Previously, all counselors have been psychologists, who deal primarily with emotions and behavior; psychiatrists, who are mental health physicians, are licensed also to dispense medication.

Changes in the services offered include the addition of a varlety of group sessions. Counseior Barbara Josiyn noted that she has had a large increase in the size of her eating disorders group, which she has run for a number of years. This is due in part, she feels, to an increase in general concern about eating habits and also in part to a more open attitude in dealing with such problems.

Dr. Howland runs a group therapy session that offers students a chance to talk with one another, as weil as to a counselor, about their problems. Also, the psychological staff is very supportive of College Chapiain Carol Pepper's group session for adult children of alcoholics, although the staff itself has no direct involvement in the program.

The counselors feel strongly about the benefits of group therapy—which Howland termed an "active laboratory"—that enables students to interact with one another. Howland observed, "For some, groups are better because you get to try out ways of relating to people in a safe situation. In a group session, the risks are greatly reduced."

Josiyn is enthusiastic about the benefits of group counseling, saying, "It's particularly useful for college kids. It's a

Profile: Professor Catharine Hill

by Martita Weil

According to Catharine Bond Hill '76, "Williams has done well for me." Hired this year by the economics department, Hill is the first alumna to be teaching in a tenure-track position at Williams, and as such represents a new phase in Williams' commitment to women.

After graduating summa cum laude, Hill went on to study philosophy, politics and economics at Oxford. She recently completed her graduate work at Yale, and has also worked at the Brookings Institute and as a consultant with the World Bank in Washington, DC.

Despite membership in only the second co-ed class at Williams, Hill said she felt very comfortable during her undergraduate years. "I find that Williams very successfully went co-ed. It wasn't obvious to me that it had just gone co-ed," she said. Although she has only been back in Williamstown two months, Hill remarked that the campus attitude towards women seems very positive, adding that the economics department is particularly supportive of women.

Model position

"The department made a conscious decision to hire women," Hill said, stressing the importance of role models for students in areas that do not traditionally include women, such as math, science and economics. "She's very experienced in international finance and also approachable and very much at our level," said Frances Lashen '86, one of Hill's senior seminar students.

Hill noted that one of her classes is nearly 50% female, whereas the economics courses she took as a student here never had more than 25% female enrollment. She added, however, that she did not feel any pressure to study certain disciplines while avoiding others. "I felt I was not channelled at all," she said.

Personal trade-offs

Hill, who is married and has a two year-old son, also commented on the difficulties women face combining work and marriage. "It must have been a lot easier when only one person was working," she said, but added, "My career is important to me and I've spent a lot of time and energy getting here. You have to be flexible and lucky, but there are always trade-offs."

She said she finds organizations becoming more sensitive to the problems of the working mother. Taking care of children without some outside support is "practically impossible with two people working," Hill observed, noting that many of her female classmates from Williams are starting to have children later in life and then returning to work. "Institutions seem to be responding and planning more carefully," she said.

"My son is at St. John's (the college-organized day care center) and it's very helpful to me, but I think Williams College will have to enlarge child support when the demand goes up," she said.

Hill expressed alarm at the falling number of students, both male and female, who are becoming teachers, and explained that her department is trying to get students to go on to graduate school. "Economics is bringing in academicians to encourage students," she said, "but the special seminars are also extra work."

She mentioned student-faculty interaction as one underused way for students to learn about possible careers in academics, and remarked, "I find students quite open but it works both ways. Students should invite faculty, too, and so far that hasn't happened much."

Critic favorable toward 'The Critic'

by Elizabeth Skorcz

You know you have seen a good comedy when you remember scenes from it the next day and laugh out loud again. Williamstheatre's current production of Richard Sheridan's The Critic, directed by Michael Knight, is that good.

In the first of two acts, the theatre critic Dangle (Howard Patlis '88)—passionate about his self-appointed position but hopelessly inept at it—entertains visitors who are equally committed to drama and criticism. The gathering much annoys his wife (Stephanie Bond '88), who thinks the whole business is nonsense. Unfortunately, this act is decidedly slow, with the fault more in the nature of the play than in its execution. Sophisticated satire of 18th-century drama can be inaccessible to a 20th-century audience, but at times, witticisms that should sparkle do not.

To compensate for the sometimes tedious, formal dialogue, Knight plays up the possibilities for slapstick comedy, and it works. Ben Voorhies' '88 masterful performance as the mincing and cynical yet undeluded drama patron Sneer heightens the humor. Voorhies unquestionably carries the act, although Bond's facial expressions are deliciously funny, and Ellen O'Connell's '88 quick, exaggeratedly melodramatic appearances as the servant provide some good chuckles. Chuck Goforth's '87 performance as Puff, the promoter of any theatrical endeavor for the right price, lacks variation in dramatic intensity. Sounding as if he is straining to be heard, he gives most of the long monologue explaining his profession at the same voice level.

Chortles abound

The second act, a play-within-a-play, more than makes up for the pedestrian first act. Act II is hilarious. Courtesy of Puff, Dangle and Sneer, the audience is treated to a dress rehearsal of

Walk-In Hours provide frank talk

by Leslie Jeffs

If you've always wanted to speak to President Frank Oakley about your ideas for the college but didn't know how to go about it, a perfect opportunity for conversation awaits you. The President's Walk-In Hour, heid every other Tuesday afternoon from 3:00–4:00 in Hopkins Hall, offers anyone interested the chance to speak with the President. No appointment is necessary; simply come knocking and be ready to talk.

Unless you're a confident sort, you might have a lot of doubts about the whole process. Suppose no one else ever goes? The thought of talking face-to-face with the President can be intimidating; nevertheless, quite a few students manage to overcome their fears and let curiosity win out.

One such brave individual is Elizabeth Skorcz, a senior interested in applying for a fellowship to Oxford. Knowing that Oakley had studied extensively at the University, she wanted to get advice on writing the required essay. "It's hard to know just what to focus on. I wanted to see if President Oakley would be able to give me a better idea of the program's goals and direction."

Eleanor Congdon '88 is a veteran of these Walk-In Hours. Last year Oakley was one of her professors, and she often turns to him "for advice about course selection." Even as an administrator Oakley has retained the closeness and friendship with Williams students that he enjoyed as a professor.

Being received by the President is a pleasantly informal procedure, with the relaxed setting conducive to casual conversation. Oakley observed, "On even, a few students come each time—sometimes larger groups will come together. Occasionally I find I have the time to myself."

Frankness

Oakley hears all types of problems, questions, and complaints. "There are sometimes precise questions that I can personally follow up on," he said, although frequently there are other administrators better suited to answering specific questions. Not to be forgotten are those students who make official appointments to see Oakley. "The whole idea behind the Walk-In Hours," he stated, "is to make the whole process a little simpler, to take away the bother."

Taking the concept of the Walk-In Hours one step further, Oakley designed a new activity—a series of visits to residential houses—to encourage student-administrator relations. Every month, the President and Dean Stephen Fix will be dining in different residential houses, with a discussion to follow. This forum

Bennington

Bennington College is well-known throughout the country for its liberal educational policies and its close, cherished student faculty relationships. It is well-known among the Williams community for a history of intelleetual and cultural exchanges with Williams students, reaching back to the fraternity days when Bennington women contributed mightily to social life.

But today, Bennington is bankrupt. Although the college has the highest tuition in the country—over $17,000—it has been unable to meet its monthly payroll. Part of Bennington's problem is that it has no substantial endowment. Since it is only 52 years-old, the old-boy (old-girl?) alumni network has yet to bequeath many large gifts. So long as everyone stays alive, the college is in trouble.

Bennington's President Michael K. Hooker has been foreed to borrow $5 million from a local bank, and the school continues to debate solutions for lowering a mounting defieit expected to reach $700,000 by next year. Aside from borrowing money, Bennington hopes to mitigate their financial problems by ending the daily afternoon tea parties, auctioning off valuable art, selling houses donated by alumni and "revamping" the admissions process.

Liberty University

If Williams football fans are disappointed with the team's record this year, they will be happy to know that there is at least one school that the Ephmen can defeat: The Liberty University Flames. The University, located in Lynchburg, Virginia, on the James River, recently suffered a flood that left the first level of the two-story training center submerged, and swept away an entire chapel. The Flames now lack helmets, uniforms and footballs, not to mention a playing field.

Coach Morgan Hout, commenting on the damage that left only the second story of the training center poking out of the floodwater said,"I can only speculate that everything is ruined. We don't have a shoe. We don't have a piece of headgear."

Giving up all hopes of salvaging soggy football equipment, Al Worthington, athletie director, eancelled the final two games of the season, leaving the Division II Flames with a 3-4-1 record. (NY Times) political act. He said investment was the real political act and must be seen as such.

Professor Kurt Tauber said that the struggle for freedom in South Africa was just a part of a global struggle for freedom. Tauber said that those people among the Trustees and the administration who asked to put a chill on student political activism were in fact undermining the purposes of education.

Drinking

She said that the number of on-campus parties had declined signifit antly, due to the expense of paying both the salaries bartenders and of the police who must be present at large parties, as well as to the difficulty in obtaining a university drinking lieense, which is the only acceptable form of identification at Yale and can only be proeured during four hours on the first Monday of every month. "Theoretically, there are supposed to be fewer (alcohol-related) incidents," she said, "but we haven't noticed a big difference."

One of the universities that the study listed as having a "prohibitive" alcohol policy was the University of Virginia. However, U.Va. junior Alicia Glekas does not view her school as having particularly striet drinking rules. She said that the underaged students "technically" aren't supposed to be at the frats, where there are usually kegs, and that the first-year students are not allowed to drink in public or to hold functions where alcohol would be served in their dorms. However, she said, "Whenever I wanted to have a beer, first year, I could."

place to find out you're not alone and to see how others cope. I'm a big believer in how effective it is."

Busier than ever

However, Howland cautions that group therapy is not for everyone. In an effort to encourage one-on-one counseling, the staff, which has been increased, has tried to make itself more available for appointments. This step has been effective, according to Joslyn; more students this year are utilizing the psychological services than ever before. Josiyn feels that this is not at all surprising. "It is in keeping with the general trend that such help is acceptable," she commented.

Although counseling is becoming more generally aeeepted, the staff is still concerned that many students attach a stigma to seeking psychological help. Howland is especially conecerned with eliminating this stigma, which he feels definitely exists. "A signifleant amount of people feel sort of macho about coming for help. Others feel mortified to admit that they even have problems that are important enough to merit help," he stated.

Josiyn agrees that this stigma can't be ignored. However, she is optimistic about eliminating it, noting, "My feeling is that there is much less of a stigma, but it still does exist."

The staff finds this stigma particularly handicapping since the counselors aim to help the students deal with the stresses of college, which may range from transitional growing pains to serious disturbances. Howland emphasized that the counselors are available as a sounding board, even if only to be used as objective listeners.

Not necessarily 'wacko'

Howland encourages students to seek help while their problems are still manageable, rather than after the problems have manifested themselves in full-blown ways. "I want students to come down even if they're not wacko, but worried. It's okay to get a check-up, even if you're okay.'

Howland continued, "I'm interested in de-mystifying and de-mythifying the stereotypes of psychology. I want people to know we're here and that they can feel comfortable coming here."

Howland's enthusiasm and ideals are a large source of the changes in the psychological serviees. However, Josiyn stresses that the changes and improvements in the department are progressive, rather than one-time deals, and that the staff is constantly striving to meet the changing needs of the student body as effieiently as it can. "We're trying to listen to administrators, faculty, and most of all the students so that we may best serve their needs," she stated.

The psychological services are open to all students at no charge. Located in the Infirmary, counseling is available by appointment or during walk-in hours during the week.

Under the direction of Kenneth Roberts, the Williams Choral Society and special guest artists performed Bach's "Magnificat" in honor of the composer's tricentennial. Mozart's "Requiem" was also part of the Saturday night program, which was performed to a highly appreciative Chapin Hall audience. This coming Friday in Chapin, the Berkshire Symphony will be playing an evening of orchestral works featuring pieces by Dvorak and Haydn. Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer", sung by baritone Terrence Dwyer, is also part of the evening's program. The Symphony is conducted by Julius Hegyi, and the performance begins at 8:00pm. (Khakee)

'The Critic'

Puff's ridiculous tragic love-story set against the backdrop of the Spanish Armada. Devoid of any dramatic sense, Puff directs his cast to overact to the point of absurdity.

The Williamstheatre actors exploit to the fullest the humor inherent in this situation. Regina Kelley '86 is side-splittingly funny as Tilburina, the English governor's daughter, who is in love with a Spaniard. The finest seene in the whole show, not to be soon forgotten, is Kelley's portrayal of Tilburina gone mad.

Listing all of the wonderfully funny comie moments in Act 2 would take pages. Nonetheless, a few scenes demand recognition. The sword fight between the Spanish lover Don Ferolo Whiskerandos (Gordon Leeds '86) and the Beefeater (Blake Robison '88) is one of these. Some of the others are the embrace of the Englishmen before going off to war at sea, the weaving eourtroom appearance of the drunken Justice's Lady (Su Wrench '86), and the nod of the silent but deep-thinking Lord Burleigh (Cameron Smith '86), who looks suspiciously like Marlene Dietrich.

Including everything from the fake marble eolumns in Dangle's house to the elaborate period costumes (complete with wigs) to the 'authentic' sea fight at the end of the play-within-a-play, The Critic is a spectacle not to be missed.

HOW LESS LEAD IN GASOLINE WILL AFFECT YOUR CAR

USE OF ALCOHOL-GASOLINE BLENDS REQUIRES YOUR CAREFUL SELECTION

The Environmental Protection Agency is reducing the amount of lead allowed in leaded gasoline by more than 90%. General Motors supports this effort to reduce lead in the atmosphere. But our customers need to know how this action may affect their vehicles.

In simple terms, continue with the same gasoline you've been using. You probably won't notice any difference at your service station. Just be sure your gasoline meets the requirements below.

For post-1974 model cars and light trucks (less than 6,000 lbs.). Continue to use unleaded gasoline only. The new lower-lead limits for leaded gasoline are still too high: lead in gasoline will harm the emission-control system.

For 1971-74 model cars and light trucks. Use either unleaded or the new lower-lead gasoline. These vehicles were designed to run on either one.

For all pre-1971 model cars and trucks. Use the new lower-lead gasolines. These vehicles need leaded gas to lubricate exhaust valves. The lead raises octane ratings and helps to avoid "knocking" and "pinging." The lead is most important during continuous high-speed, high-load conditions such as towing a heavy trailer or large boat over a long distance. In a pinch, you can even use unleaded gas for normal driving.

Tip: Use only enough octane to avoid frequent knocking. An occasional "ping" won't harm the engine.

The new lower-lead gasolines should always be used in:

- 1971-78 trucks over 6,000 lbs.
- post-1978 trucks over 8,500 lbs.

The effect of alcohol blends. To meet the new regulations, oil refiners will turn to other methods to maintain or increase octane ratings. Some will elect to refine gasoline more intensively. Others may add octane enhancers such as ethanol and methanol (more informally known as grain alcohol and wood alcohol).

General Motors supports the use of such alternative fuels to lessen our nation's dependence on imported oil. But to avoid operating and other problems, don't use gasoline containing more than 10 percent ethanol or 5 percent methanol. And in the case of methanol, be sure it contains cosolvents (to prevent separation of the alcohol from the gasoline) and corrosion inhibitors.

General Motors is taking steps to ensure that its future vehicles can operate problem-free with gasoline containing alcohol. For now, you should know the contents of the fuel going into your gas tank. That's why we support the requirement that gas pumps show the alcohol content of the fuel. Such labels are being used in some states, but they are needed nationwide.

To get the efficiency, driveability and performance we design into your GM vehicles, be sure you use the right fuel. The proper identification and use of gasoline is good for both GM customers and GM cars and trucks.

This advertisement is part of our continuing effort to give customers useful information about their cars and trucks and the company that builds them.

McEvoy will be missing from next year's team, as will '83 All-New England Schroeder. Both were four-year varsity starters. Otley's quickness and scoring ability will be missed, as will Pieter Mulder's defensive talents. Russo noted, "These guys were instrumental in developing our program to where it is today, and we'll miss them." He noted that while this year's team matched last season's record, winning the Little Three with a convincing Amherst defeat made this season the best in recent years.

captain TJ Lydon '86 had been able to compete, the Ephs would have taken fifth place overall, which would have matched their best New England Division III effort ever. Lydon was unable to make the overnight trip due to an unavoidable conflict with a week-long thesis project in Arizona.

As it was, the team's total of 256 placed them eighth out of the 26-team field and lived up to coach Farwell's goals for this season.

Other categories included "national research universities," in which Stanford was first, Harvard and Yale tied for second, and Princeton third, and several regional categories, concerning broadly-based institutions.

Solorzano explained that the poll was aimed only at educational quality and "didn't want to get into the social aspects" of each college. When asked why Williams went from third in the 1983 poll to first this year, she said that one reason was a change in categories as several schools, such as Bryn Mawr and Wesleyan, moved to the national universities category, reducing the numer of schools in Williams' category to 90. She also noted Williams' higher profile following the first poll.

As to why the college is held in such high esteem, Solorzano cited several factors, including Williams' "prestigious faculty" and "extremely strong student-faculty relations."

Football, 2-5-1, looks to future

by Dave Paulsen

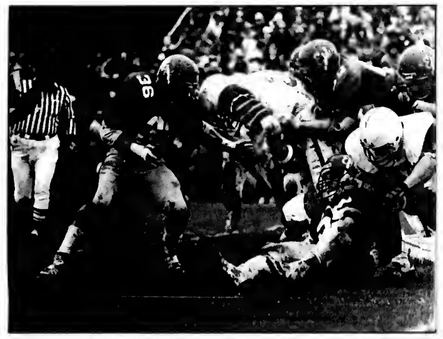
Citing the lack of an explosive offensive attack, football coach Bob Odell expressed disappointment in his squad's 2-5-1 season. "We had high hopes and played well on many occasions," Odell said, "but we weren't able to put everything together."

The Ephmen were tough-luck losers in several of their games—a phenomenon which led Odell to characterize his team as the "unluckiest team in North America." In their 14-16 loss to Hamilton, a fumble deep in Eph territory set up a Hamilton touchdown, while in the 14-13 defeat at Trinity, the Bantams turned an interception into the deciding touchdown.

In the first Little Three loss at Wesleyan, the Ephs had the ball on the two-yard line with no time remaining, but failed in their attempt to score on the last play and thus went down to defeat 6-9. In the 7-7 tie with Tufts, the Jumbos scored their only touchdown after a blocked punt late in the game, while Eph field goal kicker Tony Fuller '89 missed two short-range field goals that could have secured a win. Conceivably, the Ephs could have ended up with a 6-2 record had it not been for those miscues.

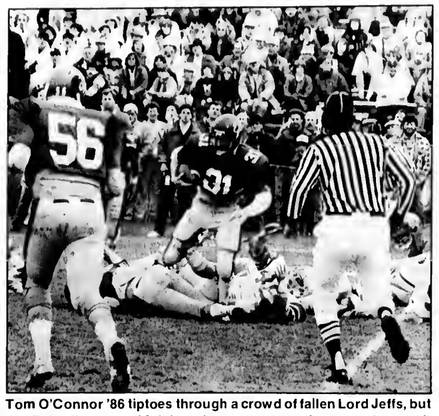
Odell expressed his opinion that the reason the Ephs lost those close games was because of the fact that "we're a little bit lacking in the skill positions. . . We don't have a running back with the great speed who can make something out of nothing." He criticized the offense for their costly turnovers and their inability to "perform as we thought they should have performed."

Praise for defense



At the same time that he was criticizing his offense, Odell was quick to praise the play of the defensive unit which, excluding the final game loss to Amherst, allowed only 12.9 points per game.

Despite the disappointing record, Odell was unwavering in his support of his team. "The team played hard, and never gave up. I can't fault this effort."



For the Ephs to be successful next season, they will have to fill the gaping holes left by the graduation of offensive standouts Kevin Morris, Jay Hickman, Tom O'Connor, Andy Jeffrey, Tom Goodspeed, Brad Ball, Rob Coakley, Greg Taylor, and Pete Dawson, as well as defensive stalwarts Greg Norton, Frank Morandi, Jeff Lilley, Dick Hollington, and Ken MacLeod.

Making up for the absence of these veterans will be a talented group of underclassmen. Sophomore quarterback Scott Powers, who demonstrated flashes of brilliance in the season finale against Amherst, should direct the Eph attack. He will have freshman halfback Maurice Holden, sophomore running back Mark Meyer, and junior back Rob Miller to carry the pigskin. Sophomore Lewis Collins and juniors Jim Poulsen and John Shaw will also be back for another season of hauling in aerials from their tight end and split end positions. Juniors Taylor Watts and John Madden and sophomore Jim Walker return up front to open up holes on the offensive line.

Junior linebackers Dan McCarthy and Dan MacDonnell return to anchor the defense. Junior Jerry Rizzo returns in the secondary; while up front, Brian Nixon, Jeff Boni, Dave Crompton, and Jim Franz return. It is the nucleus for what could be a fine team next season. Yet,as Odell was quick to point out, this year's squad also hoped to have a fine season. The key determinants for next year, like this year, seem to be the ability of the offense to put points on the board.

Senior co-captain Greg Norton prepares to pounce on the Lord Jeff fumble during the Ephs' 35-20 Homecoming loss to Amherst. (Khakee)

Tom O'Connor '86 tiptoes through a crowd of fallen Lord Jeffs, but the Eph offense couldn't knock opponents to the ground enough this year. (Phillips)

Harriers ninth in NE

The women's cross-country team traveled to North Dartmouth, MA, to compete in the NCAA Division III Regional Qualifier Meet on Saturday. The Ephwomen finished ninth in a field of 30 teams to close their season.

Wellesley College took first place with 125 points, followed by Smith at 135 and Westfield State at 154. The Ephwomen totaled 255 points to finish ninth. Dorcas DenHartog from Middlebury led the 5000m race in 17:23.

Freshmen Karin Johnson and Jenny Garrett led the Williams charge, finishing 38th and 55th, respectively. Becky Conklin '87, Sarah Pierce '88, and Kate Pugh '87 rounded out the team scores in 56th, 59th, and 64th places, respectively.

The team ends their season today with a 3-3 dual meet record in addition to impressive finishes at invitational meets—third at the Smith Invitational, fourth at the NESCAC Championships, and fifth at the home Williams Invitational.

Ellison, men eighth in NE

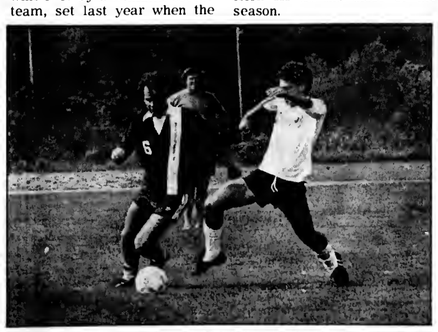
by Carter Zinn

The men's cross-country team ended its season by finishing eighth in the New England Division III Championships run at Southern Massachusetts University on Saturday.

Co-captain John Ellison '86 led the team, finishing eighth overall in a blistering time of 24:55 over the five-mile course. Ellison's placement qualified him for the Division III National Championships, which will be held at Emory University in Atlanta on Saturday. This performance was the highlight of an outstanding season for the senior as he became only the sixth Williams runner to qualify for the Nationals.

Behind Ellison was strong team effort, as the next three Ephs all ran exceptionally well. Dave Grossman '87 also capped off his season impressively, finishing 37th overall in a time of 25:35. Tom Pingree '86 came in five seconds after Grossman for 41st, giving an inspired effort in his last cross-country race at Williams. And Ted Arrowsmith '88 finished 73rd, in 25:40, indicating that the injury that hampered his training all season did not slow him down in this race.

Ed Tonelli '86 rounded out the top five for Williams, finishing 97th. Ian Brzezinski '86 and Jon Fisher '87 were close behind, finishing in 26:52 and 26:53, respectively. The team competition was won by Bates, who finished three runners in the top five while upsetting favored Brandeis and MIT.



Although the team that went performed well, coach Peter Farwell indicated that if co-

The men's soccer team ended its season at 11-3-1, winning the Little Three title with a decisive final game against Amherst. This ties the record for most wins ever by a Williams soccer team, set last year when the Ephs also went 11-3-1. The only losses this year were to Clark and Babson in the regular season, and to Plymouth State in the ECAC playoffs. Williams was ranked fifth in ECAC Division III at the close of the season.

Senior co-captains Jeff McEvoy and Mark Schroeder were both named to the New England Intercollegiate Soccer League All-Star Team and competed on Sunday in Worcester. They played on opposing teams at halfback, McEvoy for the North team and Schroeder for the South. Fix puts off disciplinary action

by Martita Weil

Dean of the College Stephen Fix said that the student arrested last week on a charge of mayhem was released without bail at his arraignment in Berkshire County Trial Court Wednesday morning.

"The court has decided that the student does not present a threat to the community," Fix said at Wednesday afternoon's faculty meeting, adding that the student had cooperated fully with the police and had no previous record.

Michael Duncan '86 was arrested in relation with a Nov. 1 fight between approximately 10 Williams students and three Adams men during which one of the Adams men had a portion of his nose bitten off, according to Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito.

"All people who live here are equally accountable to the law," Fix said, "and we (the College) will not run interference with the law. In no instance did the College refuse any request for information from police."

Fix also said that the College will postpone any disciplinary action, at Duncan's request, until the court proceedings are completely finished. "The courts will have the opportunity to decide the matter," Fix said.

"The College has a right to discipline members of the community, but the rules are designed to protect the student from appearing before a disciplinary hearing," Assistant Professor of Mathematical Sciences Kim Bruce said after the meeting.

Bruce was the only faculty member to question Fix on the College's policy during the meeting and later explained that he was surprised to see the dean postponing College action in the matter until after the court hearings. "The College has an obligation to decide that a student should be suspended until a disciplinary hearing takes place," Bruce said

Reading period shorter, change to affect '87-88

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Changes in the college calendar for the academic year 1987-88 will shorten the fall reading period to a three-day weekend and extend Thanksgiving break to one week. Reading period will begin on a Friday instead of ending on a Tuesday as in the past.

Professor Russell Bostert, chairman of the Calendar Committee, said he believes that these changes, passed by the faculty without dissent, will be "much better for everybody." Bostert said the faculty views the first semester as "much too congested and going much too rapidly."

The changes were instituted in an effort to keep more students in Williamstown over the reading period and allow more time for the completion of semester work, particularly papers at Thanksgiving, he said.

According to Bostert, the faculty approved the changes last year in an attempt to "give students time to get their acts together at the end of the semester. They can start preparing for exams, catch up on reading and especially work on papers."

ACSR proposes new investment policy

by Tom Ewing

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility has recommended to the trustees that Williams no longer buy stock in companies that have not signed the Sullivan Principles regarding business conduct in South Africa.

The ACSR sent its recommendation to the trustees on Nov. 11, but the final decision probably will not be made until the trustees meet in January, said ACSR Chairman Stephen Lewis.

The Sullivan Principles are a code designed to monitor the employment practices of U.S. companies doing business in South Africa. Companies that sign the Principles are monitored to assess whether their practices are actually improving the status of non-white employees and whether they actively seek improvements outside the workplace.

The letter sent by the ACSR states, "For companies with investment in South Africa, the College should not purchase stock in corporations which have not signed the Sullivan Principles."

Lewis said that if the recommendation of the ACSR is accepted by the trustees, he expects that stock in Healthdyne, the single remaining company in the Williams portfolio which is a majority holder in South Africa but has not signed the Sullivan principles, would be sold as soon as possible.

The change in policy, Lewis said, is a result of the worsening situation in South Africa combined with the growing number of U.S. companies who have decided to sign the Sullivan Principles. These factors convinced the ACSR that it was no

Protestors seize admissions

by Tom Ewing

Members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition and the Black Student Union held a 840-minute sit-in at the Admissions Office last Monday in order to protest Williams' investments in South Africa. Each minute of the sit-in represented one person killed in protests against the white government in South Africa, according to a press release from the organizers of the sit-in.

WAAC member Tom Williams '86 said he hoped the protest drew attention to the College's investment policy. He said this policy is racist and contradicts the College's claim that it does not discriminate on the basis of race in its admission procedures.

WAAC and the BSU also wanted to widen the focus of their protests to include the "institutional racism" they believe exists at Williams, said Nzingha Clarke '86, a student participating in the sit-in. She said that Williams has not examined what she sees as the racist climate of its student life and the lack of support systems for minority students.

About 15 students planned to stay for the entire time, according to Williams. Many wore armbands as a form of protest. Anti-Apartheid posters covered many of the walls, and students played tapes of a speech by Bishop Desmond Tutu and read poetry written by black South Africans.

The protestors promised not to disrupt the proceedings at the Admissions Office, and the parents and students who came in did not seemed disturbed by the activities.

Prospective favorable

According to one prospective, the protest made her more feel more favorably toward Williams because she felt that the issue of apartheid should be a concern for all students. She also said that the question of Williams' investments would not affect her decision about coming to Williams.

Tom Parker, the associate director of admissions, said that the protestors had not disrupted the day-to-day activities of the Admissions Office. However, he questioned the logic that led WAAC to choose the Admissions Office as the best location to protest Williams' investments.

His main concern, he said, was that the sit-in not target interviewees as somehow representative of the investment policies of Williams College, but he said this did not become a problem.

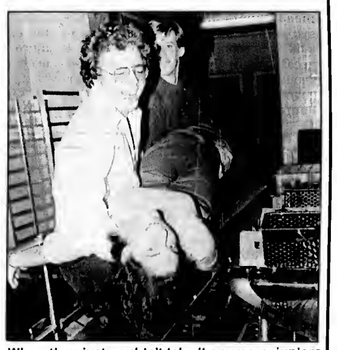
Parker said that the protestors' accusations of racism are false. Williams has a strong policy he said, of actively recruiting minority students, adding that Williams compares favorably to other comparable schools in terms of minority admissions.

The sit-in was followed by a 30-minute candlelight vigil outside the window of President Francis Oakley's house. The protestors sang songs about freedom and talked about apartheid. Neither the sit-in nor the vigil were hampered by the College administration in any way.

Board flees as juniors take over

Record Editor-in-Chief Martita Weil '86 was overthrown in a bloodless coup last weekend. Juniors R.P. DeMott and John Schafer disposed of their former editor using tactics that convinced the remaining editorial board members to flee into exile.

"At least I'll always know it took two men to depose one woman," Weil said as she disappeared into the giggling flume.



As he watched all visible traces of their dastardly deed disappear down the flume, Schafer said, "Sweet! Victory, R.P., we're golden." DeMott, ever the stalwart muckraker, replied, "Print it."

The only remaining senior, Vernon Squires, decided not to hang around any longer to confront the vicious duo and decided to graduate in January. "I'm not crazy," Squires said. "I'm going to get out of here before they try to flume me too." Squires spent a year cutting his teeth as a features writer before becoming features co-editor.

Squires' partner in pun, Kathi Rosenbaum '87, turned "Crimson" (that traitor) when asked about her plans for next semester. "Anything but hang around with these guys," she said. "Get a serious clue." Rosenbaum is a two-year veteran of the features crew.

In order to put at least an ocean between himself and the bloodthirsty duo, Op-Ed editor Joe Ehlers made tracks for the Institute of European Studies in London. Ehlers was a news assistant with DeMott during his sophomore year. "Well, Bob obviously has drifted toward the left since he met John, who's been a bleeding-heart from day one. Who could work with these two?" he said. London, he noted, is not far enough away from Schafer.

More courageous than his colleagues, former layout editor Steve Theodore '87 will stay on as Op-Ed editor. While waiting for the power situation to stabilize, Theodore will spend January wandering around Greece. "It all reminds me of the beginning of the Peloponessian War," he said, "but I'm sure things will have calmed down by the time I find my way back."

When they just couldn't take it anymore, juniors R.P. DeMott and John Schafer were forced to take matters, or editors, into their own hands and flume their cares away. (Khakee)

In an attempt to consolidate their "government," DeMott and Schafer rapidly assembled a new editorial board. Virginia Demaree '88 will take over as news editor, moving up from a year as a news assistant. Sophomores Eric Hanson and Joe Thorndike will edit features, after a semester's practice as assistants.

Former news reporter Tom Ewing '87 will join Theodore in the Op-Ed department. Hard-working and gutsy Cliff Peale '87, sports assistant for last year, will move into the editorial position in that department.

Nik Khakee '88 and Katie Albright '89 will run the photo department next semester. Junior Sarah Pynchon and freshmen Caroline Boyden and Sarah Mareus will be photo assistants. Freshman Shelley Hiatt will take over the circulation department. Lisa Leonard, last year's "lady of the labels," said she decided it was time to let somebody else deal with Jesup.

An obligation to inform

The primary responsibility of any news journal is to inform its readers with accuracy and completeness of events pertinent to their lives. A paper that hides facts from its readership, or knowingly allows incriminating rumors to persist, is not practicing responsible journalism.

The Record was clearly fulfilling this primary function last week with its article concerning the arrest of Michael Duncan '86. Duncan's name was a matter of public record, and the nose-biting incident was a matter of widely circulated—and sometimes fallacious—rumor. After considering the case, the Record's editorial board decided that publishing the former was far preferable to tolerating the latter.

Initially, the Record tried to speak with Duncan, who would not return a call, and whose lawyer also did not contact us. Attempts were made to find Williams students who would corroborate or contradict the story as told by the local police, but there was no cooperation. Even those who criticized the Record's allegedly "unbalanced" coverage were unwilling to contribute to a fuller understanding of the story.

The Record's editorial board was unwilling to ignore facts about an important incident in the Williams community. Local police verified those facts, and no one stepped forward to contradict them. Given the urgency of the situation and the attention it drew, there was (and remains) no legitimate excuse for not publishing those facts.

Presumably, those in the Williams community who criticized the Record for printing the Duncan story did so based on principle. They failed, however, to apply this principle to a very similar story concerning thefts from Carter House which appeared on the same page. Most likely, the reason for this inconsistency is a desire to hide "one of our own" from public scrutiny. Yet, as Dean Fix said in this week's faculty meeting, all citizens are equally responsible to the law. Public censure is one of the results of a breach of that responsibility.

Council proposal to Record

We, the College Council, find the Record's coverage in its November 19th issue of the incident allegedly involving a Williams student and three men from Adams to be distasteful. We sympathize with the Record's responsibility to report the news. However, a greater sensitivity for the accused should have been shown. A newspaper covering events that take place at Williams should temper its reporting with the knowledge that oft times someone's college career and life may be at stake, as in this particular case. The effect of the headline "Duncan arrest in biting case..." was caustic and the position of the article on the front page brought more attention to the story than was necessary.

Reaction to Duncan article

Tragic

To The Editor:

I would like to express my sorrow at the tragic breach of journalistic responsibility displayed by the Record's editors and Andy Mayer in last week's lead article. I feel that there is no question that this was an extreme example of biased, unbalanced reporting, from the unnecessarily sensational headline through the nine paragraphs of copy underneath.

The second paragraph's statement that the Police Department's investigation had determined the facts of the incident of November 2 and therefore arrested Mike Duncan implies that Chief Zoito's version of events in paragraphs 5-8 is the full story of the altercation. That is not the case. The fact that Mayer could not get any of the Williams students who witnessed the alleged "brawl" to comment does not relieve the Record from its responsibility to fairly present the news. The court will determine the true facts of the case; perhaps those involved prefer that forum to pleading their case in the college newspaper.

I believe Dean Fix's school-wide communique wisely observed that we as a community should adopt a patient, non-judgemental attitude with regard to this matter, rather than engaging in speculation as to the actual events of November 2. I respect the freedom of the press and understand that neither College Council nor the Administration has any right of censorship over the Record. It is thus my fervent hope that in the future the paper's editors will exercise greater discretion in dealing with such a sensitive and unresolved issue. It is this reader's subjective opinion that not only has Mike Duncan's reputation been damaged unnecessarily, but that the integrity of the Record as well. The tragedy has occurred; let's prevent its ever happening again.

Callous

To The Editor:

We, the undersigned, have several qualms with the Record article of last week concerning the arrest of a Williams student. First, the callous decision to print such a headline reflects a complete lack of sensitivity on the part of the Record staff. The Williams Record should pride itself on being several steps above the National Enquirer, and the choice of a headline for such a sensitive article should reflect a professional and reasoned tone, not a sensationalist one. The tone of the article is incendiary and slanted and indicates that the reporter made little attempt to research pertinent details; for example, why were the three men from North Adams on campus, and what happened in the first fight? Furthermore, the connotation of the followlng sentence—"when the car approached with bright lights, the Williams students fled"—immediately implicates the Williams students involved. The author of last week's article, Andy Mayer, claims that the article was an objective presentation of the facts related by Williamstown Police Chief Zoito. If the article was an objective presentation of the facts, why didn't it include the other side of the story—specifically, why weren't the other Williams students involved consulted? We understand that there was an attempt to call them, but that no contact was made. Their statements constitute the very important "other side" of the story. A full investigation by a reporter should involve making verbal contact with the witnesses. If the witnesses can't be reached, this fact should be mentioned in the article. Furthermore, if, for a specific reason, the witnesses decline not to talk, this fact, too, should be printed. It is, indeed, the case that all potential witnesses in the trial and their depositions represent evidence in the hands of the police. The Record should be aware of and indicate in its report those extenuating circumstances which may inhibit a witness from talking to the newspaper.

In conclusion, our purpose in writing this letter is twofold: one, to alert the Williams community to the fact that there exists a very important other side of the story, and, two, to offer the Record advice on how to handle such situations if they decide to print a story.

Right to know

To The Editor:

We congratulate the Record for its story on the fight at the information booth a few weeks ago. In our opinion the Record neither sensationalized the events nor unduly concealed them. To have done either would have been a disservice to the community the Record has the responsibility to inform.

As reported in the Record, guilt has not been established in this case, and we don't intend to assume it or encourage personal attacks on people involved. Furthermore, although we think the all-campus letter criticizing the Record was mistaken, it was a responsible act by loyal friends.

On the other hand, the College Council has no business calling the story "distasteful." The Council claims to stand for all students, so it should not interfere with the Record's attempts to inform those students. If the Council had had its way, students would not know the full story, and we would still be exchanging exaggerated rumors. We find it hard to believe that the Council could charge the Record with insensitivity for quoting a police report in the same manner as the Berkshire Eagle does.

The college community cannot stick its head in the sand and pretend that the college has not gotten bad publicity from the assault case. And students have as much right to know about this as they do about the fact that a dormitory was burglarized or that some magazine rated us "1." The Council seems to believe that the college newspaper has the power to ruin a student's career—but hasn't the damage already been done by public events, a police report, and local newspaper coverage? Clearly the Council wouldn't be taken seriously if it tried to scold the Berkshire Eagle; it must make do with the Williams Record.

This is in sharp contrast with the Council's silence when the Record printed the names of town youths allegedly involved in the Homecoming thefts from Carter House. Why the double standard? Could the Council believe that "people like us" don't get involved with "things like that"? In any case, our point is this: the Record has the responsibility to report the news. Clearly this issue is a test of the Record's ability to meet this responsibility, and of the community's willingness to face reality. The College Council has already flunked this test.

WAAC demands

To The Editor:

In the wake of last week's protest at the Admissions Office, Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition would like to thank the administration and the Admissions Office staff for their courteous and responsible handling of the sit-in. We thank those who supported us, especially extending our appreciation to the faculty who expressed soldarity with the rally two weeks ago. At this time WAAC would like to clarify its position to members of the college community who may have been confused by recent events.

Are students above the law?

by Kurt Billick

Recent incidents involving Williams College students in allegedly criminal actions have stirred diseussion about similar incidents which have occurred during the past two years. Much of the discussion has focused on how the College in the past has handled both the publicity and disciplinary actions associated with these incidents. In many cases the College was faulted both for not informing the College community that the incidents had occurred and for seemingly lax punishments.

The lax punishments are of special concern. In many of the incidents, students had committed serious crimes, (e.g. stealing a car, stealing college computers, assaulting a police officer). The most severe punishment was the offender being asked to resign from the College. In some cases, the students were asked to take personal leave for a year. It is important to note, according to the information available (i.e., rumors), that none of these punishments appear as disciplinary action on the students' records. If a student is forced to leave on academic grounds his record would state that; in these cases, the withdrawal is described to have occurred for "personal resaons," not for "disciplinary action." An additional problem, not the responsibility of the College, is that in all three of the cases mentioned above the offenders were treated very lightly in court or did not go to trial at all. In one case, that of the computer theft, the College refused to press charges.

The lax nature of these punishments raises a disturbing question: are Williams College students above the law? Had similar crimes been committed by people our age who were not going to Williams there is little question that at least some of them would be in prison, especially in the case involving the police officer. To my knowledge, no Williams College student involved in a major criminal act has had more than a light sentence, invariably suspended. The key problem is the impression that committing a criminal act does not even damage a College career to a great extent. The way these incidents have been handled signals to the student body that they are not going to be held responsible for crimes in which they participate. Human nature is unfortunately such that if you believe that you can get away with something illegal, you are at least tempted to try. A school which prides itself on the elite positions of its graduates should be careful about the code of ethics it instills: did Jeb Stuart Magruder think he could plan Watergate because while at Williams he learned that being an elite makes you above the law?

It is possible that in all the incidents, the administration had reasons for its actions. The problem becomes one of communication. In many of the incidents the administration has said nothing, not even making a public acknowledgement that they had occurred. Students found out about the incidents either from the Record (rarely) or the rumor mill (more reliable and less of an administration tool). This gives the impression that the College is trying to cover up the incidents, for fear of bad public relations. (It can't be known that there is trouble in paradise.)

Thought on the problem indicates that it may run deeper than just criminal acts. Take the honor code for example; no one believes that it is seriously enforced. The reason is that the workings of the Honor and Discipline Committee are never reported. The only evidence of its existence a student ever gets is when he is brought in front of it. The only evidence that the school has any sort of disciplinary policy in regards to students assaulting other students, stealing from dorm rooms, vandalism and sexual harassment is in the students handbook. All of these things happen without any acknowledgement by the administration that they occurred or that disciplinary action was undertaken. The one exception is fire safety, where the adminstration made so many threats that action finally had to be taken. It is interesting to note that only in the fire extinguisher incident have I heard the College criticized for being too harsh.

The primary defense of the College for the lack of reporting on these incidents is to protect the students involved. More of a disservice is done by giving the impression that these rules are unenforced. The impression that a Williams student is not answerable for his actions only encourages more unfortunate incidents.

In the letter to the editor published in the Record of November 12, myself and several other students called for a public examination of the administration's disciplinary policy. Appropriate changes in the current system should center on keeping the College community aware of events and the College's action. A community the size of Williams has a strong need for respect of individual rights by other members. The Honor and Discipline Committee should have a distinct role in the process. If the administration becomes aware of a problem involving just the College community, an evaluation by the committee or the Dean should be made as to whether the police should be notified. If it is determined that the matter should be handled within the College, the community should be notified of what happened, what decision was made, and why. If the committee decides that the parties should remain anonymous, the incident and action taken should still be released. The Dean's Office should be placed under a similar obligation. If a case involving students is being handled by the civil authorities, the College should make a public acknowledgement that they are aware of their investigation. Once judgement is made by the civil authorities the College should—again preferably through the Honor and Discipline Committee—make its own disciplinary decisions. These decisions should then be announced to the College community. Similar procedures, again with the option of maintaining student anonymity, should be followed in regard to violation of the honor code. The Record has a role in keeping the community aware of these disciplinary actions by publishing the announcements. The effect would be similar to a policy of many small town newspapers printing the names of drunk drivers. The handling of the incident of November 2 is a welcome and positive change in this direction. My hope is that this procedure will become more widespread and standardized.

An exception to this call for increased discipline at Williams College should be heeded. My proposal centers around crimes which can be defined as having a victim. The natural pragmatist in me (some would say hypocrite, but the two terms are synonymous anyway) says that the College should not waste time trying to enforce victimless crimes that are routinely committed on this campus (e.g. underage drinking, smoking of marijuana, illegal sexual behavior, etc.). Such laws are unenforceable in this manner and attempting to do so would be an essay in absurdity.

The crux of my call for changes in the College disciplinary policy is to inform the student body that crimes which harm other people and violations of the honor code may not be committed with impunity. Williams College students are and should always be responsible for their actions. The College should do its utmost to see that this impression is fostered. Current policy does the opposite, and it is time for change. One Jeb Stuart Magruder is all this country needs.

Disciplinary policy at Williams

by Joe Ehlers

Recent events at Williams have once again focused attention on the relationship between the law and college students. College treatment of students who are charged with breaking the law, college regulations, or both often appears inconsistent and confusing. In an effort to shed more light on the issue, the Record recently asked Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Jim Reichheld '87, student chair of the Discipline Committee, to describe how Williams handles legal infractions by students.

"The College does not now, and never should, protect students from the consequences of illegal actions," said Fix, who began his term as Dean of the College this summer. "All citizens, students and non-students, are equally answerable to the law for their actions."

Students who have charges leveled against them have the right to have their case heard by the Discipline Committee, according to Reichheld. Either the Dean or the student can ask to have the case brought before the Committee. "A student also has a right to wait until court proceedings are finished before dealing with the Discipline Committee," added Reichheld.

In 1982, the Colby Committee, made up of students, faculty, and administrators, reviewed Williams disciplinary procedures. "The Committee affirmed the principle of confidentiality in discipline procedures," stated Fix.

Whether or not an offender's name should be made public has been debated heatedly this year. Names become part of the public record when they go outside of the college, but student displinary action at Williams is confidential. Reichheld personally feels that releasing names is not effective. "You want to correctly address the disciplinary problem," he stressed, "and that breaks down if publishing the name becomes a part of the punishment. It becomes very ambiguous." He added that the Committee has given public disclosure discussion, but has "firmly rejected it."

Fix believes there are other reasons, too, that raise questions over the effectiveness of public disclosure. "These cases sometimes involve students who are victims as well as students who are perpetrators, and the victims have a right to privacy we must respect.

"Protecting their right not to have the details of how they were victimized made public seems to me more important than satisfying the desire of the community to know the whole story and to judge for themselves whether justice has been done," he concluded.

Ugly myths about students

by Julie Convisser

"Women at Williams are ugly": let's face it. Finally, somebody has found the root of the "Dating Problem" at Williams. Not just one, but two young gentlemen were kind enough to enlighten the rest of the community as to the real source of the lack of social life at Williams when they offered their opinion by calling into a Community Affairs Program on dating at Williams broadcast November 17 on WCFM.

While the rest of us listeners, the host and the three panelists, Professors Solomon and Croyle from the Psychology Department and visiting Professor Greenlinger, a specialist in human sexuality, wrestled with all kinds of possible answers to the painful question of male-female intimacy at the College, these guys had already figured it all out: Williams women are ugly. Goodness only knows why the panelists and other callers continued pursuing other possibilities.

Students listening might have otherwise been suckered into believing all kinds of fallacious explanations. For example, they might have considered, as one ignorant caller suggested, that Williams students, male and female, are a highly motivated, task-oriented, ambitious bunch who sometimes might find the prospect of relationships threatening to or at least distracting from their educational and long-term goals. Our two better-informed gentlemen callers realized long ago, of course, that when they heard the most dedicated of their premed friends say, "I don't have the time or the emotional energy for a relationship," that what they really meant was, "Williams women are ugly."

If these two young men had not roused themselves from their Sunday afternoon activity and laid it out plain for the rest of us, then other students might have been taken in by one of the three panelist's theories: that Williams students on the whole have had little experience with failure up until their entrance into this selective college, and therefore do not know how to deal with the prospects of rejection or social failure in any other way than by avoiding its possibility.

Had the two gentlemen callers not so deftly analyzed the situation and found it in themselves to inform the rest of the community, other listeners might have thought that certain features of campus life were contributing factors to the significant lack of widespread casual dating or meaningful inter-gender intimacy. Naively placing partial blame for social woes on the heavy workload, the orientation of campus parties towards either self-limiting cliques or large beer bashes, and the absence of the Log as we used to know it, Williams students might have completely missed the single self-explanatory reason: Williams women are ugly.

Worst of all, if these fellows had not

Misdirected

To the Editor:

It is maddening to view and read about the atrocities against the human rights of South African blacks. They elicit the deepest feelings of anger, both because of the acts themselves, and because we are helpless to determine what we can do to remedy them. The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition is Williams's answer to that undirected resentment. Unfortunately, however, I am afraid that has become misdirected resentment.

The major concern of the WAAC, as I understand it, has been the question of whether the college should divest from companies with business interests in South Africa. I doubt the benefits of setting the example (whose effectiveness is dubious) will outweigh the benefits of having an active voice in that company as a major shareholder. It seems to me the WAAC's efforts could be better directed towards the heart of the problem: the disrespect for the blacks of South Africa by her ruling class.

But the WAAC disagrees with my opinion, and has taken action in favor of divestment. They have, for example, offered forums of discussion (of which President Oakley partook) in the publication Germinal, formed a massive petition signing movement, and staged a protest at the induction ceremony of President Oakley. Each of these events has created tension of some sort against the group.

First, in Germinal, Oakley specifically detailed his stand on the divestment question, graciously and inoffensively. The retort by WAAC was however, abrasive and seemed to be more of an attack on Francis Oakley than on divestment. Second, the over enthusiasm of their petition signing efforts bcleagured students, and wore their patience thin. A good friend of mine, for example, after being hassled one too many times by a petitioner replied "I'm in favor of aparthcid." This person did not really feel this way, but such comments cannot denote progress by the WAAC. Finally, tainting Oakley's induction ceremony with divestment was viewed by many as offensive, and out of place.

These examples show that instead of uniting the college for an admirable cause, the WAAC is fracturing it. I understand their anger against apartheid, but President Oakley and the Trustees are not the symbols of it that they portray as a result of their misdirected rage. Resentment against the group was evident at the vigil at the President's house, on Novembcr 18, when the event was drowned out by stereos from West College (an action I take no stand on). I say to WAAC, "Change your focus and especially your methods, or sadly, your causc will continue to work against you."

made their view public, the most offensive of the blighted and benighted Williams women along with some of their blinder male friends might have continued to suppose that Williams men might find Williams women a stimulating challenge to their egos and wooing skills. They might have tried to suggest that many Williams men, having had illustrious high school careers in everything from mathematics to lacrosse and the debate club and having enjoyed corresponding success with members of the opposite sex thus duly awed by them, are faced at Williams with women equally accomplished and therefore perhaps less easily impressed by the trappings of academic and other achievements. Williams women might be deciding about the potential for relationships on bases other than the GPA or football records; they might be trying to get to know the men beneath it all. And this might be scary—unless, of course, everyone realizes that this has no bearing on the situation whatsocver and that the real crux of the problem is that Williams women are ugly.

Yes indeed, it is a good thing those guys were not daunted by Professor Greenlinger's statement that in formal attractiveness evaluation studies the Williams population, male and female, has been consistently rated more attractive than most College populations. If these fellas and their concurrent friends say the reason they roadtrip to Mt. Holyoke and Smith Colleges is because the Williams women have particularly offensive physiques, then they're ugly, right? Never mind attractiveness evaluation studies; and too bad for those deserted Williams women and the blind losers who stay behind with them on weekends.

By calling a spade a spade—that is, calling Williams women cows—and pinpointing the trouble with the dating situation at Williams as articulatcly as these two gentlemen did, they did us all a favor. Without their notably frank assessment, the rest of us might have continucd to be troubled over searching ourselves and examining our community in order to understand better the source of this bothersome fault in Williams life. But thanks to these two guys, some of us now feel we more fully comprehend the full dimensions of the problem. They revealed to the rest of us that for some the depth of sensitivity about the issue of relationships at Williams is indicative of an attitude towards relationships which itself is a problem. For some of us, it seems, the basis of relationships remains, like these two callers' analysis, on a pretty unsatisfactory level: skin deep.

Arraignment... Fire...Arraignment...Fire...

Michael Duncan '86 pleaded not guilty to a charge of mayhem last Wednesday in Northern Berkshire Trial Court. He was released without bail, and the case was continued until Dec. 18 for conference.

Duncan had been arrested Nov. 15 by the Williamstown Police in connection with a fight between 10 Williams students and three Adams men, which took place Nov. 1.

In another arraignment taking place the same day, Robert Derosier III, 17, and James Donlan, 18, pleaded not guilty to two counts each of larceny from a building. Their case was also continued until Dec. 18 for conference.

The arrests of the two youths followed an investigation into thefts from Carter House that took place during the Williams-Amherst football game on Nov. 9.

Fires

by John Felkner

During the weekend of Nov. 15, four separate first broke out in Bronfman Science Center and Greylock Dining Hall bathrooms, according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks.

Friday, Nov. 15, a fire was started in the men's and women's bathroom outside of the Bronfman Audltorium, apparently by the ignition of some rolls of toilet paper in the bathroom receptacles, Jenks said. The fires occurred at about 7:30 p.m., while a movie was playing in the theater.

Late Saturday afternoon, Nov. 16, Professor Stuart Crampton was working in his Bronfman office when he smelled smoke. He went looking for the source and discovered smoke pouring out of the receptacle in the men's bathroom outside the auditorium. He said that he poured water on the smoldering materials and reported the incident to security.

Shortly thereafter, Crampton saw three people, whom he described as high-school students, near the ground-floor elevator in Bronfman. He said he called to them, at which point they ran away.

At an unknown time Saturday afternoon, a burning object was dropped onto the floor next to the Bronfman ground-floor elevator, damaging some floor tiles, Jenks said.

On Sunday, Nov. 17, another fire was started at about 4:15 p.m. in the men's bathroom in Greylock Dining Hall. Again, the fire was lit in the bathroom receptacle, Jenks said, melting the receptacle to the floor. Jenks said George Whipple, the manager of the dining hall, put out the fire.

Faculty target second-year advising

by Debbie Snyder

Students have brought up the issue of advising repeatedly during the dinners and discussions President Francis Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix have had with six residential houses so far. As a result of this concern, Fix said that within the next two weeks he will recommend to Oakley a method for examining advising on all levels.

The lack of formal advising for sophomores is a large problem, according to several faculty members. Assistant Dean Roberto Ifill said, "Freshman advising to some extent is almost not as important as sophomore advising. Freshman are very adventurous, but with one year behind them, sophomore slump and important decisions to make such as junior year abroad and major, sophomores probably need more individual attention."

German professor Gail Newman, faculty associate for Gladden House and a freshman advisor, said the impression she gets from students is that the period from second semester of freshman year through sophomore year is a critical time for advising.

"There is a lack of continuity between freshman advising and major advising," she said. "Freshman advising has little connection to what will happen later on." Newman said she feels this situation could be improved with a formal continuation of advising and a more collective approach to freshman advising.

Extra time commitment

The recognized difficulty with formal sophomore advising is the additional time commitment it would demand, faculty members said. Eighty-four members of the faculty are presently serving as faculty advisors, and to implement a similar program for sophomores would involve doubling the time commitment or the number of advisors.

As an alternative to formal advising, Ifill suggested that there be several sophomore assemblies during the year and that students take the initiative to seek individual advice.

Several faculty members said they would be willing to continue advising students through the sophomore year because they feel it is a critical time for making academic decisions. Freshman advisor William Moomaw said, "Sophomores are left very much adrift. One area in which students do badly is choosing non-major courses because they give relatively little thought to what those courses are likely to add up to."

Freshman advisor Rosemarie Tong said she would be willing to advise more students, because, "It seems there is an expression of need for such continuity." She said that she believes advising sophomores would not be as demanding as advising freshmen because it would only be academic advising.

Student opinion

Several students feel that a formal sophomore advising program would help them make academic decisions. David Johnson '88 said, "There should be advising if it is a real advisor and not just a name." He said that he feels advisors could help sophomores make more informed decisions about majors and junior year abroad.

Jon Kraft '86 said that he believes students should have an advisor for all four years. "It would have been good to have had an advisor my sophomore year to talk to about a major and what courses to take."

Freshman advising is the most organized and only required advising, according to Fix. He said that he expects an examination of the advising system to begin quickly. He noted that the Committee on Educational Policy is reviewing the advising system as part of the curriculum review, but that it is a two-year process. "Mr. Oakley and I would like to see immediate changes," he said.

Labor Advocates seek student support

by Anne O'Malley

Professor Kurt Tauber challenged the Williams Labor Advocates last week to "energize students so they come out and help," in western Massachussetts's labor situation. In a meeting at the Log last Wednesday, conducted by Tauber and Chris Salyer '86, the new group showed documentary films and sponsored speakers to acquaint students with the current labor situation.

The first film, "Labor Relations in the Northern Berkshires," depicted the state of industrial and service workers in the Berkshire Valley. 1,800 of the BITNET system, which allows users to send electronic mail to other campuses and spoke of putting computers in dorms. Wright said he plans to have a word processor, three terminals and a high-quality printer installed in one of the Mission Park common rooms by January.

Wright said the system, ACTION, is not compatible with IBMs, Apples or DECmates and recommended students use the machines for small jobs, such as a resume or a letter, rather than for thesis-writing. "We want to see people's reaction," Wright said. "If it works well in one TV room, we might put more terminals in another."

Major development

The faculty voted for the addition of two courses to the major in computer science, so that the major will require 11 courses instead of the current nine. The program will consist of nine computer-science courses and two related math courses.

According to Thomas Jorling, chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy, computer science is an interdepartmental major and therefore should carry more courses than the nine or 10 generally required for departmental majors. He noted that currently there are two majors — theater and studio art — which require 11 courses.

"Computer science covers a variety of fields from engineering to business," Bruce said, emphasizing the addition of four core courses in principle and theory to the existing department offerings. He added that the proposal is "appropriate for computer science as a science within a liberal arts curriculum.

Classics Professor Charles Fuqua, however, said he feels the number of courses required for the major is too high. "If it's an 11-course major, that means that over one-third of the courses a student takes are required major courses," he said. History professor Russell Bostert disagreed, saying he felt requiring 11 courses gave strength to a major. "I'd like to see history majors required to take an economics course and a political science course," he said.

alleviate the crunch at the end of the semester, possibly by making the midterm reading period a bit crunchier. Obviously, that effect would mean a trade-off."

Craig Ward '86, a member of the Committee, said, "The faculty really felt that fall break wasn't doing what it was supposed to do. It served no specific academic purposes. With stress such a big issue on campus during first semester last year, it seemed important that students be able to work on late semester work and go home for the traditional meal. In the past, one always cut in on the other."

According to Ward, the shortened fall break was not the cause of great concern among the students on the committee. "No one felt that going home in October was that big a deal," he said.

Bostert noted that these changes will ease up travel plans for many students. "Obviously, the Thanksgiving vacation is not working well. Many students leave on Tuesday rather Wednesday. At reading period some students are traveling very long distances on the four day break or are leaving town early."

Jim Reichheld '87, President of the JAs, commented that the changes are "not beneficial at all." He said he believes fall break is important, especially to freshmen. "They (freshmen) need this break around midterms and it comes at a very convenient time," he said.

Dr. Frances Lippman of Psychological Counseling Services said that, while it would be hard for her to predict the effects of the longer time without a vacation, "My general feeling (is) that there is a great deal of pressure, and students need as much time off as possible to deal with stress."

Bell said, "We are in a position of one year past voting and one year until we can try it out. If it doesn't seem to be a good idea, it will probably be reversed."

Bostert noted, "There is sense to putting it into effect for at least two years so we can get an idea of how it works as a long-term experiment rather than just for one year."

During second semester, the Calendar Committee will meet to make a recommendation for the 1988-89 academic year.

School vs. sports fuels forum's debate at Log

by Andrew Mayer

"I think academics and athletics are complementary. They go hand in hand," said Williams varsity basketball coach Harry Sheehy at the Idea Exchange Forum, "Athletics and Academics at Williams: Conflict or Complement," last Tuesday at the Log.

Edward Stein '87, co-president of the I.E.F., said the purpose of the forum was to find out "whether someone who is involved in athletics has their academic life affected." Approximately 50 people attended the discussion, including a number of caoches and student athletes.

After the discussion Stein summarized the results: "There is a broad-based argument that athletics and academics are complementary most of the time, but there are times where they do conflict." At the forum, Williams Athletic Director Robert Peck said, "I do not think athletics and academics have to be competing. They should be complementary.

Allocation of resources

Professor Williams Moomaw '59, himself an undergraduate athlete, questioned the allocation of resources and time between athletics and academics. He also said he was not sure athletics should be involved in the admissions process.

"My sense is that there is a good deal more effort to see that enough students are able to play basketball and hockey than there is to assure enough students to support a chemistry department," said Moomaw.

Moomaw said he wondered if there are more important areas in which the money allocated to the new gymnasium could have been spent. "The amount of money we have for the faculty is pathetic," he said. He said the research area of the sciences receives only $30,000 dollars, the same amount the football team receives.

However Moomaw agreed that it may be time for athletics to get a new gym, after both the sciences and music departments have received new buildings in recent years.

Lose athletes to Ivys?

Williams varsity ski coach Bud Fisher said he worried that de-emphasizing athletics would cause the school to lose potentially good scholar-athletes to other schools. "If we are to de-emphasize athletics, we must compete with schools where athletics are de-emphasized. I don't see any Ivy League schools in that group," he said.

Admissions Director Philip Smith cited a recent study involving Williams and eight other colleges which showed that success in extracurricular activities strongly predicts success in college. "If a student has put a lot of effort into a major area it is indicative of success," Smith said.

Smith said he invites all athletic teams to submit a list to the admissions office of possible applicants whom they feel would be strong in their area. He said that he sends a list of all applicants who have received at least one varsity letter to the coaches asking them if anyone on the list is especially noteworthy. Smith added that he sends any music tapes or artistic work to the respective departments, also asking them for a list of preferred students.

Smith did admit that the athletic department seems to be more concerned with applicants than, for example, the music department, because of the nature of the activities.

CDE supplies fellows' demands

by Bill O'Brien

The engraving above the front door reads "Lambda Chapter of Delta Psi—March 15th—1853-1886." Of course, there are no more fraternities at Williams these days, so what exactly is this building at the junction of Routes 2 and 7 used for now?

Ask this question and some may answer that the Center for Development Economics is located there, but few will know what CDE is all about.

According to Paul Clark, the current chairman of the program, CDE was established because "there was an important need for some education in post-graduate economics applied to the circumstances of developing countries, which are rather different than the circumstances of the United States." Several members of the political science department established the program in the late 1950's with the financial assistance of the Ford Foundation.

The fellows who have come to the Center have already earned a B.A. or a B.Sc. in economics and are usually employed by the governments of their particular countries. They come to Williams for an intensive one-year program aimed at furthering their understanding of economic policy-making in developing countries. Upon graduating from the program, the majority of the fellows return to serve their governments.

Since 1960, the Center has had more than 500 fellows from 53 developing countries. This year's class of 24 students includes natives of Bangladesh, Peru, Korea, Malaysia and the Phillipines, among others. Many of the students are married and most have come to the United States alone.

Financing for the program comes from several sponsoring agencies, including the Ford Foundation, the U.S. Agency for International Development, the United Nations and the Organization of American States, as well as from the participating governments themselves.

The Center has its own courses taught by Williams' economics professors. "They have a set curriculum in specific areas that have to do with development economics," said Gayle Lewis, assistant chairman of the Center.

In another ivory tower, fellows from foreign countries study at the Center for Development Economics, located at the junction of Routes 2 & 7. (Mayfield)

Foreign relations

These are the facts behind CDE. Conversations with the fellows uncover more personal issues. One of their most universal concerns is their interaction, or lack thereof, with Williams undergraduates.

"We have the feeling that Williams undergraduates don't want to mix with CDE...we can understand this. This part of America (New England) is a little bit conservative," observed Ali Hariri Ekbal, a fellow from Cairo, Egypt. Several other fellows agreed.

Efforts are being made to improve this situation. CDE fellows are served breakfast, lunch and two dinners at the Center and the rest of their meals are at one of the main dining halls. "This is partly to get them out of the building and partly to encourage them to have interaction with undergraduates meeting informally over meals," said Lewis.

"This works in varying degrees," he continued. "They're not real keen on going out of the building on dark winter nights; they're not real keen on the food in the dining rooms. A lot of them have very specific national tastes and religious restrictions."

A more successful means of interaction is the housing system, which appoints a house member as CDE liason. "A large number of houses allocate part of their social events budget to some activity involving interaction with the fellows," according to Clark.

Clark points out that there are several factors working against strong interaction between the fellows and the undergraduates. First, the fellows are much older (their average age is thirty). Second, they have already been through four years of college and their interests are now narrowed to a certain field (economics). While these factors may make interaction difficult, it is by no means impossible.

"The same interaction with the same group all the time makes you rather bored," said Mohd Abdul Aziz, a fellow from Bangladesh. Clark added, "The Center has a lot of opportunities if individuals take initiatives. The institution (the College) can open up some opportunities; the ones that work are those that have a personal element."

Profile: Professor Ray Baker

by Alexandra Shapiro

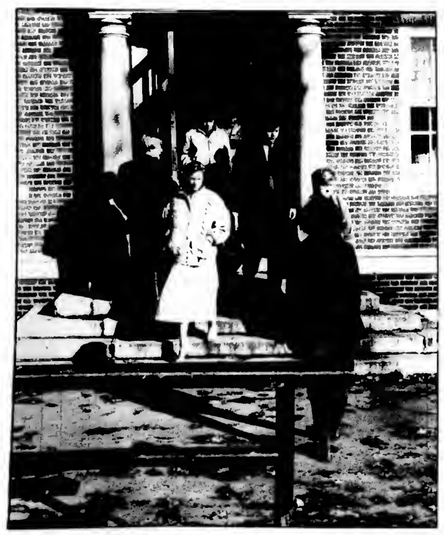
Williamstown may be a long way from Geneva, Switzerland, but for political science Professor Raymond Baker, the Purple Valley was a fine vantage point from which to observe last week's Reagan-Gorbachev summit meetings. Baker, who is Williams' resident expert in U.S.-Soviet affairs, found the summit interesting but inconclusive.

"Nothing happened," said Baker. "It was really a non-summit, or a 'fireside summit,' to borrow the media's term. On the positive side, the dialogue has been reopened—the renewal of trade and cultural ties, the risk center and so forth are good signs of renewed exchange between the two nations. But these developments are only positive because five years have been wasted, and because we lost touch with the adversary."

Although President Reagan emerged from the summit in a victorious stance, Baker finds his success more the result of adopting a realistic posture than of any earth-shattering diplomatic coup.

"Reagan has moved a considerable distance from his original positions, which were unsound and unreasonable—he's the one who has made a 'fresh start,'" said Baker.

Nevertheless, Baker downplayed the concrete results of "summitry": "In terms of progress on the hard issues, the results are disheartening. Escalation of the arms race still seems imminent; the Reagan Administration's planned Strategic Defense Initiative will continue as planned; and in the geopolitical arena, peace will be accomplished only if areas such as Nicaragua, Afghanistan and Cambodia continue to be lumped together."



According to Baker, the summit's success—where it exists—is largely cosmetic. "There has been an improvement in rhetoric without a corresponding improvement in policy," he said. "One merely has to look to the reason the summit took place at all—popular pressure in the West. Reagan was responding to political needs....He can now say 'I've gone the last mile.' His attitude might be changed, but his policies are the same."

Reagan claims that his shiniest new toy—the SDI—is an opportunity to end the arms race once and for all. According to Baker, this is far from the truth. "The Sovlets are genuinely terrified by the SDI," said Baker. "They do not want to engage in an arms race in that field. But they do have the economic capaclty to counter the U.S. if they must. As Gorbachev made clear, they will go ahead if the U.S. does; the Soviets have the technology.

"In addition, they can work to improve the offensive systems to counter the 'Star Wars' defense," added Baker. "If SDI is not halted, the arms race will escalate."

Baker also worries about a military-industrial complex in the U.S. that exacerbates the arms race. "The defense contractors have so much money already invested in SDI development that they are severely threatened by potential arms control agreements," said Baker. "Companies such as TRW ($424 million contract), Boeing ($217 million) and Lockheed ($192 million) must see the SDI through, because in the long

Dazed from the sight of freshman living quarters, a tour stumbles out of darkness into the light of the Freshman Quad. (Somers)

On tour with the walking heads

by Corinna Lamb

What was your first impression of Williams? For some of us it was formed before we could read or write, from being dragged back to annual Homecoming Weekends by our zealous alumni parents. But for many others, our first glimpse of Williams was on the campus tour.

According to Ed Stein '87, co-vice president in charge of tours for the Purple Key, "The tour plays a very important role. The tour guide may well be the only student a prospective meets. People will remember if the guide is rude or happy."

Said tour guide Katie Kessler '88, "Many students on the tour are doing their New England sweep, looking at 14 schools in 3 days. You really try and sell Williams to them." Thus, the tour guide's goal is to make Williams stand out from other schools.

Thanks, guys

Of course, some aspects of the tour are only too memorable. Guide Seksom Suriyapa '88 remembers bringing a tour group to show them his room, only to find his walls plastered with cutouts from Playboy—put up by his roommates as a joke. Suriyapa's response? "I explained that around finals people get pretty weird and out of control."

A tour guide must be able to think quickly in difficult situations. Stanley Macel '88 was conducting a tour past Stetson when one sharp-eyed applicant looked at the inscription above and remarked,"Shakespeare is spelled wrong." Macel replied, "No, that's Bob, not William."

One can't always control exactly what happens on the tour. Stein recalls taking a tour through the Science Quad, when he noticed two dogs copulating on the lawn. "One father asked if this was typical of the sexual relations at Williams. I couldn't really think of any comeback," said Stein.

Quad bod

One tour was passing by Sage when a "dead body" (in reality a stuffed life sized doll) came hurtling out the window accompanied by blood-curdling screams. Some ingenious freshmen figured this morbid prank would scare the applicants, if not "enliven" the tour. Another tour was ambling through the Freshman Quad when they were suddenly pelted with water balloons.

Embarrassing moments can occur when a tour guide runs into acquaintances. "People will shout rude and incriminating things to you across the street, like "You were great last night," making sure the whole tour hears," said Kessler. Stein's friends have shouted, "So they finally let you out of jail," while Suriyapa has run into people who shout, "Go to Amherst!" He added, "One guy used to see my tour coming and shout from his window 'I can't take it anymore!'" Luckily, these instances are rare.

A crucial aspect of the tour is answering the applicant's questions about the College. "I talk about the quality of academics, the student-faculty relations, housing and the library," said Stein. "People ask, 'Isn't Williams just a preppy jock school?', or comment, 'Everybody here looks the same,'" said Kessler. "I say on the surface it appears that way but once you know people you realize how diverse your classmates are."

Tours

Another common question is "What makes Williams different from Amherst?" Kessler stated, "We never badmouth other schools, even though I might be wearing my Slamherst pin." Instead, guides try to stress the positive aspects of Williams.

Questions about the social life are less frequent. Theresa Cavallere '88 believed this is because applicants are afraid to ask about drinking or dating in front of their parents. "It might be better if there were separate tours given for students and parents, because students are too intimidated ." Some of the parents are less bashful, however. "One father asked me how the sex life was here," said Stein.

The tour's impact varies from student to student. Said Cavi liere, "I didn't like my tour guide much. The tour didn't influence me to go here at all." On the other hand, Ann Munchmeyer '88 said, "The tour made me realize how much larger Williams is than I had thought. I wouldn't have come here if I hadn't gone on the tour."

Baker

term the traditional defense budget has little growth potential. SDI seems to be the companies' only opportunity to continue increasing profits."

Baker found further problems with SDI, particularly the closed environment in which decisions are made. "The viability and progress of the SDI are assessed by 'experts' who work in the industry—there is a clear conflict of interest," noted Baker. Yet the Reagan Administration argues that only people working on the production side have the technical knowledge to monitor the SDI's progress."

This Catch-22 situation inclines Baker to an attitude of citizen-responsiblity for observing world leaders and their often convincing doublespeak.

"We have a responsibility to make ourselves literate in the technology," he said. "People must look beyond the media, with its trivial coverage ('issues' such as exactly how many hours Reagan and Gorbachev spoke privately, or who designed Nancy's dress) to find the real issues of the summit. Arms control issues can be understood and must be seen within the context of political economy, specifically the interests of the U.S. militrary-industrial complex.

"As for geopolitical issues, each situation must be distinguished and understood on its own terms," Baker continued. "Here at Williams, we have the independent sources of information and we ought to use them: speakers, the Chaplain (Carol Pepper, who went to Nicaragua) and so forth. In addition, political activism should follow. Movements like the Freeze Movement are necessary, and they can, however slowly, force politicians to respond. Citizens' groups pressured for Reagan to meet Gorbachev—and he did—so there is hope that activism can be useful."

Labor

manufacturing jobs were lost in the area between 1979 and 1984, and 500 additional jobs are expected to be lost because of layoffs at the Sprague Electric plant in North Adams, according to the film.

In North Adams alone, according to the film, there have been five plant closings since October 1984. Another film, "Business in America," focused on steel mill workers in Pittsburgh.

Clare Hoeppner represented Western Massachussetts Labor Action, an organization which provides support to workers who are in need of assistance such as medical and dental care, legal help and utilities payments. She said her group is in need of volunteers, because "most of our workers right now are in the middle of utility shutdowns, losing jobs, their families are breaking up." She said that, because many of the volunteers do not have phones and cars, that even something as simple as transportation would be a tremendous help.

"Real world"

Economics professor David Fairris spoke on behalf of the Northern Berkshire Labor Coalition. He said there are a variety of things students can do to help workers in the Berkshires. "Williams students were incredibly helpful with the Carol Cable strike last year," he said.

He told students that their academic skills could be very helpful to workers in the community, but he also argued that students could learn from those workers by becoming involved in the labor issue.

longer justifiable for companies to have investments in South Africa and not sign the Principles, Lewis said.

According to Lewis, the ACSR ran into difficulties corresponding with companies that had not signed the Sullivan Principles. One such company, Lubrizol, refused to respond to questions from William Reed, Williams treasurer and a member of ACSR. For that reason, Lewis said, Williams sold its $238,000 investment in Lubrizol.

The policy change was also a result of an ACSR annual review of investment policies, Lewis said. He said that it was not directly connected to the activities of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition, although he said that he welcomes WAAC's role in promoting South Africa as an issue.

$1.7 million divested

Last September, Williams sold $317,000 worth of stock in the Timkin Company, which had also refused to sign the Sullivan Principles. Prior to that, Williams had divested more than $1.7 million of stock held in companies whose business practices in South Africa were seen as unacceptable, Lewis said.

Lewis said that Williams now only has stock in two companies with South African investments that have not signed the Sullivan Principles. One of these, U.S. Steel, is a minority shareholder in a South African company and therefore cannot itself decide to sign the Sullivan Principles, Lewis said. The other company, Healthdyne, will be directly affected by the new policy.

ACSR member Sharon Burke '88 said she hoped the move was an initial step towards a more extensive campaign of divestment. The next steps, she said, may not come for several years, however, because of the reluctance of other members to push ahead.

Sheehy holds high hopes for hoopsters

by Cliff Peale

Returning eight lettermen from last year's squad that went 12-10 and tied for the Little Three title, the basketball team looks to this year with sky-high expectations, raised even further by a talented group of newcomers and the return of forward Mike Meadows '86.

A brutal schedule could bring those high hopes crashing to earth, however; the team is still young, carrying six freshmen and sophomores. "We don't have much time to jell," says coach Harry Sheehy. "We could soon be the best 0-9 team in New England."

Point guard Tim Walsh '86 will carry the biggest load on his shoulders after an up-and-down junior season. "Tim's playing better basketball this preseason than I've ever seen him play," says Sheehy. Last year, Walsh made second team All-New England and scored 22 points per game, but shot only 45% from the field. This year, the hope is that Walsh will not have to carry the team offensively in stretches, as he did last year against such teams as Amherst, when he scored ten straight points late in the game to wrap up an Eph win.

Rebounding will be one of the key areas of concern for the basketball team this year, and senior forward Mike Meadows demonstrates how its done.

The big men, all experienced, should increase their point production to take off some of that load. Brandt Johnson '87 has one forward spot sewn up after averaging 12 points and seven rebounds a game last year. He'll team with either Rob Stubblebine '88 or one of the co-captains Chris Gray '86 or Greg Lang '87 at the center position.

Sweet-shooting John Ciulla '87 showed greatly improved defense last year; he'll start at big guard and help key the offense with his jumper. Meadows perhaps holds the key; he's the first Eph small forward in several years who can shoot the jumper, run the floor, and hit the boards. "Michael is a better basketball player than we've had there recently," says Sheehy.

Brutal schedule

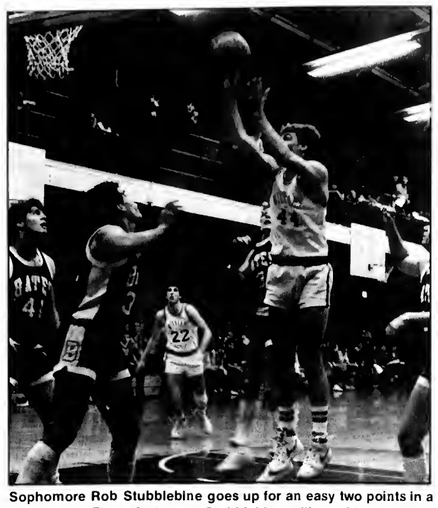
This starting lineup will be hard-pressed to finish at .500 given the schedule they'll be playing. Besides Division I Dartmouth and Division II Springfield, the Ephs will face New England powers Hamilton, Trinity, Tufts, Clark, and WPI.

The Little Three looks very tough this year, with Amherst returning all five starters and Wesleyan bringing back four. "The Little Three is gonna be an out-and-out war," says Sheehy.

With this grueling schedule, depth could be a key factor, and the Ephs look better off in that category than they have in several years. Sophomore Chris Swindell, back from a great year with the junior varsity, will play at both guard and forward. "Chris is a tough kid," says Sheehy, "and a great defensive player." Mike Masters '88 will help back up Meadows at small forward.

At guard, Bill Melchionne '88 has impressed, showing good poise and great leaping ability. He joins Dave Paulsen '87 and Mike Harrington '88, along with Jeff Roth '87, to provide Walsh and Ciulla with some much-needed rest. Senior Tarek Essa returns to provide help for the big men.

Must get ball inside



Offensively, the squad must get the ball inside to take some of the scoring pressure off of Walsh and Ciulla. "We've been pounding it into people how important it is to get the ball inside," says Sheehy. "We're not going to win shooting from 17 feet."

Still, the two veteran backcourt men will spark the offense. Ciulla scored 14 points a game last year while shuttling back and forth between guard and forward. Sheehy simply seems concerned about the number of shots that the backcourt takes. "We want the shots in general distributed better," he says.

"We're potentially a good team if the chemistry comes together," says Sheehy. "We're still a young team, but we're hoping that the experience of last year pays off."

The other main area of concern for Sheehy besides improving the team's shooting percentage is rebounding. "We're not real quick to the ball," he says. "We've got to find somebody else (besides Johnson) to get seven-plus rebounds per game."

Missing so far are sophomore small forward Doug Phillips, out indefinitely with a stress fracture, and classmate Henry Jones, out until at least January. "We'll miss Doug," Sheehy says. "He was one of those guys that was always around the ball." The team will also play this year with a 45-second clock, which shouldn't make much of a difference until the end of the game.

Sophomore Rob Stubblebine goes up for an easy two points in a win against Bates last year. Stubblebine will provide some key depth in the frontcourt this year as the Ephs try to take the Little Three crown after tying Wesleyan last year. (Scheibe)

Soaring high in the air to release his jumper, senior point guard Tim Walsh goes for two points in a home game last year against Bates. Walsh will again key the offense for this year's team after averaging 22 points a game last year. (Scheibe)

In highest Eph finish, Ellison 38th at Div.3

In the highest finish ever for an Eph runner, senior John Ellison took 38th place at the Division III Nationals held Saturday at Emory University in Atlanta.

He ended with a time of 27:13 and missed All-American honors by 20 seconds. From the 185 man field, the top 25 are named All-American. The winning time for the 8000m course was 25:31. Ellison described the course as very slow, noting that he ran the same distance in 24:55 last week at the qualifying New Englands. "It was hilly and hot and a little muddy," he said. The seventy degree weather in Atlanta took its toll on the runners as many could not complete the course and the medical tent was literally overflowing after the race.

Ellison was pleased with his performance and the season overall, "I was really happy with the way I peaked right at the the end of the season for Little Threes and New Englands, the qualifier, and Nationals." He won the Little Three race at Amherst and finished eighth at the New Englands held at Southern Masschusetts University last Saturday.

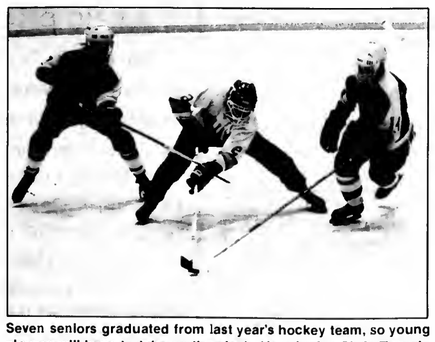
Pucksters ready to take to the ice

by Greg Keller

The varsity hockey team enters the 1985-86 season without many of the experienced leaders of last year's 8-13 squad. The Ephmen lost eight players to graduation, including four of their top five scorers.



Although head coach Bill McCormick anticipates a building year, he is optimistic that the returning lettermen can carry the team until a strong group of freshmen players become accustomed to college-level hockey. McCormick will rely on junior Denny Wright (8 goals, 6 assists), Mike O'Connell (9,4), and Chris Traggio (5,8) to spark the offensive attack. Seniors Joe Sciacca and Dave Fritz, along with junior Craig Cheevers and Guy Kurtz, will also anchor the forward lines.

Sophomore Mark Morrison will start the season in the net after accumulating an 88% save percentage in 12 games as a freshman. Senior Marty Collins, a three-year letterman, also has considerable game experience and is still in competition for the starting role.

Seniors Scott Karmozyn and Chris Pappas, the team's captain, will lead a strong but inexperienced defensive unit. Eric Knutsen '86 and Tim McKone '87 saw limited action until the end of last season. Sophomore Tim Yarter and junior John Booth return after missing most of last season due to injuries.

Fortunately, the Eph squad possesses a promising freshman class with the potential to fill many of the holes. Tim Frechette, a strong skater and stickhandler, will team with Pappas on the starting defensive line. Chris Conway will center for Mark Swenson and Will Putnam on an aggressive third line. Chris Donato and Walter Hoffman should also see some action as forwards.

The Ephs hopes for a winning season will depend on how quickly the team develops. The squad faces several of its toughest Division II opponents early in the season, including Norwick, AIC, and Holy Cross. The team also suffers from having only eight home games on its schedule. The squad's first test of this season was an away game with Division I Princeton today.

Seven seniors graduated from last year's hockey team, so young players will have to take up the slack. Here junior Chris Traggio tries to control the puck against two Salem defenders. Last year's team finished at 8-13. (Eagon)

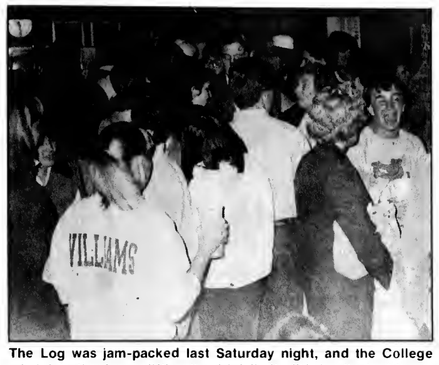
Fix lifts Log two-drink limit



by Harwell Wells

A line winding out the door and down the stairs appeared at the Log Saturday night for the first time this school year. The crowds came back as Dean of the College Stephen Fix eliminated the two-drink limit, which had been in effect since September.

According to Log Manager Mike Cutler, the first night's crowd totaled between 375 and 400 students, a crowd which necessitated a late closing of the establishment. "We're so glad to be back" said Cutler, referring to the new popularity of the Log, and he also mentioned several students' praise of the new policy. He described the first night as very nice and mentioned no problems with the new policies.

The announcement of the removal of the limit was contained in a letter from Fix placed in all students' mailboxes Saturday morning. As the rules stand now, students who are legal drinkers in Massachusetts may buy individual drinks at the Log with no limit, but no pitchers will be sold.

In his letter, Fix wrote, "I believe it is time to remove the limit and to encourage responsible drinking." At the same time, he said that all state laws would be strictly enforced.

The Log was jam-packed last Saturday night, and the College administration hopes lifting the drink limit will bring the traditional gathering place back to its former glory. (Plonsker)

Fix said that attempts by legal students to purchase drinks for underage students would be a "serious violation of the College's code of conduct." Failure to conform to the rules, Fix wrote, "will inevitably result in the permanent elimination of alcohol (at the Log)."

Double I.D.

David LaMarre, Log assistant manager, said that all students would be required to check their student I.D.'s at the door, with further identification needed in order to get the hand-stamp that allows one to drink. LaMarre said, "The only acceptable identification (for getting drinks) will be a driver's license

CC unveils new program to raise social awareness

by John Canty

The College Council approved resolutions last week to hold a meatless meal during Winter Study and to raise the Student Activities Tax by $5 per student.

The meatless meal is part of a series of social awareness projects the Council is sponsoring during January. Other projects deal with area poverty, racism in America and support for the Mure Memorial Hospital in India.

Council President Anza Mammen '86 said that the Council sees the sponsorship of these projects as demonstrating "its special responsibility. The Council is probably the only student organization on campus that has the access to disseminate this kind of information. Students at Williams get very academically oriented, very insular. The Council can reach to bring these concerns to the student."

Poverty in America

Council Secretary Eric Vincent '88 outlined the details of the Poverty in America project. Vincent said the Council will try to draw students to help the needy in the Berkshire area, particularly the towns of Adams and North Adams. The Western Massachusetts Labor Action, a Pittsfield-based union organization representing piecemeal workers and groups not covered by regular unions, will advise the program, Vincent said.

Participants in the project will cut wood for needy residents' fuel and canvas Adams and North Adams residents in impoverished conditions. The canvas will include a drive within Williamstown to raise necessary food and clothing.

Williamstown 'isolated'

Vincent has also tentatively arranged for a lecture by Mitch Snyder, the Washington, D.C. activist for the homeless. Vincent said, "The isolation of Williamstown in the midst of such an economically depressed area is stunning. There is hostility in this area to what residents regard as the wealth of Williamstown. We can show surrounding communities that we do see a responsibility."

Racism in America will be the focus of a third project undertaken by the Council, with speeches to be given on Martin

Mayhem charge dropped, three Adams men charged

by Andrew Mayer

On Dec. 16, the Berkshire County Grand Jury found that there was not enough evidence to indict Michael Duncan '86 on the charge of mayhem. Duncan had been arrested and charged with mayhem, willful removal of a body part, in connection with an incident that took place last Nov. 2 between three Adams men and up to 10 Williams College students.

In addition, on Dec. 31 the three Adams men, Daniel Ziemba, Raymond Lemoine and Richard Pizani, Jr. were each charged with disorderly conduct. Ziemba and Pizani have also been charged with assault and battery. They will be arraigned in Northern Berkshire Trial Court on Jan. 22.

If found guilty of disorderly conduct, each could receive six months in jail or a $200 fine or both. Ziemba and Pizani could receive an additional two and one-half years in prison or a $500 fine if convicted of assault and battery.

Duncan, who was not present at the Grand Jury hearing, said that he was relieved that the whole issue was closed but declined comment on specific questions. He said, "My hands were tied with the whole incident. I wish it had never happened. I wish Ziemba had never come on campus."

No College reaction

Dean of the College Stephen Fix declined to comment on any potential disciplinary action by the College against any of the participants, but said that he would release a statement some time this week.

An eyewitness who declined to be identified, said that at approximately 10:30 on the night of Nov. 2 he encountered two Adams men outside of Carter House. The witness said he was pushed by one of the men and pushed the man back. He said he exchanged words with the man but then returned inside.

According to the witness, Duncan came outside and asked the two Adams men to leave, saying that no one at Carter wanted to fight with them. The two men would not leave and, according to the witness, hit Duncan in the face.

The witness then saw both parties across North Street where arguing and fighting ensued. The witness claimed they only fought and rolled around on the ground for 10 seconds or so before the fight broke up. The witness claimed that six Williams students were involved in the incident, less than the original police estimates of ten.

Grand Jury

Four of the witnesses attended and testified on Duncan's behalf at the Dec. 16 Grand Jury Hearing. According to the eyewitness, the Grand Jury found no evidence to indict Duncan on a charge of mayhem and also refused to indict him on lesser charges proposed by Assistant Berkshire Country District Attorney Dan Ford.

Ford was unavailable for comment and did not return Record phone calls.

Health Center opens on schedule

by Jim Hartnett

These days, the beeping of backhoes and the rumbling of cement mixers can be heard almost anywhere on the Williams campus as major additions to College facilities continue to be built. Despite earlier delays, construction on both the new gym and new galleries of the art muesum is moving along and the new College center for health services, located at the Knolls near the end of Hoxsey Street, is now open.

The new Chandler gymnasium is the largest, most expensive and farthest behind schedule of the projects. Originally scheduled for completion this September, several on-site problems have pushed the completion date back to the spring of 1987, according to Wyn Wassenar, director of the physical plant.

Several problems existed during the construction, including the need to rebuild steam tunnels under the site and to build supporting buttresses for the hockey rink. To purchase a piece of property from the Post Office, the College had to deal with both the federal bureaucracy and the Massachussetts land Courts — a process which, according to Wassenar, "took five times longer than we expected."

Members of the classes of '88 and '89 should be able to use the facility's new pool, basketball courts and weight room, before they graduate, Wassenar said.

Museum in Phase II

The Williams College Museum of Art is now in the second phase of an expansion and renovation project that runs close to the new gym in terms of size and expense. According to Michael Govan, Special Assistant to the Director, the museum, which has been closed since Dec. 30, 1985, is scheduled to re-open in October.

A three-story gallery and a sculpture garden are being added to the east side of the building, and a loading dock, used for installing large works, will be added to the building's west side. When the museum opens next fall, visitors will find the entire interior of the facility totally renovated, Govan said.

The new gallery, designed by architects Charles Moore and Robert Harper, will house both the Prendergast Collection and the College's permanent collection of contemporary art.

Health Center opens

Construction on the new Mary Thompson Center for Health Services proceeded without any major difficulty, according to Director of Health Services James Corkins. Opened at the beginning of Winter Study and officially dedicated on Jan. 11, the new facility replaces Thompson Infirmary. The new one-story building, with its ten in-patient beds, five examining rooms and free counseling service, is almost twice the size of

The War Closer to Home

The northern Berkshire region is not as well off as the Williams enclave of prosperity and plenty might allow us to believe. Much of the region continues to suffer through economic depression, and while the pain of poverty may be alien to most Williams students, the College community cannot remain oblivious to the plight of our neighbors in the "real world."

The College Council has undertaken an initiative to make students more aware of and involved in the lives of the less fortunate in the area. Orchestrated by CC Secretary Eric Vincent '88, the program will organize wood-cuts to provide fuel, canvasses to identify the impoverished and benefit drives to provide food and clothing to the needy. Unlike writing a check to an African famine relief organization, this campaign will enable students to see and feel the positive results of their efforts to alleviate poverty.

Unfortunately, the Council's awareness agenda is overly ambitious. On top of the program on area poverty, CC is also trying to promote involvement in fund-raisers for non-white South African scholarship students and for a hospital in India. These two causes, just like famine relief, are indeed worthy of our attention, but the record of student interest in similiar awareness efforts in the past warns that student commitment and intensity — which are essential to the success of such a social undertaking — will not likely remain high and will probably be overwhelmed by the program's broad and distant scope. The awareness initiatives are unrelated, disjointed and, for students, too much all at the same time.

The anti-poverty campaign in the Berkshires should be the focus of the Council's and the student body's attention because it holds the most potential to yield tangible results right before our eyes.

Limitless Log

Cooperation and mutual respect are integral to promoting good relations between different segments of our community. The repeal of the two-drink limit at the Log last week showed that the new administration is willing to take student input seriously and try to provide for their desires.

Most people recognize that the administration was caught between a rock and hard-place last semester on the Log issue. The new restrictions ensuring that the Log was reissued its license caused students to abandon the once-popular gathering place. Administators claimed that they had to create a system that would allow for efficient enforcement of the law. Students felt that the system was overly paternalistic and insulting. Most controversial was limiting the minority on campus who could legally drink to two drinks per evening.

Students are to be commended for using the proper channels to register their displeasure and making reasonable proposals to improve the situation at the Log. The College Council and Committee on Undergraduate Life discussed ways to encourage more students to use the Log and the opinion pages of the Record contained several pieces by students offering new ideas. In all forums, there was one common point — something has to be changed.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Vice-president William Reed agreed to review the decisions that had been made after a semester had passed, and student committees found them willing to listen. The Log, where the entertainers often outnumbered the patrons first semester, was packed on Saturday night. The smiles of students and Log Manager Mike Cutler, as well Fix's when he walked in and saw the crowd, show that the change is a great step towards making the Log a gathering place once more.

Apres ski: time for thought

by Vernon Squires

100% Natural

When I was a kid, winter snows meant two things: no baseball games and plenty of skiing. At every opportunity, day or night, I used to take to the slopes on a quest for speed and joy.

Thankfully, the sport and its dubious pleasures no longer entice me. When friends start to murmur about Brodie or Stowe, I scamper for the blankets, replacing ski travails—cold, crowds, cash—with pleasant dreams about hot-buttered rum and large fireplaces. Apres ski is still OK.

An incidental problem is equipment: it's been two years since I left my Rossignols at Goff's for a tune-up/summer storage. Last anyone heard, they were hostage for $45.

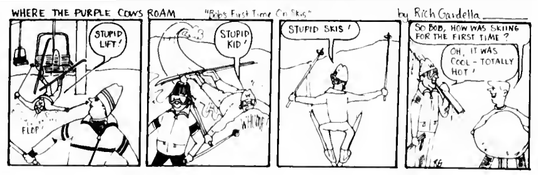
Therefore, this Winter Study I have forsworn the snowy trails, content instead to jog outdoors when it's sunny and cope indoors when its not. Besides, it's amusing to watch the hardier souls who continue to venture up and down icy mountains; bundled up, they look like eskimos playing Pillsbury Doughboy.

With the slopes forsworn, Winter Study occasions a bounty of free time, abnormal for Williams College. There's an occasional class, a carnival of social activity and epic sleep sessions. It's a chance to explore new hobbies, rediscover old ones, or even, if you stop long and hard to think about it, reflect upon first semester. (Pardon the seniors, who, suddenly acquainted with the reality of OCC—they don't give out jobs, only advice—spend much of January dreaming up accomplishments for a resume.)

But back to the tale. I doubt Winter Study actually is intended to prolong the lessons of last fall. On the contrary, the carnage wreaked by final exams might easily send dog-eared texts (and GPAs) to the graveyard. December's agonies are not so distant.

Nonetheless, lately I have found the hours to loose a wondering mind on the mysteries of academia. In topical lingo, the intellectual skis are tackling virgin snows and unsettling pitches, slaloming the poles of erudition set during autumn.

For instance, last September I wandered into a physics course, searching for knowledge of the universe and Division III. Now, as the smoke finally clears, I get the idea that the stuff of life isn't all it seems. Much that happens in our workaday world escapes detection, and even if detected it all changes anyhow. Einstein proved this. Physics.



Elsewhere on the liberal arts map, during the fall I oozied up to Aristotle and Plato in a political philosophy class. Heavy thinkers, these Greeks. But they give pause as surely as Einstein by wrangling about real worlds and apparent ones, about action and contemplation, and about the exigencies of morality and justice. Not exactly kid stuff. The course still nags me.

I cannot be alone. Given students' intellects, professors' expectations and the outrageous academic workload, we all must feel the beckon of recent studies—sort of like chewing gum stuck in your hair or an apple skin lodged in your front teeth.

Think back. Was there a poem that gave birth to a smile or tear? Or a computer program that finally worked after four all-nighters and three bags of Cheetos? Or a term paper that clicked with insight and originality, reaching an unexpected but delightful conclusion?

Maybe, in the end, reflection doesn't mean much. But maybe it does. Maybe it turns out that education is what you take with you, like a packrat, in the attic of your mind, and not what was on the sterile computer printout that last Wednesday polluted our S.U. boxes.

It's just a thought. After all, that's what Winter Study is all about.

Do varsity letters represent only financial distinctions?

by James P. Conlan

At the end of the 1985 Commencement ceremony, Mike Uretsky '85 presented then-President John Chandler with the first of the newly reinstated Varsity letters, which would be distributed to all graduating varsity athletes. Three members of the Class of 1985, who wore running gear under their graduation gowns in preparation for a race that afternoon against the varsity crews of Cornell and Syracuse, were not presented with this official congratulations from the college because crew is not a "varsity" sport at Williams, a financial rather than an athletic distinction. I question the value of the varsity letter under this system of distribution.

There is no athletic distinction between varsity sports and many club teams. If judged by solely athletic standards, several club teams are of the same, if not higher, quality than some varsity squads. These club teams have coaches, are regulated by NESCAC, represent Williams in athletic contests against the varsity teams of other colleges, compete in New England and National championships, and carn for Williams a high level of respect as a result of their athletic performance. Like varsity athletes, these club athletes take the time to train in preparation for their seasons, compete at a high level of intensity, and have earned among their peers on campus a reputation for athletic commitment and achievement. The only difference between the designations "club" and "varsity" that is clear is: varsity teams are funded by the athletic department exclusively, and club teams are not.

While some club teams recognize that they are athletically qualified to receive varsity status and funding, the athletes on these teams also recognize the economic considerations which affect the athletic department's decisions in this area. But these athletes also resent the implication of the present system of letter distribution that their athletic accomplishment and representation of Williams is not worthy of acknowledgement. The denial of the letter to club athletes as a rule, if not intended as an insult to many accomplished and dedicated athletes who have met high athletic standards in order to compete for Williams, then is a perversion of the value of the varsity letter as a symbol of recognition for athletic achievement. The letter applauds not the Williams College scholar-athlete, as it pretends to, but the athletic departments's own budget. Until the present system of distribution is rectified, the varsity letter can only offer its recipients the empty congratulations that they have invested their time at Williams wisely on a financially sound sport.

Rhodes scholar

Beth Ebel '86 has received a Rhodes Scholarship for two years of study at Oxford University. A double major in physics and biochemistry, Ebel plans to study physics and philosophy during her time in England, after which she may attend graduate school for further work in physics. The scholarship is considered the most prestigious postgraduate fellowship in the country. Ebel said, "I've always been interested in how the two subject areas (physics and philosophy) are interrelated. I enjoy both as they seem to explain the fundamental nature of reality in different manners."

While at Williams, Ebel served as a J.A., captained the women's ice hockey team, played varsity soecer for two years, was a member of the Jazz Band and was involved in service and tutoring programs.

Ebel said, "You can't help but be surprised (about receiving a Rhodes). During all of the interviews and everything, all of the other applicants have to do so much. They all seem so good."

She said that she received positive support from the deans and administration, but explained that Williams is different from many other schools, which hold preparation sessions for applicants. She said that Williams does not conduct a preliminary screening of applicants as many other schools do. "Williams feels that it has a lot of students who would make good applicants. That way anyone who wants to apply is able to," Ebel said.

Fellowships Internships

The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships has announced the names of the four seniors to receive fellowships for two years of study at Oxford or Cambridge Universities. The committee considered thirty-five applicants, choosing four recipients and four alternates.

Seniors Katherine Elliot, Bruce Smith and Thomas Lydon were granted Herchei Smith fellowships to study at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Senior Margaret Wildrick received a Carroll Wilson fellowship to study at Worcester College, Oxford.

The alternates for both categories include first alternate, Beth Ebel; second alternate, David Deakin; third alternate, Donald Hovey; and fourth alternate, Ian Eagelson.

The Mead Fund Committee has selected the following students to participate in the 1986 Summer Intern Program in Government: Andrew Erdmann '88, Cheryl Hall '87, Sarah Lawton '87, Kenneth Mareus '88, Richard Orluk '87, Cliff Peale '87, Eric Vincent '88 and Raymond Yau '88.

President denounced

Dartmouth College President David McLaughlin has come under attack in a report issued Tuesday by the Dartmouth faculty's Ad Hoc Governance Committee. The report cited a "serious lack of confidenee" in the president and stated that his leadership led to a "sense of recurrent crisis" at the Ivy League school, as reported this week by the Boston Globe and the New York Times.

In his own defense, McLaughlin told the Globe that the report "overreaches some of its assertions" and that "there have been some changes made since last April to accomodate the faculty's desire to be more central (in decision-making)." McLaughlin, who left the chairmanship of the Toro lawnmower company to become Dartmouth's president four years ago, is said to have sparked the dispute by reinstating a ROTC program at the school last spring, over the faculty's objections.

The report also accused the school's administration of "insensitiv(ity) to ...educational concerns and ramifieations of its decisions," and expressed a "serious lack of confidence" in the president. The report follows a 26-1 vote of no confidence in the president's ability to make a decision in a conflict involving Dartmouth's Hitchcock Medical Center last fall.

Biology Professor Thomas Roos, a member of the faculty committee, said the report fell short of a "no confidence" vote only because of "a reluctance to use words that are...inflammatory.

Library workshops

During January, librarians at Sawyer Library will lead short workshops aimed at improving students' research skills in using the card catalog. Juniors preparing thesis proposals are especially encouraged to attend one of these 45-minute sessions, said Faith Fleming, Sawyer librarian.

She said, however, that she urges all students to come and learn more about this library tool. The sessions will take place tomorrow and Jan. 20, at 2:30 p.m. and 7:30 p.m., and Friday at 11:00 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. Students can sign up for the sessions at the reference desk on the second floor of the library, Fleming said.

Mughal joins

Saeed A. Mughal joined the Williams administrative staff as comptroller last month. As comptroller, he is responsible for the daily financial and accounting operations of the College as well as year-end closings, financial reports and liaison with auditors.

"We selected Mr. Mughal from a field of 70 applicants," said Williams College Treasurer and Vice President for Administration William Reed. "He brings a wealth of experience to the comptrollership. He is highly regarded for his accounting expertise and managerial skills," Reed said.

As a member of the Budget Advisory Group at Williams, Mughal will provide research and analysis for the Trustee Committee on Budgeting and Financial Planning.

Mughal, a naturalized U.S. citizen, graduated from the University of Punjab in Pakistan in 1957. He earned an M.B.A. degree in 1961 from Washington State University and in 1968 held a Ford Foundation fellowship at the Harvard Business School. Mughal was formerly director of accounting at the University of Chicago.

South Africa

Trustee defends non-involvement

by Debbie Snyder

A panel discussion on the ethics of college investment in companies doing business in South Africa and the actions of such companies in South Africa attracted an audience of just over 50 students, faculty and loeal residents last Thursday.

Although administration officials attending included College President Francis Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix, student turnout was relatively small. "Is there a Better Way?" was the title of the discussion, in which anti-apartheid activists Tom Williams '87 and Martin White '87 squared off against David Hauck of the Investor Researeh Responsibility Center (IRRC) and Matthew Nimetz '60, a trustee of Williams College.

Williams represented the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC), and White represented the Black Student Union (BSU).

Hauek examined the six areas where he said that American companies could play a role in an evolutionary change in South Africa: workplace reforms, support for black community projects, business lobbying in Pretoria, taxes paid to the South African government, U.S. corporate involvement in strategic projects and sales of strategic goods.

U.S. signatories

He said that almost three-fourths of the American companies in South Africa have signed the Sullivan Prineiples, which are designed to improve working conditions and hiring of blacks. American companies have spent approximately one hundred million dollars supporting community affairs, according to Hauck.

Hauck said, however, that most of this money was spent on programs which ameliorate conditions of apartheid rather than on those which challenge the structure of apartheid.

Hauck said that American businesses contribute slightly less than one-half percent of the South African government's tax revenues, while strategic projects help maintain white minority rule. Support by approximately six American companies through the sale of strategic goods has helped South Africa resist pressure to negotiate, Hauck said.

College not political

Nimetz, speaking next, said that the trustees are very conecrned with the situation in South Africa, beeause of their individual beliefs and because, "It is a major issue on campus, and any issue important to faculty and students is an issue that we take seriously." He said, however, "The College as an institution is not a politieal entity," and therefore should not take political stands.

He noted that the College established the ACSR seven years ago to advise the trustees how to vote. The College will only invest in companies that have signed the Sullivan Principles, Nimetz said.

Williams said that WAAC opposes both political and economic apartheid. He noted that U.S. eorporations provide sixty percent of South Afriea's oil and much of its high technology and that the College has invested approximately twenty million dollars in stock of companies that operate in South Africa. He concluded that the "political demise (in South Africa) will be preceded by economic demise. Therefore, we must contribute to economic demise."

White, the final speaker, began by agreeing with everything that Williams said. He also stated that the "genocide by apartheid" has created a situation in South Africa comparable to the situation in Nazi Germany.

After each panelist had spoken, the floor was opened to questions from the audience and for the panelists to respond to one another's remarks. Williams and White both criticized Nimetz's assertion that the College should not take political stands.

Police recover stolen goods

by Midori Sonoda

Most of the property stolen from Carter House residents on Nov. 9 has been recovered, according to Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito. One of the three Williamstown youths arrested and charged in the ease has been sentenced, and action in the other two cases will continue during the next month.

The three youths were arraigned in Northern Berkshire Trial Court on Nov. 20. Robert Derosier III submitted to the facts and was warranted a finding of guilty. The court ordered him to make restitution and perform 80 hours of community service.

James Donlan pleaded not guilty and his ease will go to trial Feb. 5. Leonard W. Harwood Jr. is scheduled for a conference with his attorney on Jan. 22.

The robberies appear to be an isolated incident, according to Ransom Jenks, director of Williams security. He said there have been no problems with theft on campus since Homecoming weekend.

Recovering the goods

Students are having trouble getting back their stolen property, because only some of the articles recovered by the police can be returned to their owners. "Only part of the case has been disposed of so that only material can be released whieh is no longer needed as evidence," Zoito explained.

Carter House residents have begun reclaiming their possessions. David Bassett '87 said that his watch and calculator have not been found but that his walkman has. However, the walkman cannot be elaimed till after the trial. Karen Philipps '87 said she got her walkman back, but her alarm clock was not located.

Many owners have still not picked up their personal goods. Zoito asked that people who reported stolen items please retrieve them from the police station. He said the best time to pick up the items is after three p.m.

the old infirmary.

The location of the infirmary at the Knolls, near the end of Hoxsey Street has been a point of eontroversy from the perspective of both the townspeople and the students. Residents of Hoxsey Street voiced fears that the infirmary would spoil the neighborhood and disrupt daily life. Students felt that the infirmary's location was too far from the eenter of eampus.

According to Corkins, "Misperceptions of what the infirmary actually does were responsible" for the outcry against it. "When people found out that there weren't going to be any ambulances racing up the street," the controversy stopped. Corkins said that there are more students living within a half-mile radius of the new infirmary than there were from the old building.

College gets Mt. Hope mansion

by Stephen Makowka

A group of Williams alumni, the Purple Mountain Partners, has given part of Mount Hope farm to the College in "an attempt to protect the character of the area," said William Reed, college treasurer and vice president for administration. The title of the land was given to the College on Dec. 30, 1985.

Included in the transaction is the 72-room Elm Tree House, built in 1928 and approximately 30 acres immediately surrounding the house. According to Reed, negotiations for additional parcels, including the house's cow barn, are being conducted. He said he expects to reach agreement about the additional land in the next few months.

As part of the agreement, the Purple Mountain Partners will retain possession of ten one-acre lots with the right to build on them. Reed said these plots are scattered around the property and should not be visible from the main mansion. The remainder of the 850 acres will be given to a state conservation agency, which is forbidden to develop the land. Reed said, "This is a permanent solution to an old problem," that of preserving the land's beauty.

College funds scholarship

by Eli Attie

Williams will join with twenty other New England institutions to participate in a program enabling South African non-whites to attend universities in their homeland. The College will contribute to a fund organized by the New England Board of Higher Education (NEBHE).

The unnamed fund will provide an initial 27 students with $2800 annually to defray room, board and living expenses, with tuition to be absorbed by each university. President Francis Oakley has committed the College to contributing one "Williams Scholarship" for five years, and to matching student and faculty donations in an attempt to establish a second.

The fund's stated purpose is to increase enrollment of blacks and of non-whites in the participating institutions: the Universities of Cape Town, Fort Hare, South Africa, the Witwatersrand, Natal, and Rhodes. Though all six schools are desegregated, black enrollment is small relative to the actual percentage of blacks in South Africa.

Separate from divestment

Oakley said he hopes to separate involvement in the program from the broader issue of divestment and views it as an "ameliorative step." He sees Williams' contribution as consistent with the College's educational functions.

The College Council has agreed to assist Oakley in fund-raising. According to President Anza Mammen '86, approval of the fund was unanimous.

In contrast, the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC), opposes the entire projeet. WAAC spokesman Tom Williams '87 dismisses it as "a blatant attempt to buy off student concerns." While he does not denigrate the value of higher education, Williams said he sees more constructive uses for college funds. He said the program contributes to tokenism because the participating universities are "hardly integrated."

Training needed

Stephen Lewis, chairman of the Advisory Committee of Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR), emphasized that regardless of how one views change in South Africa, "There is going to be a terrific requirement for educated people." He said blacks are not receiving the necded training in predominantly black institutions of South Africa.

Other New England institutions providing scholarships include Dartmouth, Radcliffe, Tufts and Wesleyan. The NEBHE is still actively recruiting support, and details of the program, sueh as the selection of the students and the inception date, are still unclear.

from any state or a Masachussetts Liquor Purchase I.D. Card."

Both a Williams ID and a driver's license are needed to enter the Log and drink, if one is of legal age. The new regulations will be enforced primarily by the management. LaMarre said, "The management is not on the prowl, (but) patrons shouldn't push their luek. Management has all the authority to kick anyone out."

LaMarre warned that the Log will not return to last school year's status. "It isn't going to be like that," he said. He emphasized the positive changes at the new Log. In addition to bottles of beer, he said that a new menu has been developed, and several food items have lower prices.

According to Director of Food Services James Hodgkins, the new Log presents the College with a great opportunity. "I think it will work in the long run," Hodgkins said. "I'm very positive."

Opening-night jitters

Although he said in the beginning things might be a little uncomfortable, "Bartenders will be cutting people off at the bar. It would be suicide not to." He explained that the Log is technically a private club, open only to Williams student, faculty, staff and alumni, though guests of those groups would also be admitted.

He warned that, in the event of underage drinking, both the people involved (buyer and underage consumer) would be reported to the Deans' Office. "It will only take one underage person caught drunk by local authorities (after drinking at the Log) to place the College in a whole lot of trouble," he said.

Luther King Day (Jan. 20th), along with a memorial service in the Thompson Chapel. The slide show "Ameriean Pictures," a presentation on race relations and poverty, will be shown on Jan. 23 as part of this project.

The council's final endeavor is donating funds to the Mure Memorial Hospital, which operates a community health program in Nagpur, India. Mammen will present a slide show about his experiences at the hospital last summer.

Meal to net $1300

The Council voted unanimously for a meatless meal during Winter Study which, according to Mammen, would save $1300, which Food Service would donate to the hospital. Council members reported student support for the meal. Freshman Council Representative Bill Aprill '89 said, "The strongest feeling I got from people was a willingness to have this kind of a meal once a week; they saw the large amounts of money they could raise."

The Council agreed to raise the Student Activities Tax by five dollars, to $78, netting the Council approximately $10,000 more in annual funds. Council Treasurer David Applebaum, however, reported that Dean and Provost approval of this increase was contingent upon acceptance by the Council of the daily supervision and printing of the Daily Advisor, now partially funded by the College.

Applebaum said that the increased Daily Advisor costs would add about $3,000 to Council expenses during the year.

Profile: Deli owner John Maltezos

by Carol Koeppel

"Once Christopher Reeve nailed me to the wall because his name wasn't up there," said John Maltezos, the owner of Pappa Charlie's Deli, as he pointed to the sandwich menu above the counter where Reeve's name is now inscribed along with other notable and not-so-notable celebrities.

In June of 1984 when he was 23 years old, Maltezos bought Pappa Charlie's from Charlie Nikitas. Having previously lived for ten ycars in Boston, Maltezos was attracted to Williamstown because his wife, Debbie, grew up there and had worked for Nikitas. Frustrated by the noise, traffic, and city life of Boston, Maltezos decided to get a loan to buy his own place and move to Williamstown.

Maltezos described the transaction of buying the deli as more of a "giving-buying situation than just buying." "Charlie was getting old, and the work was becoming too hard for him," explained Maltezos. "He wanted to give place to someone with whom he felt very comfortable. He didn't want someone who didn't care as much as he or didn't fit the environment." Maltezos was eager to start his first business in an area where there were a lot of young people in the same age group.

Emmigrating from Greece in 1974, Maltezos came to the United States to attend the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston as a special student where he played the piano. Besides music, Maltezos enjoys cycling: in Greece he raced with the national team. Though his work does not allow much time for training, Maltezos had done some racing in Boston.

Maltezos also enjoys cooking. "My husband is a very good cook," affirmed Mrs. Maltezos, who works in Pappa Charlie's for her husband. "He especially enjoys making dessert and has the patience to do that. When it comes to cooking anything, I'm a terrible cook; he always does the cooking around here. For him to be here is very natural; the ideas come very easily."

Though the deli is perhaps busiest during the academic year, it is also successful throughout the summer. Conferences, tourists, and summer theater participants bring much of the business. Maltezos, however, prefers Williams students as customers over the tourists because the latter tend to create a more hectic and impersonal atmosphere. "During the school year it is like a family," said Mrs. Maltezos, "We get to know so many of the students by their first names. They know what we're doing, and we know what they're doing. It makes the long hours and the business easier when you see familiar faces."

"If it weren't for the Williams students being the biggest percentage of customers," her husband noted, "it would be hard doing anything; not just business-wise, but also because of the bond that forms and the affection they show us. That eliminates a lot of the worries. It is scary sometimes when you work at the top and every problem must come to you."

Reflecting upon his move to Williamstown, Maltezos feels he has changed a lot. "Somehow I realized that everybody has a position in life; everyone has to do a certain thing. No matter what you do or how many times you try to change, there's always something. Sometimes you find it very quickly, sometimes it takes a lot of time. It's hard to see that happen but since we've moved up here, I've seen it happen."

Performers round out concert with emotion

by Laura Clark

On Saturday night in Chapin Hall, the Music Department presented the second concert of its Music in the Round series. The program included works by Dohnanyi, Vincent d'Indy, and Mozart, and was well received by the small audience. In order to create the effect of music in the round, chairs were placed on the stage and members of the audience were invited to sit on the stage as well as in front of it.

The first piece performed was Dohnanyi's Serenade, Opus 10 for violin, viola, and cello, and featured violinist Julius Hegyi (also the music director), Susan St. Amour on viola, and cellist Maxine Neuman. The piece consisted of five movements which ranged from rapid, scurrying melodies to long, plaintive passages. All three musicians played exceptionally well. Particularly notable was St. Amour's viola solo beginning the second movement, Romanza.

Second on the program was Vincent d'Indy's Quartet, Opus Seven, for piano, violin, viola, and cello. Pianist Charlotte Hegyi joined Julius Hegyi, St. Amour, and Neuman in admirably performing the piece. It began in a melancholic, minor tone, but finished with a bright and brilliant Allegro vivo movement. Although this work was arguably the least distinctive of the evening, it still featured a wonderful cello solo by Neuman in the second movement, Andante moderato, and some well-done unison passages by the strings.

The closing work of the concert was Mozart's Quintet-K.581 for clarinet and string quartet. Violinist Janet Rowe and clarinetist Susan Martula rounded out the original trio of Julius Hegyi, St. Amour, and Neuman. The piece opened with an unhurried allegro featuring Martuia, who played with great rich tone and expression. The second movement, Larghetto, again featured the talents of Martula. The highlight of the movement was, however, a lyrical, muted violin solo performed by Hegyi. The mute and Hegyi's considerable skill gave this passage the pleasurable sensation of being played from a great distance. The third movement was a lilting Menuetto. The piece culminated with a strong, sustained Allegretto.

The obvious expertise of all the musicians, combined with the great emotion expressed by each made the performance thoroughly enjoyable.

IN OTHER IVORY TOWERS

Dartmouth

In preparation for their Winter Carnival, members of the Dartmouth Winter Carnival Council helped the Dartmouth Community for Disinvestment relocate the shanties that students have been camped in since September to protest the college's South African investment policy. Approximately 25 students moved three shanties through the snow to make space for construction of the Winter Carnival snow sculpture. The DWCC wanted the sculpture to be built at its traditional location at the center of the green, but the DCD wanted to maintain the shanty-town as a protest. After reaching a compromise, Carnival council member Cam Johnson '86 reported no animosity between the two groups, adding that the agreement avoided "a huge hassle."

Johnson did not forsee any future conflict between carnival events and the presence of the shanties.

Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute

Students at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute have recently criticized WRPI, the student-run campus radio station, because they don't play what most students want to hear.

One student deciared, "It seems they cater to some strange underground which reveis in iistening to music that sounds iike someone scraped it off the engineering room floor."

The policy of the station is "to provide the community with significant alternative programming," but students argue that since they pay for the station, they have the right to decide what should be played.

In the words of another student, "the benefit [of playing more popular music] is a student body that's proud of their radio station."

Bryn Mawr

Wicca, the ancient European religion of witchcraft, lives on at Bryn Mawr College. According to two witches on the Bryn Mawr campus, the sect acknowledges both gods and godesses, so men and women may join. Traditionally, 13 witches, six men and seven women, convene to form a coven. One man serves as high priest, one woman as high priestess. Wendy Standtman '88 believes there is "widespread interest" at the college, but "relatively few practitioners." Both she and fellow witch Anne Marie Schuetz believe this dearth is due to misconceptions about the sect's practices. She stressed that Wicca is not associated with Satanism, concluding that "one of the most important things about this religion is a love for life, feeling part of the life of the planet."

In other Ivory Towers, written by Record reporters Jay Reed and Richard Ward, was compiled from various campus newspapers.

Hoopsters fall 61-56

The women's basketball team lost at Middlebury on Friday night to run their season record to 1-2. They had beaten the same team solidly earlier in the season, but Middlebury had several players back from injury, so this game was a different story.

"We started out really slowly," said junior co-captain Anne Schmutz. Down nine at half, the team came back, but Middlebury dominated the boards all night long and came away with the victory. Freshman Nancy Hedeman led the scoring with 17 points, while sophomore Nicole Melcher connected for nine.

The team is a tremendously young one this year, fielding no seniors along with six freshmen. "We just couldn't get the ball inside," continued Schmutz. "They were outrebounding us, and our shots weren't dropping."

The Ephwomen faced Hamilton yesterday and will face two road games this week: Albany College of Pharmacy on Thursday and Amherst on Saturday.

Chess team competes

During the Christman break, the chess team competed in the Pan-American Intercollegiate Chess Championship. Sixty teams from about 50 different colleges participated in this annual event, held in New Brunswick, NJ. Schools came from as far away as California, Canada and Central America.

Representing Williams were Arthur Xanthos '86, Marc Gutscher '86, Brian Bugbee '89, and Gus Consing '89. Buoyed by Bugbee's fine performance, the team did quite well, winning four matches, losing three and tying one against a strong field of schools. Williams earned a category prize, but more impressive is the fact that Williams had the best finish of all the small colleges.

Williams will also send a team to the U.S. Amateur team tournament next month. And with strong young players like Bugbee and Consing, Williams should be competing for years to come.

Army courts.

Freshman Louis Fisher and sophomore Friend, playing numbers eight and nine, both easily won their matches. Close losses were recorded by Wendell Chestnut '88, at the number four position, and by Dave Applebaum '86, playing number seven.

Williams went down to a powerful Franklin and Marshall squad, ranked third in the nation preseason, by a score of 8-1. Junior Sam Fortenbaugh recorded the team's only win by crushing two time All-American Chris Sparr in three straight games. Applebaum and Fisher each took their opponents to five games. Williams goes into action against MIT and the University of Rochester at 4:00 Saturday at the Lasell Squash Courts.

The Ephs had several chances in the second half, most notably when Walsh hit a jumper from the lane at 10:14 to pull within eight at 61-53. But Hamilton then scored and got the ball back on an inbounds violation. Percz scored two baskets, and the Continentals were assured of their 89-77 win.

had met with resistance from town residents. The major difficulty in the negotiation, Reed said, was the alumni's attempt to obtain permission from the town council to build driveways of a lower grade than permitted on town roads. Assessing the lots for sewage disposal also proved troublesome, Reed said.

The attempt to preserve the area has been the dominant concern of the College, according to Reed. A 1974 study committee concluded that the school has a responsibility "to try to protect the general character of the area, in particular the scenic vistas, the open agricultural land and the low population density."

Squash falls to Dartmouth 7-2

The women's squash team opened their regular season last week by losing to Dartmouth by a 7-2 score. Both teams participated in last month's Can Am tournament, with Dartmouth taking second place and Williams taking sixth.

Only Jeanne Cloppse '88 and Amanda Griggs '86, the numbers one and six seeds, respectively, prevailed over their opponents to win the individual match. Cloppse eked out a 3-2 victory while Griggs dropped her opponent with an easy 3-0 score.

None of the other players stretched their opponents to the full five games. Coach Renzie Lamb was not devastated by the loss, admitting that the matches could only get better.

The team's next match was on Saturday at Middlebury.

Skiiers win Carnival

The women's ski team made Eph history this weekend by winning the Castleton State Carnival, held near Rutland, Vermont. No team, male or female, has ever garnered top honors at an NCAA Division I ski carnival.

Friday's individual efforts included a giant slalom victory for freshman Mari Omland and a second-place finish for Kathy Wolf '88 in the individual nordic race. The women entered the second day's competition with a commanding 17-point lead over runner-up Middlebury.

On Saturday the impressive relay squad of Wolf, captain Beth Schmidt '86, and freshman Kristin Seemann raced to a second-place finish, assuring the college of their first carnival victory. Top scores in the 20-team field included: Williams 295, Middlebury 279, and St. Lawrence 245.5.

This weekend the team travels to the great Northeast in anticipation of further success at the University of New Hampshire Carnival.

Hoopsters lose twice, fall to 4-4

by Cliff Peale

Falling to 4-4 after shooting to a 3-1 start before break, the men's basketball team lost twice this week, a 92-83 loss to Division II Springfield on Saturday preceded by a cold-shooting 89-77 loss to Hamilton (ranked fifth nationally in Division III) on Thursday night.

The two wins came after a second-place finish at the Union Invitational last weekend, as Brandt Johnson '87 and Tim Walsh '86 made the all-tourney team. The tough schedule continues this week as the Ephs face Trinity tonight and Dartmouth on Thursday at home before traveling to Amherst on Saturday to take on the Lord Jeffs.

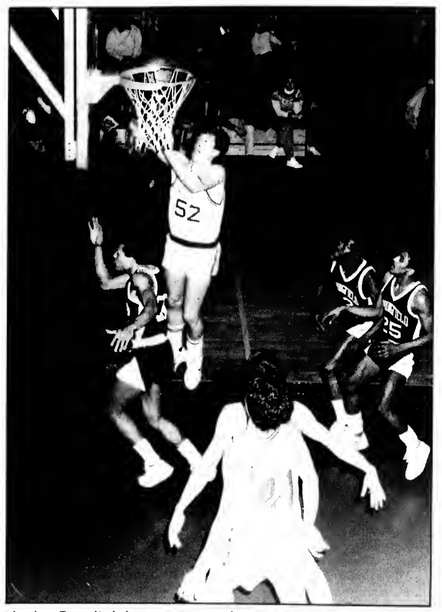
On Saturday, Johnson scored 26 points against Springfield which brought to town 6'5" Ivan Olivares, averaging over 27 points per game. And Olivares hurt the Ephs early, soaring for a layup and a three-point play to give Springfield a 9-0 lead just three minutes into the game.

But seven minutes later, Johnson had scored eight points and Walsh had converted a fast-break layup against the Springfield press to put the Ephmen up 20-19. Playing a cautious 2-3 zone and shooting badly from the outside, the Ephs could not quite hold the lead.

Walsh would shoot one-for-nine in the half, and zone-buster John Ciulla '87 would leave the game after misfiring on three attempts. But the Ephs kept the lead between four and six for the rest of the half behind two 12-footers from Johnson and scrappy play by Bill Melchionni '89 and Mike Meadows '86. With only three seconds left in the half, Meadows drew an Olivares offensive foul and hit two from the line to set a 44-38 halftime deficit.

Olivares started the second half with another three-point play, but Ciulla came alive, hitting two long jumpers to keep the lead at only five. Springfield point guard and crowd favorite Elzy Tubbs then made the Ephs pay for packing the defense inside, hitting four straight jumpers before an Olivares jumper set a 67-53 Springfield lead with 11:10 on the clock and forced an Eph timeout.

Ephs go man-to-man



Walsh came out for a rest and at 8:41, trailing 71-57, coach Harry Sheehy made the decision he did not want to make, putting his team in man-to-man against a much bigger squad. The Ephs came to within eight (with the help of seven consecutive missed Springfield free throws), but Tubbs and Olivares scored to insure that there was no comeback.

"We had a chance in the first half," commented a satisfied Sheehy. "It was a nice game." He also mentioned the crowd support: "It's great to play with the gym full at the beginning of the game."

The loss was received much more amiably by the coach than Thursday night's 89-77 loss to the Continentals of Hamilton. The Ephs shot 12-for-35 in the first half, missing outside jumpers they would normally make. "Offensively, we were a horror show," said Sheehy. "We were just lazy with the ball."

Hamilton shot to a 6-0 lead before the Ephmen scored, and then went out to a 14-8 lead. Rob Stubblebine '88 scored inside to pull the Ephs to within one at 20-19, but Isvaldo Perez, the Continentals' leading scorer, hit for six points to stretch the lead

Squash swats Army 7-2

by Jim Goodwin

The varsity squash team began this season with a 4-1 record at the end of the annual Williams Round Robin Tournament. Matt McCall '87, Rob Hallagan '88, and Pier Friend '88 all took their Navy opponents to five games as Williams lost their first match 9-0.

The Ephs proceeded to win their next four matches with a total game score of 35-1, with scores of 9-0 against Cornell, Vassar, and Hamilton, and 8-1 against Fordham. Williams placed second overall in the tournament, with Navy taking top honors.

This past weekend at West Point, the Ephs came away with a solid 7-2 victory against the Army cadets. Captain Doug Robie '86, playing number one, Sam Fortenbaugh '86 at number two, and McCall at number three all defeated their Cadet opponents by a score of 3-0. Keith Goldfeld '87 and Hallagan, playing numbers five and six, respectively, both won in five games, outlasting their opponents in the unbearably hot

Swimmers sail to win

Both the men's and women's swimming teams trounced Hamilton on Saturday, the women by a score of 96-41, and the men by the count of 71-42. The victories occurred in the home waters of Muir Pool.

The is the Ephwomen's second win of the season. They have only lost once, on November 25 to UConn. Head coach Carl Samuelson was particularly pleased with the performance of All-American Jennifer Raymond '87, who turned in the outstanding times of 11:23.07 in the 1000 free and 5:34.33 in the 500 free. She was also a member of the victorious 400 free relay team.

The Ephwomen faced Mt. Holyoke at home today.

The men's team easily triumphed over the Continentals on Saturday by a 71-42 score. The win avenged a 64-48 loss last year. Senior co-captain Bill Couch, a 1985 All-American, turned in swift times of 2:02.36 in the 200 back and 1:59.04 in the 200 Individual Medley. Freshman diver Bryan Cameron also won plaudits for winning two events.

The Ephmen's next meet is at UMass on Saturday.

Drops to 2-6-1

Hockey falls 5-4 to Holy Cross

by Rick Orluk

The varsity hockey team outshot the Holy Cross Crusaders 46-19 on Saturday night but could not find the back of the net as the Ephs fell 5-4 in Worcester, dropping their record to 2-6-1. Williams was led by the two goals of junior forward Denny Wright.

In earlier action since break, the squad had split two games at the Canisius Tournament. They beat Geneseo 6-4 before falling to Canisius in the title game by a 6-5 score.

Holy Cross opened the scoring at 5:51 of the first period on Saturday to take a 1-0 lead on a goal by Jerry Deleo. Williams evened the score at 12:11 as freshman Will Putnam knocked a slapshot from the right side by Crusader goalie Paul Pisanowski for the Eph score.

The Crusaders scored two goals in the second period, and then Kyle Milotte scored just 25 seconds into the third period to make the score 4-1. It looked as if Holy Cross was going to break the game open, but Williams fought back with three consecutive goals of its own. Freshman Tim Frechette began the Eph comeback with a pretty goal at 8:11. Frechette skated with the puck behind the net and flipped a backhand in past the Crusader goalie.

Ephs tie it up

Wright then scored the next two Eph goals to even the score at 4-all. Each time, at 9:47 and 14:27, Wright knocked a rebound into the net.

The tie did not last long, however, as Holy Cross got the winning goal from Deleo on a breakaway just 21 seconds after the second Wright goal. With less than a minute left in the game, it appeared as if Williams had the tying goal, but the referee declared that the puck had never made it into the Holy Cross net.

Pisanowski played a good game in the Crusader net, turning away 42 Eph shots, while Williams goaltender Mark Morrison '88 stopped 14 Crusader shots. Wright's two goals gave him a team-leading 17 points on the season.

The Ephs next play in Middlebury, Vermont tonight against the Middlebury Panthers.

Women crush Hamilton; men disqualified

by Stewart Verdery

The Williams men's and women's track teams came away from their first meet, a three-team event with Union and Hamilton, with outstanding results. With the women surpassing their nearest rivals by 50 points and the men losing only on a late disqualification, the squads have established a road for success for the remaining six meets.

In the womens' portion of the meet, both Union and Hamilton were far outdistanced by the visiting Ephs. Mel Mahoney '86 starred in the meet, capturing first place in both the high jump and triple jump and second in the hurdles and long jump. Dawn MacCaulay '89 took first in the hurdles and 400 and ran a leg of the mile relay.

Other winners included Caroline Teer '87 in the 800, Becky Conklin '87 in the 1000, and Jennifer Garrett '89 in the 3000. These event winners combined with solid depth in all areas, such as the sweep of the high jump, to totally overwhelm the other two schools. The final tally gave Union 20 points, Hamilton 35 1/2, and Williams a resounding 85 1/2.

Hamilton 'disqualifies' men runners

On the men's side of the competition, held January 10 at Union, a much more balanced meet took place. Eventually the match came down to the final two relay events. Needing to beat Hamilton in both events, the Eph effort fell short when the mile relay team was disqualified after finishing the race first.

Coach Richard Farley noted that the call was "questionable," an interpretation of the rules only, not a flagrant foul. With the loss of these points, even a sterling first place performance by the two-mile relay team was not enough when Hamilton was able to best Union for second in the event. The meet score saw Hamilton at 60 points, Williams at 59, and Union third at 50.

Williams had three individuals claim victories in particular events. John Servin '89 took the 800, Andre Lopez '87 won the 400, and Bob Kaplinsky '86 captured the triple jump. Coach Farley was pleased by the performance of his squad, especially with the contribution of points by several people not expected to place. However, he cautioned that this meet featured some of the weaker teams that will be seen throughout the season, necessitating improved performance to keep up with the tougher competition.

The men's team next sees action on Friday January 17 against Springfield and Albany St. in Williamstown, while the women will travel to Harvard January 19 for the N.E.T.A.C. meet.

Admissions worried by losses in black students

by John Canty

Williams has faced increased difficulty recently in attracting talented black high school students, according to officials in the Admissions Office. As a result, Director of Admissions Philip Smith '55 said the College is promoting a stepped-up outreach program to identify and recruit qualified high school students and to increase Williams' recognition.

While minority enrollment at Williams has grown in the last decade, most notably in the number of Asian-Americans, the number of blacks enrolled at Williams has dropped substantially. In 1979, a total of 40 black students entered Williams out of 109 acceptances from 165 black applicants. This year, only 22 blacks enrolled out of 73 acceptances from 135 applicants.

Smith said this decrease is not peculiar to Williams but part of a national trend. He said there has been a shift back to community and junior colleges and technical schools among black students nationwide.

Assistant Director of Admissions Jo Ann Gray-Murray explained, "In relation to the open-ended liberal arts education offered by Williams, black students have become more career-oriented. We have people now worrying over the most direct course toward goals they have already formed."

Life here the problem

Beyond the national trend, Gray-Murray described the over-riding problem facing efforts to attract black students to Williams as "the answer to the question that the black applicant must ask: What is life like at Williams?"

"You are talking about a rural setting, with no large outside black support group around that you would have in a big city," Gray-Murray said. "It's one thing for the College to seek out minority students. It's another thing, and one more valuable, to make their experiences here positive."

She criticized specifically what she sees as a void in support services. "Academics are not the only part of life. Many black students here have a hard time relating to what can be an intimidating environment," she said.

Smith emphasized that spending reductions in such federal educational programs as Head Start and Upward Bound and a decrease in federal funds for inner-city schools limit the pool of qualified applicants. Smith said, "Looking down the path, what troubles me is the collapse of the inner-city high school, which hits the very students Williams is attempting to recruit."

Increased recruitment

To counter the drop in black applications to Williams, the Admissions Office has intensified recruitment of black applicants. Assistant Director of Admissions Richard Nesbitt said, "The competition for these students is getting pretty tight."

The Admissions Office has extended attempts to identify and attract specific talented black students and increased efforts to publicize Williams as an alternative, he said.

Williams uses the Student Search lists, sold by the Educational Testing Service, to target qualified black students. According to Smith, the Admissions Office sends out 6500 letters a year to black students on the basis of their PSAT scores.

At the same time, however, admissions officers said they are increasingly skeptical of the SAT as an admissions tool, explaining that performance on the SAT has a high correlation to income, making it difficult to use as an indicator of talent.

Between spring and Thanksgiving, admissions officers travel to selected high schools and communities across the Six out of ten granted tenure; Trustees ok 5 men, 1 woman

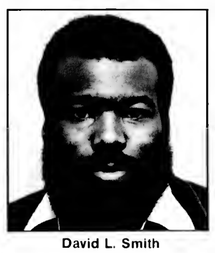
by Harwell Wells

Six Williams professors have received tenure, College Treasurer and Vice President for Administration William Reed announced Saturday. The announcement came after official approval from the Board of Trustees, which met this weekend.

The faculty members' departments recommended candidates for tenure to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions, which submitted its list to the trustees.

Five men and a woman were awarded tenure, two in Division I, three in Division II and one in Division III. Assistant Professors Ilona Bell, English; Michael Brown, Anthropology; Morton Schapiro, Economics; David L. Smith, English; William Wagner, History; and Steven Zottoli, Biology, were awarded the positions. Ten faculty members applied for tenure this fall, with four requests being denied.

Bell is a graduate of Radcliffe and has her doctorate from Boston College. Her main field of interest is John Donne and early Renaissance love poetry.



Brown, a graduate of Princeton and Michigan Universities, becomes Williams' first tenured anthropology professor. His specialty is the Agaruna Indians of northern Peru. He has written two books on this subject, and his studies range from the Agaruna suicide rate to their dreams.

Schapiro, a graduate of Hofstra and the University of Pennsylvania, is currently away from the College on a year's leave. He is a specialist in economic demographics and population change and is working on a book, The Filling Up of America, about American population growth in the 19th century.

Smith is a graduate of the New College of the University of South Florida and the University of Chicago. Chairman of the Afro-American studies program, he has a special interest in American and Afro-American Literature. He is working on a book about race in American literature.

Wagner, a graduate of Haverford, earned his doctorate from Oxford. A Russian specialist, Wagner will serve as chairman of the Russian, Soviet and East European affairs program this spring. Wagner said he was pleased with the decision but that it was not unexpected and somewhat anticlimactic because the CAP made its recommendations in mid-December. He said he was pleased with the decision as both a sign of professional respect and as "a relief, considering the state of the job market."

Zottoli, a graduate of Bowdoin and the University of Massachusetts, is a neurobiologist. He described his major interests as the regeneration of nervous tissue, particularly how growth can be encouraged in damaged cells.

Board talks with WAAC and BSU reps

by Andrew Mayer

Members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition, the Black Student Union and the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility met with Williams College trustees last weekend, telling them that the College's failure to divest its South African holdings has allowed racism to continue on campus.

Martin White '87, representing the WBSU, said that by not divesting, the College allows racist anti-divestment rhetoric to continue. He cautioned, "I don't think divestment will change racial tension, but it makes it less easy to argue these racist arguments." He said, "We will continue educating people on racism in America."

Thomas Williams '87, representing WAAC, said, "The trustees were interested in listening to the students. I think we got a better understanding of their position." He said he thought the trustees felt they were doing their duty in meeting with the students and felt satisfied simply doing so.

Williams said the meeting brought out the chief WAAC disagreement with the trustees. "They don't like to see the endowment used for what they see as political means. I see South Africa as an exceptional issue," he said.

'Consciousness raising'

Williams College President Francis Oakley called racial tension a "periodic sort of issue both in American society and here at Williams." He continued, "As an institution, we should do some consciousness raising on campus."

Williams College Treasurer and Vice President for Administration William Reed said the meeting prompted forthright discussion. He said the trustees are monitoring the situation in South Africa, citing their recent decision not to invest in any company that has not signed the Sullivan Principles, which regulate the practices of companies operating in South Africa.

The full Board of Trustees met Saturday to listen to committee reports and approve tenure decisions. Oakley described the gathering as routine and said he found it very productive. He said, "What we like to do is get the trustees together to provide them with a lot of information and

Major program needs reform, declares CEP

by Tom Ewing

The Committee on Educational Policy has begun an extensive review of the major requirement and its implications for the Williams' liberal arts curriculum.

The major is an essential component of the Williams' liberal arts education, according to members of the CEP. Through a Williams education, students are expected to develop heightened curiosity about their environment, cultural awareness and an ability to think for and express themselves. The goals of the major are similar to these and are essential to its fulfillment, according to the CEP.

The CEP discussion centered on the idea of the major. Professor of Physics Ballard Pierce questioned whether the major was preparing students for graduate study in the major field. To correct this, Pierce suggested the creation of a two-track major, with one track aimed at regular majors and the other track for students planning to go onto graduate school.

The four big majors

CEP Chairman Thomas Jorling pointed out to the committee that 63 percent of all students major in history, economics, political science or English. As a result, he said,

King's Day, a time for self-scrutiny

As we recognize Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday, we are noting that his cause, civil rights, has finally been accepted as a mainstream national ideal. His national holiday symbolizes the fact that America no longer questions and resists the values he fought for but rather champions them.

This forward movement of American thought that we are celebrating now is in marked contrast to the declining popularity of Williams among black high school students. Williams has come a long way, to be sure, but recently black applications and enrollment have fallen.

The first step to reversing this turnaround is to locate the conditions which have created it. There is little we can do about external factors such as the increasing number of black students who enter vocational and career-oriented institutions straight out of high school. While this trend affects all liberal arts schools, many — like Wesleyan and Amherst — have suffered less than Williams. However, the drop in applications relative to our Little Three rivals shows that part of the problem lies here at Williams.

In the spirit of the commemoration of Dr. King's birthday, it behooves us to discover and discuss the reasons that make Williams less competitive. What is it about the environment, the recruiting methods of the Admissions Office and or the academic opportunities that makes Williams less attractive in the eyes of black high school students?

Is the Prez a bear at heart?

Chicagoans like myself are filled these days with much glee and hope, thanks to some hometown creatures named Fridge, Sweetness, Mongo and Danimal.

New Englanders, too, trot around in a highfalutin manner, applauding the exploits of guys like Eason, James and Irving (the knife) Fryar.

On Sunday, of course, the latter crowd will fall sober while watching their boys pawed in the Super Bowl by the mighty Chicago Bears, that collection of misfits whose vocabulary stops just short of the word "lose." Lest anyone scoff at this prediction, an open invitation is extended to stake Heinekens on the game's result.

Speaking of betting, I'd wager that it's only a small crowd that knows President Oakley owns a Bears Hat. So does Mrs. Oakley. They go skiing in them.

You might wonder why Mr. Oakley, who is a Brit by birth and an Eph by trade, sports the blue and orange Bear colors. Although the hats look dapper and warm, Brodie is hardly Bear country, and Patriots fans wielding ski poles might take offense.

"I have a lot of hats," explained the Prez, wary that someone might mistake his sympathies. This one, as all Chicago-Ephs know, was a gift from the Chicago Area Alumni Association. It was presented to Oakley on Dec. 18, before wearing Bear hats became fashionable.

"I love Chicago," added Oakley, referring to the city, not the Bears. "Each time I go there it's a lot of fun."

Fun or not, the city Sunday will send its illustrious crew against the Patriots. Not since the U.S. Hockey Team of 1980 has a sports team so captured the nation's fancy. It helps that they're good. They also have McMahon and Payton and William Perry, a k a the Fridge. Oakley took a neutral stance regarding Perry, the 308 pound rookie dynamo.

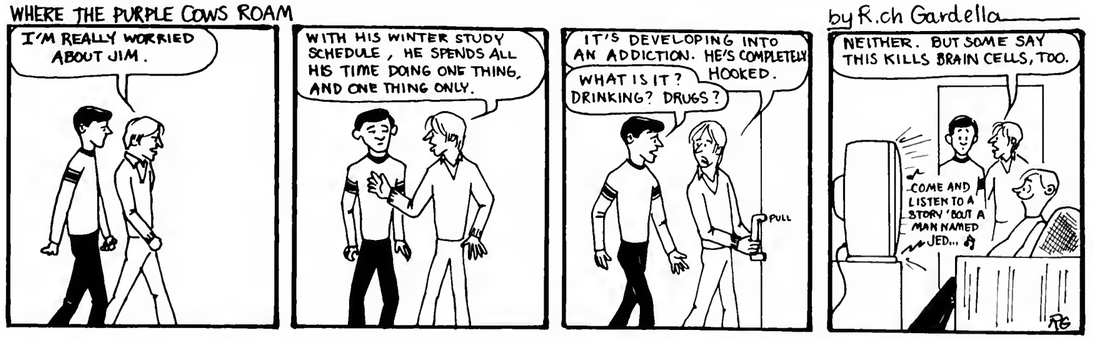
"Sure, I've heard of the Fridge," Oakley said. "But I wouldn't want to meet him." (Note, however, that you don't see any Grogan or Hannah House on the Williams Campus. Let's have a Fridge Party Friday night at Perry — after all, it takes a lot of beer to stock a fridge.)

Oakley is pretty tough, though, and when your curious reporter asked him whom he wanted to win the game, the President punted. "No comment — I've got to be diplomatic, you know."

Diplomacy be damned. True Bear fans let their colors be known, whether on a barstool, at Soldier Field or on the ski slopes.

But President Oakley put on a new hat — Pollyannish in texture — when asked to predict the Super Bowl outcome.

"The Patriots will win, of course," said Mr. Oakley



Say what? Hopefully the Trustees won't wager the endowment on such a prediction. In all fairness, however, President Oakley's answer can be explained.

"I don't really understand the game too well," he said. "I go to watch Williams sometimes." Terrific. Go Patriots.

As for next Sunday, Oakley admitted he'll watch the game. He even enjoyed a couple of earlier playoff contests. But as a man of letters and scholarship, he put the Super Bowl in its proper perspective.

"It's certainly not as important as Williams-Amherst. There's a real game

WHERE THE PURPLE COWS ROAM

'Pro life' is anti-choice

by Nina Yanuzzi

Thirteen years ago, in one of the most controversial and provocative Supreme Court decisions to date, a 7-2 majority declared: "The personal right of privacy includes the abortion decision."

I was eight years old when the Supreme Court decision in Roe vs. Wade was announced on January 22, 1973.

Later, when I first understood what the word "abortion" meant, I naturally assumed that what was now legal and available to women faced with an unwanted pregnancy had always been legal.

In American History class, I studied the landmark decisions of the Supreme Court. I learned that the right articulated in Roe vs. Wade — to choose between continuing and terminating a pregnancy — had been but recently recognized.

As Chairman of the Governing Council of Horace Mann High School in New York City in my senior year, I was approached by someone interested in debating abortion rights. The anti-abortion activist who arrived at the forum I organized handed out pamphlets replete with requisite images of discarded and mangled still born infants. She spoke of "baby-killing" and of the need to stop women from having abortions.

None of the students in the Governing Council were convinced by this woman's rhetoric. Seventh graders to twelfth graders stood up and asked questions. They fought valiantly to convince her that, although she called herself "Pro-life," she was, in reality, anti-choice. Most of the students were too young to have ever faced an unwanted pregnancy themselves; yet, they recognized that the right to choose was essential to reproductive freedom.

I realized that day that everyone did not share my natural assumption that women should possess reproductive freedom in the right to choose.

In recent years, anti-abortion forces have had some success in restricting the scope of Roe vs. Wade. The Supreme Court refused to hold that the government may be compelled to fund abortions for women who receive public assistance. (Funding is, of course, available for the medical costs of maintaining a pregnanacy for women on Medicaid.) Thus, in many states, wealthy women can pay for medically safe abortions while poor women are forced to either bear unwanted children or sacrifice their food and housing allowances to pay for abortions.

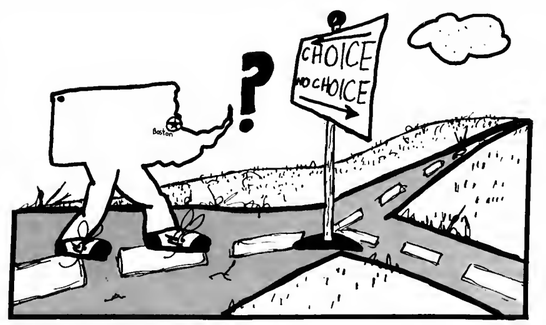
Further, health clinics where abortions are performed have been picketed and bombed. Health workers and their families have received death threats. They are justifiably fearful for their own safety and for the safety of their patients, their spouses, and their children. Moreover, the F.B.I. and Edwin Meese's Judiciary have refused to treat these crimes in a manner reflecting their intensity and frequency, namely, as domestic terrorism.

Most of the students at Williams College have been fortunate enough never to have to exercise their right to choose a safe, legal abortion. Most are not recipients of Medicaid and need not fear the consequences of having to raise the money to pay for a procedure that may not be covered by their state's program.

This fact should not allow women and men who were born in the 1960's and later and, thus, have never lived through the days when abortion was illegal, to drift into complacency. Williams College students and their peers everywhere should not allow themselves to take their right to choose for granted.

The only method of contraception that is one-hundred percent effective is abstinence. (Of course, even abstinence does not protect a woman against a pregnancy caused by rape.) Most Williams College students have probabably attended a Peer Health Entry Talk. Those who have decided to become sexually active are probably aware of the different methods of birth control and their effectiveness rates. But, even if those Williams College students who are having sex used their chosen method of contraception all of the time, exactly according to the instructions (they don't), there would still be a risk that they could become pregnant or get their partner pregnant.

Anyone who is now or will be sexually active while not prepared to have children must consider the importance of defending the right to choose. The right to choose encompasses the right to decide to maintain a healthy pregnancy and receive adequate pre-natal care, to give birth to a healthy child with a minimum of health risk for the mother. This right includes the right to terminate pregnancies that result from rape or incest. All men and women must consider how they would respond to a pregnancy in which the fetus has serious chromosonal abnormalities. Finally, every one of us must consider how highly we value the right to make personal decisions about when and whether to have children.



The time to consider these questions is now, before the rights articulated in Roe vs. Wade are politically or judicially reversed.

In June of 1984, the Massachusetts legislature passed an anti-choice amendment to the state constitution. In order for the amendment to become law, it must be passed again and endorsed by the voters this fall. By enabling the legislature to stop Medicaid benefits for abortions within the state, to prohibit private insurers from covering abortion and to restrict medical facilities from denying them tax-exempt bonding, certificates of need and charitable contributions, this amendment would directly write out of the state constitution everyone's right to exercise reproductive freedom.

If federal protections for abortions are removed, this amendment could empower the legislature to ban abortion in the state entirely.

The right to choose when and whether to have children is one that affects each and every one of us now and for the rest of our lives. While it is recognized that, for many people, abortion is not an option as a solution to an unwanted pregnancy either for religious or other reasons, all of us must fight for the right to make a choice. By supporting the Pro-Choice movement, one simply affirms the Supreme Court doctrine that the right to privacy embraces the abortion decision. All of us hope we will never be faced with an unwanted pregnancy; however, we must recognize that this possibility does exist and vigorously defend our right to choose.

The tiger and its persecutor

by P.M. Mammem

"The government of man by man is servitude,"
So says the wise old Proudhon.
Now Kropotkin asks:
"What does this Monstrous Engine serve for,
That we call State?"
Tucker says:
This State is an invader
It embodies the principle of invasion.
Not only that, Stirner adds,
"Every state is a tyranny."
Now Bakunin begins to meditate
He reflects on:
The negation of man's original bestiality
And the evolution of his future humanity.
But there is his Russian brother
Tolstoy by name,
Who loves his God and Man:
To him, Love should be the highest Law
In every stateless State.
Now comes the adage of Proudhon:
Do to others
What you would have done to you,
Do not to others
What you would not have done to you.
So much on State and Law
From the wise old men of the past.
Now we talk of divestiture
To punish the wicked White
In whose slippery palm
Rest the reins of tyranny.
The Black Man calls for Reason
For his Right has become a delusion
Bestowed by an invisible Ghost.
What shall we do
We, the passive pedestrians on the road?
Are we against the servitude
Of man by man?
Yes, we are.
Are we against the invasion
Of Black Man's Rights?
Yes, we are.
But the White Man says:
"I am riding on a tiger's back.
If I stop, when I stop
The beast will show its bestiality
As I show mine when I ride.
I will be in servitude then,
When the tiger's State will strike
Its monstrous Engine
To take revenge."
Now, what shall we say
To the tiger and its rider
We, the passive pedestrians on the road
When the name of the State is Self-preservation?
We say:
"Evolution toward Humanity!
In God we trust
Let us learn to Love
Let us invest in Love.
Love will give the Law
To the tiger and its rider."
Now the rider laughs
And the tiger roars,
As we pass pensively on the road.

Rock Alike to raise funds for MS

by Laura Greene

When my friend asked me to write an article about the activities of Students Against Multiple Sclerosis (SAMS), I spent a lot of time wondering how I could appeal to the altruism of an entire campus. There's always the dramatic effect, right? "Did you know that every week nearly 200 cases of multiple sclerosis, a crippling disease of the central nervous system, are diagnosed? One of them could be YOU...." Or I could dig up a few horror stories. I'm sure they're easy enough to find — about some promising young athelete or musician who is suddenly attacked by recurring bouts of weakness, loss of coordination, and paralysis. But I finally decided that I don't much believe in appealing to someone's fear or pity to gain his involvement. I think giving should be motivated by a positive sense of responsibility. I can't even say that I know anyone who has multiple sclerosis. But I do know that it's a disease of young adults; almost all cases of MS are first diagnosed between the ages of 18 and 35. I am 20 years old. Most every student on this campus falls into the 18 to 35 age bracket. It is my belief that because we are a part of this group, we have a responsibility to each other. Not just because I might get MS or you might or your best friend might. Rather, we are involved because we believe in ourselves and our youth and the people behind the horror stories. Because we can use our bodies in positive ways to help out our own generation.

Michael Clinchot '87, president of the Lehman Service Council and chairman of the Williams Chapter of SAMS, is in charge of a program which will allow Williams students to use their creativity, talent and sense of humor in order to fight multiple sclerosis. During the next six weeks, students will be invited to participate in a lip synching/Rock Alike contest sponsored by SAMS and MTV. Our efforts will be joined by 150 other colleges nationwide. This is how it works: A house team organization finds a student to sponsor as a contestant, who will dress up as his or her favorite rock star and lip syneh the words to one of the rock star's songs. The organization sponsoring each contestant tries to help its contestant win by earning votes through fund raising. Each dollar raised counts as one vote for that contestant.

There are two ways to raise this money. The first way depends upon the organization's own ingenuity, such as collecting money at sports events or throwing a party and donating the proceeds to a contestant. The second way depends upon the contestant's talent. Students will be able to vote for their favorite contestants at two parties sponsored by SAMS. The first one, held on February 8 in Mission Park, will introduce the contestants in their costumes. No lip synching will take place. The second party, held on March 1, again at Mission Park, will be the actual lip synching contest. Each student attending these parties will receive one vote for every dollar he spends at the party. He can use the votes to back his favorite contestant. By the end of the party on March 1, the contestant who has the most votes, both from party votes and fundraising efforts, is declared the winner and will travel to the New England regional competition. The winner of each of the eight regional competitions across the country will have a video made of their act. These videos will be shown on MTV. Viewers voting on these videos will decide the final winner, who will receive a summer internship at MTV. Viewers voting on these videos will decide the final winner, who will receive a summer internship at MTV. Furthermore, the college raising the most money will receive a free concert at their school sponsored by MTV.

Organizations must register their contestants on January 25 or 27, but contestants who register on the 25th receive 50 extra votes. There is a registration fee of $25, which will count as the first 25 votes for that student. Michael Clinchot, Sue Bratton '86, Sue Klein '86, Leslie Fernandes '87, Pat O'Malley '87, Karen Sudbay '87, and Anne O'Keefe '88 have all put a lot of time and enthusiasm into making this project a success. With a little effort and a lot of fun, we can help.

Hildebrand discusses King and the Williams black community

The following is an interview conducted by Op-Ed Editor Tom Ewing with Visiting Assistant Professor of History Reginald Hildebrand. Professor Hildebrand specializes in Afro-American history and was interviewed in connection with the observance of the Martin Luther King holiday yesterday.

Q. Do you have any personal memories of Martin Luther King?

A. I have no personal memories of King. I never actually saw him or heard him speak in person. But of course for anybody who was alive during that period, he did have an impact ... particularly for black people, he had a lot of impact on their consciousness, on their self-image, the way they saw themselves and the world. He continues to have that sort of impact.

I suppose the impact he had, the positive impact that he had, on me and my peers, is one of the reasons why I think this holiday is a very useful kind of thing. I suppose it would allow you to recommit, and reaffirm, and revive those recollections of a feeling that you could bring about change, that you're reaffirming a belief in your own self-worth, as an individual and as a member of a race. Also, reaffirming a commitment to some very basic values ... a belief that change could be brought about peacefully within the context of American law and American traditions.

I'm of the generation that was more of the black nationalist and black power persuasion than integrationist. In spite of that, there was never any doubt, even when people began to criticize King and began to feel that non-violence was perhaps inappropriate or somehow not assertive or aggressive enough, that it downplayed whatever was distinct and unique about black culture ... in the heat of that, there was still never any question that he was the dominant figure and the inspiration for the movement during the whole time of his life.

Q. The impression given by the holiday and the way it is celebrated is primarily of the early phase of the civil rights struggle. I have the impression King began to change at the end of his life.

A. He certainly did. There are a couple of things we are celebrating. The first is what is generally known of King, what people are fastening on — King in the early phase of the civil rights movement. I think that is because people feel most comfortable with that phase, as the phase that is the least controversial. No one is going to take issue with the fact that segregation had to be removed, that it was a moral embarrassment. Even though that is perhaps the least controversial, perhaps for this day the least challenging part of his legacy, I don't think this should be underplayed ... it still represents a dramatic and an important change and it is worth taking some time to remember and commemorate what went on in those times. People not only marched, but were imprisoned, beaten and killed for these very basic kinds of freedoms. I mean, when you read the kinds of things he was promoting in Montgomery with the bus boycott, it just seems very peculiar that there even could be a discussion about these kinds of things. What he was asking for in Montgomery wasn't even seating on a first come, first serve basis, but black seating from the back and white seating from the front, but with blacks not having to get up when whites came in or when their section was filled ... These were very basic, almost timid kinds of things, but dramatic changes.

In the latter part of the movement ... he was beginning to see economic problems as putting limits on peoples' aspirations and making war on human dignity to the same degree and in the same kinds of ways segregation did. These things are much more controversial, much more challenging, much more likely to rock the boat even today, and for that reason my generation may find these things more exciting

The problem that he was trying to deal with at the time of his death is one we are still struggling with: the growing black underclass in the urban cities trapped by economic conditions, which has sort of missed out on all of the benefits that came from the civil rights movement. (This) is an issue that we're still dealing with. The phase (of the civil rights movement) that's still alive is one that people ... would rather do the "I Have a Dream" speech again ... It's much more comfortable.

Q. Bringing it a little closer home, what do you think about the student activism here, for instance on South Africa?

A. Well, what I can say as someone who is relatively new to the campus ... I have been encouraged, and pleasantly surprised, by the activities and commitment of students at Williams with regard to South Africa ... This campus, because of the makeup of the background of a good number of its students, who appear to come from comfortable backgrounds, and because this is the sort of a community to itself, which is good and bad ... this place could very easily, I suppose, turn into sort of a training ground for young yuppies, that kind of thing, with no sort of social consciousness at all. So I'm pleased that is not the case, at least on the surface ... One of the strengths of a liberal arts school, apparently especially of this one, is this sort of commitment to some sort of social vision, some sort of commitment to understanding the human condition and bettering it. That apparently is part of the atmosphere ... at least on the surface, and that's good.

There seems to be an on going concern that I have, and I've talked to other people about, and it seems to be one they share. I'm sure that the school makes an effort to broaden the background of each incoming class, but as you walk across campus, there is — homogenity would be too strong of a word — it does appear that people do look alike and wear the same kinds of clothes and are involved in the same things. There is a sameness here that I'm a little concerned, not disturbed, but concerned about.

Q. Do you think people are seeking this environment, that if they pay $14,000, they can have this for four years?

A. I guess so. Sure. Which isn't a criticism. That's an observation. People have sought this out and they enjoy it. There's nothing wrong with that. I find people here, both faculty and students, appear to have their lives in balance, have things in perspective to a greater degree than they do elsewhere ... It's a very family oriented place. It's difficult sometimes ... to have contact beyond the Williams community. If you were to see this as a representation of what the rest of the world is like, that wouldn't be all that helpful or healthy, but there is a great deal of value here and I don't at all see anything wrong with enjoying it while you are here.

Q. When the Anti-Apartheid Coalition and the Black Student Union sat in at the Admissions Office, one of the things they were protesting was a lack of support systems for minority students. Do you see that as a problem?

A. It is clearly a problem, not only for students, but for black faculty members. I don't know what the solution is, other than to have a larger black community and going alongside with that more diversity and more niches in which a person could fit comfortably ... This is not a black environment. I'm not sure that it makes it unattractive, but it does make it different. If you are applying for somewhere to go to school or to teach, and the top items on your agenda are political activism or involvement in black cultural activities, than you won't come here. I think that goes with the territory. But if there are problems beyond that, in terms of not only the environment as a given being something with which blacks could not readily identify, if there is something beyond that in terms of hostility or something that is unattractive as opposed to being just different - and I have heard some indications to that effect from some black students - I am not in a position to comment about that.

Q. Another reason for the unattractiveness may be the housing situation, and the sense that certain areas are considered to be less desirable than others because of student stereotypes. Do you have that kind of an impression?

A. On a campus that not only tolerated but celebrated diversity and saw that as one of the values of a liberal arts experience, people would probably seek out having housemates who were quite different from themselves, and try to find something different than the kinds of people they have gone to high school or prep school with. If that is seen as a negative here, ... that people not only don't want to be different themselves, but don't want to associate with people who appear to be different or are not of the mold of a Williams student — whatever that is — that's a real cause for concern, that's almost anti-intellectual. Now, that larger issue speaks to some of the concerns expressed by black students that if blacks are deemed as outside and on the margin of whatever the mainstream defines as the Williams community or what a Williams student ought to be, than you are in a very difficult situation.

Software Developers Come Forth!

Williams College is seeking skilled, student software developers to assist with the development of selected administrative software packages. One or two selected students may be given the opportunity to become involved in "real world" projects, gain valuable experience, and receive recommendations for future study or employment. Various possibilites of employment are possible including WSPs, summer projects, and /or part time employment.

Newton gravitates to new apex

by Eric Hanson

"All of our definitions of musical genres are rapidly becoming meaningless, thanks to people like James Newton," remarked Professor D.L. Smith in his introductory comments for the widely-acclaimed jazz flutist's solo recital Saturday night in Brooks-Rogers recital hall. Yet what ensued was far from a lament of this phenomenon.

Newton, the 32 year-old who has been voted top flutist in Down Beat's International Critic's Poll every year since 1982, proved in his performance that all such musical categorizations are subordinate to the most important part of music — its emotion. In a 90-minute program that featured both traditional jazz classics and original works, Newton alternately attacked and caressed his notes, keeping the capacity crowd on the edge of its seat throughout the performance.

Beginning with a group of spirituals dedicated to the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., the Los Angeles-based jazz musician established a laid-back, comfortable mood that was maintained throughout much of the concert. In "Going Home," the first of the spirituals, Newton sounded much like a singer, mixing biting, crass blues licks with smooth, flowing passages, all of which were delivered without the restrictions of a set tempo.

Newton jumped from the dirty, rough-edged sound of his blues licks to the sweet, lulling tones of his quicker passages with amazing ease. Just as the audience would begin to get comfortable with his swinging, brassy playing, he would drift into lightning-quick runs and then jump right back into his driving blues licks.

Central combination

This combination seems to be central to Newton's conception of music, as he explained in the April, 1983 issue of Down Beat. "I think there's room in every player for both the very basic guttural real thing for the tradition," he remarked. "and also the ability to really turn around and deal."

Newton certainly did his share of "dealing" Saturday night. He swung into a rendition of "Take The 'A' Train," made famous by Duke Ellington's band, in which he incorporated several different versions of the tune, ranging from a slow ballad to a bouncy swing feel. "I've heard it played a million different ways, and it's all sort of worked," he explained to the audience.

That is the beauty of Newton's playing: if something works, he will use it. "If something touches me and moves me, why not use it?" he justly asked in the Down Beat interview. The result is a repetoire that includes tunes which claim roots everywhere from New Mexico to Japan, compositions whose subject matter ranges from Ethiopian mythology to the Pygmy people. He touched upon several of these regionally-influenced works in his performance.

The most notable of these was a piece entitled "Kamakura," named after the Japanese city in which Newton wrote it. He described the scene that inspired the piece as an area containing a waterfall which overlooks a bamboo forest filled with chirping birds. His uncanny ability to create sounds that one would never expect to hear from a flute allowed him to recreate this scene perfectly.

Newton's ability to mix free-metered, exploratory pieces such as "Kamakura" and his haunting "Susenyos and Werzelya" with straight-ahead jazz classics like Ellington's "Sophisticated Lady" (from his most recent album "African Flower") and the music of Thelonius Monk sets him apart from most of today's top flutists. Newton's amazing rhythmic discipline allows him to perform up-tempo classic jazz tunes without accompaniment, making it sound as if a band were actually there.

Newton shatters so many of the listener's expectations and prejudices regarding jazz flute and, more specifically, the flute itself, that one cannot help but have a dramatically changed view of the instrument after witnessing his performance.

Ski patrol maintains safer slopes

by Midori Sonoda

The Williams Ski Patrol is proof positive that Williams is concerned about the community beyond its own boundaries. A volunteer organization supervised by Coach James Briggs, the Williams Ski Patrol supplements the professional and volunteer patrols at Brodie Mountain and Jiminy Peak. Since Williams patrolers work from three to seven and most Williams students ski from one to four, most of the accidents that the patrolers see involve people outside of the college.

Aside from watching for accidents, the Williams ski patrol keeps skiers in line, applies first aid, takes injured skiers down in toboggans when necessary, and sweeps the trails before they close. At Jiminy, each trail must be skied every two hours.

Each member of the Williams Ski Patrol must patrol twice a week — once at Brodie and once at Jiminy. In addition, since they are also members of the National Ski Patrol, each patroler is required to patrol ten times a year.

The size of the Williams patrol is only limited by the number of qualified skiers. According to Greg Corrodi '86, head of the patrol, there were only about 10-12 patrolers a few years ago when he started. Now, however, there are approximately twenty.

Prior to becoming a ski patroler, the candidate must take advanced first aid, CPR, and on-hill training with toboggans. Finally, they have to pass a number of tests which include skiing ability, toboggan handling, first aid practicals, CPR, and a written exam.

Being on the Williams ski patrol demands a lot of time and effort, thus necessitating a strong degree of motivation. Andrea Stempel '87, who has been a patroler for three years, said that she enjoys skiing with a purpose. Also, "Everything is thought out at Williams, whereas on the ski patrol an accident demands acting instantly — everything is reactive." Corrodi is motivated by a desire to help people who are hurt and also enjoys the skiing. Helen Rozwadowski '87, who has just started patrolling, explained, "I want to provide a service to other skiers and put back something into skiing."

Is it black and white?

by Laura Clark

From January 27 to January 29 at 8 p.m., Cap and Bells will present two one-act plays by Peter Shaffer in the Downstage Theater. The plays are White Liars, directed by Ben Voorhies '88, and Black Comedy, directed by Mark Solan '88.

The cast for White Liars includes Blake Robison '88, Chris Shorb '88, Stephanie Bond '88, and Cam Smith '86. The plot centers around the visit of two young men (portrayed by Robison and Shorb) to a German fortune teller who agrees to a mind-bending game of identity. The fortune teller is played by Bond. Both lighting and set design for this production will be done by Lenore Doxsee '87. Costume design will be done by Kara Klopfenstein '87.

Black Comedy involves a much larger cast, including Libby Miles '86, Michael Baratta '89, Paul McGreal '89, Kate Schiele '89, Jill Shulman '87, Tim Cohan '89, Mark Barr '89, and David Reiss '89. It takes place in the apartment of Brindsley Miller (played by Baratta), a would-be sculptor who is anxious to marry Carol Melkett (played by Miles). Before he can marry her, Miller must charm Carol's "monster father" Colonel Melkett (portrayed by McGreal) into believing that he is a success and worthy of Melkett's daughter. The plot rapidly increases in complexity, and introduces Brindsley's neighbors Harold Gorringe (Cohan) and Miss Furnival (Schiele) , a former girlfriend (Shulman), a deaf millionaire (Barr), and a man who fixes fuses (Reiss). Set design will be done by Olga Bassine '88, light design by Jon Allen '89, and costume design again by Klopfenstein.

The plays were written by Shaffer to be performed together, with White Liars, a more serious production, preceding the humorous Black Comedy.

Tickets will be available at the DownStage box office at 7:00 on each performance night.

Dinner with the family can be fun

by Martin Hildebrand

Jean Anouilh's "Dinner with the Family," has, at first glance, a very unmemorable title. This weekend's DownStage production, directed by Jessie Marshall '87, made the title much more memorable.

The play centers around George Delachaume, played by Wayne Fritsche '89. George, who is married to a rich woman he does not love, has arranged to have dinner with his girlfriend Isabel, played by Laura Richman '89, at a house outside Paris.

George is a master of some forms of deception and a dunce at others. Throughout the first scene, he claims that he is single and no longer has parents. Fritsche's performance made this false claim quite believable until other events unveiled the deception. When the audience does finally understand the truth, it becomes clear that he had hired an actor, Ferdinand Delmonte, played by Russell Werkman '88, and an actress, Emilienne de Montreuse, played by Mary Kipp '89, to be his fictional parents. This attempt is extremely disorganized and the audience can predict that these actors will not successfully portray George's parents.

"Dinner With The Family" cast in their Sunday best. (Somers)

Later, the play again employs a deception of the audience. When George finds himself alone with Isabel, he is uncomfortable. This discomfort, as portrayed by Fritsche, appeared to be due to his impending departure from Isabel; only later does the audience find out that it was actually caused by the wound George received in a battle with his wife.

A farce

The play, a farce, had many humorous moments. For example, Ferdinand, upon learning that he is to play George's

Marshall Scholar

Margaret Wildrick '86 has been awarded a Marshall Scholarship, which funds two or three years of study at a British university. Wildrick said she expects to earn a master's degree or a second bachelor's degree, possibly in comparative literature, although she does not know yet where she will be studying.

At Williams, Wildrick has served on the Admissions Committee, the Committee for Priorities and Resources and the Committee for Educational Policy. She was also vice president of Garfield House and a Purple Key member.

The scholarship, established after World War II to honor Gen. George Marshall, awards 32 scholarships in what Wildrick characterized as a very competitive proeess. "I'm very thrilled and very pleased," she said, adding that the other candidates she had met "just blew me away."

In accepting the Marshall, Wildrick had to turn down the College's own Carroll Wilson Fellowship, awarded to her for two years of study at Oxford. The Wilson Fellowship has gone instead to David Deakin '86.

No H & D hearing

Last Thursday, the Honor and Discipline Committee announced its decision not to convene a diseiplinary hearing against Michael Duncan '86. The decision eomes exactly one month after a Berkshire County Grand Jury cleared Duncan of all criminal charges stemming from a Nov. 2 altercation involving between six and 10 Williams students and three Adams men.

According to Dean of the College Stephen Fix, the committee decided not to convene a hearing primarily because members realized they could not hear as full an account of the incident as the grand jury had.

Fix said the committee members thought it unlikely that testimony could be elicited from the three Adams men involved in the incident. The three men now face criminal charges. Without testimony from these plaintiffs, any hearing by the College "would be significantly less complete and balanced than the grand jury's," Fix said. The committee affirmed the grand jury's decision that Duncan was "guilty of no wrongdoing of any kind."

Fix said he had detected "no negative reaction to the incident" from the surrounding communities. "People were patient and decided to wait for the grand jury to reach a decision before they reacted to the incident," added Fix.

In addition, Fix reaffirmed his position on Williams students and the law. He said, "The College cannot and will not protect anyone from their legal responsibilities."

'Personal Decisions'

Tonight at 7:45 in the Tyler House television room, a film called "Personal Decisions" will be shown to mark the thirteenth anniversary of the Supreme Court decision about abortion in Roe vs. Wade.

In "Personal Decisions," women talk about their experiences when faced with an unwanted pregnancy. The women and their families discuss their situations and the reasons for their choice.

After the screening, a discussion will follow on some of the issues raised by the film and by recent and upcoming political events. This gathering is the first official meeting of a pro-choice group forming on campus.

Churchill tomorrow

James C. Humes '57, a former White House speechwriter, will present a benefit performance of "An Evening with Winston Churchill" tomorrow at 7:30 p.m. at the Clark Art Institute. Proceeds will go the the Greylock A Better Chance program.

Humes uses excerpts from Churchill's Dunkirk and Iron Curtain speeches in his performance, which he has presented at the White House, before members of the British royal family and on public television.

A speechwriter for Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, Humes is the author of 10 books, including "Churchill: Speaker of the Century,' which won a 1981 Athenaeum Literary Award.

Humes is teaching a Winter Study course on public-speaking and speech-making.

Greylock ABC, Inc. is a chapter of the national program, which gives aeademically promising minority high school students the opportunity to attend secondary schools with excellent college preparatory programs. This year there are seven ABC students attending Mount Greylock Regional High School.

Council targets poverty with outreach program

by Meg Thomas

The College Council has launched a winter study program to help the needy people in Berkshire County. Working with the Western Massachussetts Labor Action (WMLA), the Council is undertaking a five-part program to seek out and provide aid to the undocumented poor people of the area.

WMLA's purpose is to assist the growing number of needy people in the Berkshire County area, according to Michael Petteys, managing director of WMLA. WMLA, founded in 1975 by a group of Adams residents, is staffed by volunteers who have had experience working with the poor.

The group helps seasonal and service workers, a large number of whom are unemployed in the winter. After identifying these people, the group tries to integrate them into an association through which they can help each other.

Williams students assist WMLA with its Winter Survival eampaign, in which the Council is sponsoring five events. CC Secretary Eric Vincent '88 and Bethany Spalding '89 are coordinating canvassing drives in which students and a representative from WMLA go door-to-door in targeted low-income areas and inform residents of the emergency services WMLA provides.

Wood cutting

Bill Leininger '86 is organizing a wood-cut in which students go to a local residence and cut wood to be used as emergency fuel for needy families.

A food and clothing drive is being coordinated by Margo Cowan '89 and Nancy Shore '89. In this effort students are going door-to-door in Williamstown to collect food and clothing. In addition, the students are promoting awareness of the problem of local poverty and the efforts to provide aid to the needy.

Many Williamstown residents are able to provide serviees which aid the local poor, Vineent said. The program's organizers hope that, with increased awareness, more people will contribute.

Aid Distribution

The Council's efforts will also include work on the distribution of WMLA benefits and easework on that distribution. Benefits distribution, whieh is coordinated by John Schafer '87 and Christina Sayler '86, consists of collecting emergency supplies and distributing them to targeted families.

Benefits casework, organized by Adam Weiss '89, involves a student worker being called to coordinate emergency relief efforts for a specific family. The caseworker will be provided with a list of services that will be helpful to the particular situation and will provide an element of stability to the individual or family.

Vincent said that so far Williams students have been receptive to the idea and seem eager to help. He said he hopes this program will build awareness among the student body of the problem of poverty in the local community. He also said he hopes the program will build a solid base for sustained action by the College community to deal directly with poverty in the area.

Study says grades, extras crucial

by Anne O'Malley

Williams was part of a recent study by the Educational Testing Service, which showed that high-school class rank and performance on such tests as the SAT remain the best predictors of academic success at college, while factors such as admissions interviews seem to be overrated.

According to Warren Willingham, an ETS research psychologist who wrote a book about the results of the study, "Persistent and successful extracurricular achievement is a particularly good predictor of leadership and significant achievement."

The seven-year study examined the qualifications of 25,000 students who applied to nine colleges in 1979. Half of these students were accepted and 4,814 matriculated in the fall of 1979. In 1982, Willingham and Hunter F. Breland published a study based on the factors leading to these admission decisions.

Most successful

Committees from the colleges identified the most successful of the 3,676 students who were seniors at the institutions in 1983. In determining their success, the schools placed equal emphasis on scholarship, leadership and individual achivement.

Those with strong extracurricular high school records were overrepresented by 20 to 30 percent on this list, even after class rank and test scores were taken into account. Students who put sustained effort into one or two extracurricular activities while in high school were more likely to succeed in areas such as campus leadership and independent accomplishment.

Willingham found that four kinds of personal information are useful in trying to predict which applicants would succeed in college: "productive follow-through" in activities, high school honors, well-written personal statements and strong recommendations from high-school teachers and guidance counselors.

Willingham said that the admissions officers identified the most promising students, but not on the basis of personal interviews. "In several colleges, students who had had outstanding interviews received substantial preference in admissions. Four years later we found no evidence that these students had achieved beyond expectations on any measure of success," he said.

"To my knowledge, there had never been this kind of research before," said Thomas Parker, Associate Director of Admissions at Williams. "There was nothing startling in it for us," he said. "It confirmed what we have been evolving to."

The admissions office has always informally traced the process of matriculating applicants, and, in the past two years, it has developed a sophisticated method of checking up on decisions, Parker said.

Interview less important

Parker said Willliams does not put as much emphasis on personal interviews as some schools do, noting that interviews are not required. "The data we got out of this study very definitely did make some policy decisions," he said. Applicants are no longer given a ranking on the basis of their personal interviews, and the interview card itself is now the last piece of information in the applicant's file, while it used to be placed near the beginning of the file.

Parker explained that Williams does have a rating seale for both personal and academic qualities, but there is definitely more emphasis placed on academic qualifications.

Juniors study abroad in increased numbers

by Debbie Snyder

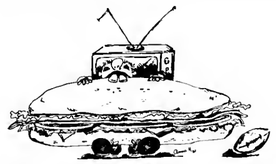
One-hundred eighty-five juniors are studying away from Williams for one or both semesters this year. This figure, eight less than the record high of last year, reflects a growing national trend in studying abroad, according to Assistant Dean of the College Sheila Spear.

Spear said she feels that spending the junior year abroad has become so widely accepted as part of an undergraduate education that it is almost part of the curriculum. She said students do not have to work as hard in the classroom while abroad, but they learn an enormous amount that cannot be learned on campus.

Several sophomores planning to go away next year said that they think living in a different culture would contribute something to their education that could not be acquired at Williams. Theresa Lee '88 said she was planning to spend a semester in Italy "not because Williams is lacking in any way at all," but because she wants "an international experience that can't be simulated here."

Debbie Zalesne '88 said she will probably go to France for a semester next year to learn about another culture and become fluent in French. She said, "I know I'll need to get away, but one year is too long to be away from Williams."

Losses and Gains



Dean of the College Stephen Fix noted that many students tend to view the junior year abroad as "an unalloyed good." He said students must realize there are both academic and social losses as well as gains in being away during the junior year.

As academic losses Fix cited the high eosts involved in leaving eampus right after declaring a major, taking courses for the major in the sophomore year when a student might not be prepared for them, and difficulty establishing a close relationship with a faculty member with whom to write a senior thesis.

Fix said that socially the junior year is "potentially the most exciting and fruitful year." He emphasized that, while spending junior year abroad could be a good experience, students should realize there is a choice.

briefing."

Oakley said the trustees looked into why certain students choose Williams over other schools and vice versa. In addition, they reviewed recent changes in Log policy, including the elimination of the drink limit.

Normal Jan. agenda

Reed said, "It was the normal January agenda, which has to do with estimating a preliminary budget and going over tenure decisions." He said the trustees especially enjoyed their dinners with individual houses and a Thursday evening reception after the lecture "Sex Etiquette 101."

Reed explained that the Building and Grounds Committee, on which he serves, inspected the progress of the new John W. Chandler Gymnasium, which is expected to be finished early next year. They also visited the new Mary Clark Thompson Center for Health Services.

In addition, the trustees discussed creating new classrooms in the sub-basement of the Bronfman Science Center. The new classrooms would have full audio-visual capability and be available to all departments. The trustees considered renovation of Hopkins Hall and asked the administration for a more detailed proposal. According to Reed, a major problem with Hopkins Hall is its lack of handicapped accessibility and sufficient fire-escape routes from the fourth floor. He indicated that, because of the fire-escape difficulty, the fourth-floor classrooms may not be used next year.

Dinner

father, comically overreacted and put on false whiskers to look extremely old. Later,when George requested that Ferdinand and Emilienne come close together, Emilienne moved her couch a few millimeters closer. A third humorous moment occurred when Isabel asked George why he called her "darling." George replied, "We've been living together four minutes."

Unusual circumstances were responsible for some humor. George had created an imaginary friend who shares the same first name and photograph as Jacques Lemoine, a person living with George and portrayed by Paul Knudsen '89. Isabel, expecting the imaginary Jacques for dinner, was not surprised to see the real Jacques arrive. The real Jacques, however, was was quite surprised to hear a strange woman call his name; his reaction is quite funny. Such humorous moments are inherent in the play, but this performance was only sometimes able to take advantage of their full potential.

Emile Graduzac, portrayed well by Fausto Espinosa '89, was hired by George to serve the dinner and did so in a remarkably dignified fashion despite the circumstances. For instance, just after George revealed that he had been shot and may have killed his wife, Emile remains aloof and prepares to serve drinks; he was oblivious to the blood plainly visible on George's shirt. Emile continues with his dignified approach by calmly inviting George, Isabel, and the fictional parents to sit down to "a little dinner with the family" despite the evening's events.

The play is concerned with the happiness of its characters, but sometimes this theme of happiness takes on farcical overtones. After discussing George's lies and learning that George claims to really love her, Isabel said "Well then I'm happy," and George replied "You're right. Let's be happy" ridiculously soon after a difficult conversation.

Overall, the actors performed admirably and the performance was quite enjoyable. The occasional weak points were not critical and did not detract from the generally high quality of the show.

these departments are much larger than other departments.

According to Dean of the Faculty John Reichert, courses within these large departments are consistently overenrolled despite the number of faculty. To increase the number of faculty in the four largest departments, he said, the College would have to draw resources from smaller departments, which often do not have enough majors to justify the minimum three faculty members necessary to constitute a department.

If the curriculum were to be chosen purely on the basis of student demand, said Jorling, these smaller departments would probably cease to exist. The College and the CEP must use criteria other than simply student election in its decision about what to offer as a major, he said.

Jorling suggested that the size of certain departments could be reduced if there were an increase in the number of courses required to fulfill the major. At the present time, all department majors must require nine courses. There are certain departments, Jorling said, that want to require majors to take more than 11 courses, the current upper limit.

Why that major?

During the second CEP meeting, Assistant Professor of German Gail Newman brought up the question of why students choose a particular major. She suggested several factors, including the public relations of certain departments, the desires of individual students for either a large or small major, and even a type of peer pressure - students choosing a certain major because their friends are.

Professor of Economics Richard Sabot suggested that the major be established with the goal of giving each student the ability to converse with faculty members as a peer.

Sabot also proposed the students be required to concentrate more heavily in a particular major, citing his own experiences at Oxford.

Minors

Following up on this point, Reichert suggested that requiring greater specialization from students is incompatible with double-majoring. He described the current process of double-majoring as "only leading to an acquisition of an insufficently deep level of knowledge in two fields, rather than one." As part of an increased requirement for majors, he suggested, the double major be eliminated and replaced with a minor.

This would still allow students to gain official recognition for studies outside the major, but it would also allow for the requirements of the major to be raised, he said.

Newman objected to Reichert's proposal on the grounds that the elimination of double majors would hurt small departments. Often majors in smaller departments are double majors in other departments, said Newman, and smaller departments would lose majors if students were forced to choose just one. Asked how many German majors are double majors, Newman replied "About 99 percent."

As part of its continuing review of the major, the CEP plans to hold a series of meetings with students and faculty to discuss these issues. Jorling said he hopes these meetings will take place before the end of Winter Study.

country. Gray-Murray said, "While we have high schools which have a history of sending good students to Williams, we are continually trying to make linkages to new schools."

Williams devotes special attention to magnet high schools, public high schools drawing talented students from an entire city instead of just one school district and plans to increase ties to these schools in the future, Gray-Murray said.

While admissions officers speak to guidance counselors and groups of students at high schools, they also sponsor Williams evenings in black communities with presentations on life at Williams and talks by black alumni from the area.

High-School Difficulties

At this level, Assistant Director of Admissions Elizabeth Connolly said that the behavior of the individual high schools undermines Williams' drive to gain better recognition. "If you're a guidance counselor with 85 percent of your students aiming for a work or co-op experience after graduation, you've got an extensive set of goals. Having people know of Williamstown may not be one of them."

The development of contacts is further complicated because many guidance counselors have to deal with more than 200 students each, she said.

While the Admissions Office has a rough goal of giving each class a 15 percent minority population, as recommended by the Financial Aid Task Force in 1983, Smith said that no quotas exist, and each applicant receives consideration on his own merits.

Also, while Gray-Murray serves as what she called "a general coordinator of our efforts," all admissions officers participate in efforts to recruit black students.

Need for more blacks

Gray-Murray called for more black faculty and staff at Williams to encourage black students to attend Williams. "We need to provide prominent demonstrations that this is an open community where students can seek out older figures with common experience," she said.

In admissions, she said she sees an opportunity to use the untapped resources of organizations within black communities to identify and to recruit promising applicants. Gray-Murray commented that she saw no decrease in the amount of talent which applicants can offer, but, "We have to use better methods to identify them."

To Gray-Murray, Williams' dilemma lies in the "commitment to improving black life here that exists from the President on down. That is almost unanimous. Now we have to address ourselves to solving these specific tasks."

The women's hockey team took third place in the Bowdoin tournament this weekend, beating Skidmore 3-1 in the consolation contest after being routed by Colby 7-1 in their opening game. The split set their season record at 2-5.

In games earlier last week, the squad fell 12-2 to Middlebury on Monday and were nipped by Hamilton 3-2 in a Wednesday nlght game at Lansing Chapman Rink.

In the Skidmore game, senior Beth Ebel scored one goal while sophomore Katherine Eaton tallied for two. Co-captaln Sue Kleln '86 was pleased wlth the team's effort. "Everyone really put out a lot on the ice," she said about the team, whlch was plagued by illnesses to many players.

"The whole team really pulled together," continued Kleln. Daisy Hagey '88 excelled in goal, as Klein termed her play "outstanding." She also noted the play of Sarah Montgomery '86 on defense.

So far, the main problems with the team have been an excess of penalties and the flu bug striking down multiple players. "We were plagued by penalties, but we overcame them and really dominated the Skidmore game," concluded Klein.

The Ephwomen travel to UConn on Thursday before returning home to meet Colby on Saturday.

Men's squash

by Jim Goodwin

The Williams varsity squash team improved their record to 7-2 this past weekend as they cruised to easy victories over the University of Rochester and MIT.

Williams hosted Rochester Saturday morning, and plowed through their inexperienced lineup by a total game score of 27-1. Captain Doug Robie '86, Sam Fortenbaugh '86, and Matt McCall '87 easily handled the Rochester top three. Sophomore Pier Friend allowed his opponent only 12 points at the number seven position, taking the third game by a 15-0 margin.

The racquetmen were even more impressive against a much tougher MIT squad as Robie and McCall, playing numbers one and two, fought off tremendous pressure early on and took solid victories in their final games. "I was impressed at the team's effort under pressure so early in the season," stated coach Sean Sloane, "hopefully we can carry the momentum we picked up this weekend through the rest of the season."

The team faces a strong Dartmouth squad tomorrow away, and an even stronger Yale lineup Friday at 4:00 in the Lasell squash courts.

Women's squash

by Al Mottur

With the hardest portion of its schedule already completed, the women's varsity squash team stands at 2-2 and has many reasons to be optimistic about the remainder of the season.

In its most recent match, the squad fell to Division I powerhouse Yale by a score of 9-0. Senior captain Laura Rogers, who occupies the number two position on the team, said of the meet, "They're just a better team. But I think it was a good match because everyone played really well; some playing their best squash of the year."

Coach Renzie Lamb also was happy despite the defeat. "Yale is a very talented and experienced team. We have a bunch of good athletes who aren't necessarily as experienced as they are. We have progressed to the point where we are right where we should be," he said.

Before the Yale match, the team won two of its first three, beating Middlebury 7-2 and Hamilton 9-0 after losing to Dartmouth 6-3 to start off the season.

In defeating both Middlebury and Hamilton, the team exhibited the talent and depth which should render it superior to many of its Division II foes the remainder of the season. Said Rogers, "We just walked all over them. Our strength comes from the fact that our number 2 through 8 players are all very evenly matched. So even if we lose at 2 and 3 our players at 4 through 8 should probably win."

This analysis seems to have held true in the Ephwomen's two victories this year. Their two losses came at the hands of Dartmouth and Yale, two tough Division I schools. From all the evidence, it looks as if the team is ready to have a good season. At least Rogers thinks so. "This team is very solid from top to bottom and we should have a great year," she said.

The team goes to Wellesley for a round-robin tournament this weekend with Wellesley and Bowdoin, starting at 12 noon.

Track

by Stewart Verdery

The Ephs men's track team placed a disappointing third in their tri-meet against Springfield and Albany St. last Friday. Knowing beforehand that these teams would be much stronger than their previous competition, Williams' effort fell short, garnering only 44 points to Springfield's 50 and Albany's 76.

The only first place performance for Williams was turned in by Ken Alleyne '88, who jumped 21'4 1/2 " to capture the long jump. He also took third in the 55 meter dash. Runner-ups were Joe McGinn '88 in the 35 lb. put at 46' 10 1/2 ", Mark Gilrain '87 in the 3000 at 9: 20.74, and the one mile relay team. Williams nailed down eight third place finishes: Bob Chase '88 in the pole vault, Dan Root '87 in the shot put, Ted Arrowsmith '88 for the 1500, Jeff Etemad '89 in the 400, John Servin '89 In the 500, Ian Brzezinski '86 in the 800, T.J. Lydon '86 in the 3000, and Alleyne. Bill Leininger '86 took three fourth place finishes.

The men's team next sees action Friday night at home at 6:00 versus Tufts and MIT.

events, the 200 and 500 freestyles, Robinson grabbed two strong second-place finishes.

Women fait also

The women fell to their equally talented opponents. Joan Horgan '87 led the team with three wins(100 back, 100 butterfly, and the 200 individual medley) and qualified for nationals in the 100 back.

Sophomore Jody Skidd finished second to Horgan In the 100 back, narrowly missing nationals, and won the 200 back, making the national qualifying time. Her teammate on the medley relay, junior Lonnie Searfoss, swam well in two second-place finishes in the breastroke events.

Jen Raymond'87 and Katie Bacon 'Ex turned in tough performances against UMass. Swimming the "Iron Cross," the 500 and 1000 free and 200 fly in the same meet, the junior tandem showed toughness characteristic of Coach Carl Sameulson's teams.

Divers Emily Parker '86 and Jen Campbell '87 scored two one-two finishes against the Minutewomen divers. This important 16-2 thrashing kept the women in a position to win the meet until the last relay.

On Saturday, the team travels to Bowdoin.

bounced back with a goal just 45 seconds later. Freshman Chris Conway scored the Ephs' goal when he converted on a pretty flick-shot from the right side.

A bit of bad luck hurt Williams as an Eph defenseman inadvertently knocked the puck into his own goal to give Union a 2-1 lead at 7:23 of the third period.

Union managed to find the net again with 9:55 remaining for the insurance goal and a commanding 3-1 lead. Union's final goal fell into an open Williams net with 12 seconds left.

Williams sees no relief in the near future as they face New England College, Colby, Bowdoin, and Army in the next four games.

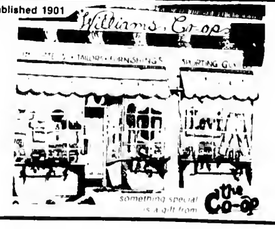
Dartmouth 75-60. Sheehy started three guards (Bill Melchionni '89 along with Walshand Ciulla), and the added quickness kept Williams in the game for the first 18 minutes, but Dartmouth took charge right before half and led 32-25 at the juncture.

In the second half, the Ephs pulled within four at 6:47 on an offensive rebound by Rob Stubblebine '88, and then got the ball back on a turnover. But Dartmouth's Bryan Randall stole the inbounds pass and converted a three-point play at the other end. The Ephs never got within five again. "That play was the ball game," said Sheehy.

Big win over Trinity

Two nights before, the Ephs had found themselves facing All-American Ken Abere and his Trinity team. The Bantams got out to an early eight-point advantage as Abere dominated inside. But Melchionni followed his own miss, stole a pass and hit two free throws to tie the score 20-20 at 3:00.

Walsh ended the half by hitting a jumper to tie the score at 33. The major concern for the Ephs was an injury to Johnson's right calf that would eventually hold him out of the Dartmouth contest on Thursday.



The Ephs jumped ahead immediately in the second half, going up by four when Meadows hit a pair of free throws at 15:07 for a 41-37 advantage. The lead held up for six minutes, when Ciulla and Walsh hit successive jumpers to set a 51-41 lead and force a Trinity timeout.

After the break, the Bantams slapped on a press, which thoroughly rattled the Ephs. Trinity scored nine straight points and took the lead on a jumper with the clock showing three minutes.

Johnson got the ball at the foul line and drove for the basket to take a 55-54 lead with 1:50 to go. Meadows then made a big steal and Walsh his six foul shots to seal the 60-58 win against the team ranked 18th nationally and second in New England.

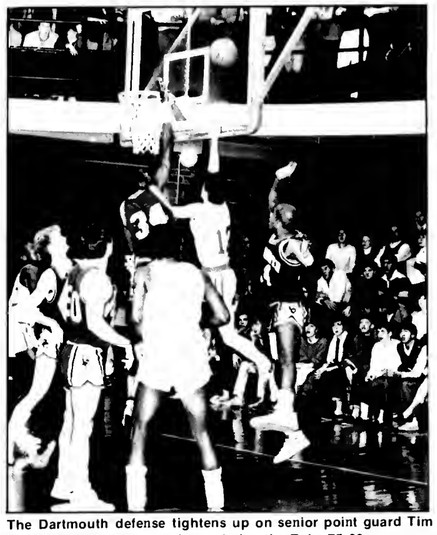
Hoopsters rout Jeffs, nip Trinity

by Cliff Peale



Taking the lead for good with thirteen minutes left in the game and extending to a 73-61 final score, the men's varsity basketball team trounced arch-rival Amherst last night in Amherst to go to 6-5 on the season.

Mike Masters '89 hit a jumper to give the Ephs their lead, and then senior point guard Tim Walsh took over, scoring six of the next eight points. John Ciulla '87 hit four jumpers. With the Ephs spreading the court and Walsh calmly directing traffic, Amherst had no chance and Williams sailed to the 73-61 final.

"We just wanted to relax and to be aggressive offensively," said coach Harry Sheehy. "We played a really super second half."

That second half was in marked contrast to the Ephs' first half, in which they fell behind 10-2 after only five minutes of play. Charging calls on Ciulla and Brandt Johnson '87 hurt Williams, as well as several sloppy turnovers.

But Williams slowly and surely crept back into the game. Masters replaced starting small forward Mike Meadows '86 and immediately contributed a three-point play to pull the Ephs to within six at 19-13. Ciulla and Walsh then scored before Masters stole the ball on the sideline and roared in for the layup, three-point play and a 32-30 Williams deficit. That was the halftime score.

The Dartmouth defense tightens up on senior point guard Tim Walsh as he drives to the hoop during the Ephs 75-60 loss. (Albright)

Ephs dominate 2nd half

"I felt great at halftime, only being down by two," said Sheehy. He soon felt better as co-captain Greg Lang '87 and Johnson began to dominate the boards and key the Eph fast break. Johnson scored twice to knot the score at 42 before Masters put the Ephs ahead for good with his baseline jumper at 13:34.

Skiers travel to UNH, women 5th, men 6th

The ski team, both men and women, travel ed to Loon Mountain and the Jackson Ski Touring Center this weekend to compete in the University of New Hampshire carnival. The strength of both alpine teams carried the women to fifth place overall and the men to sixth. UVM won in both categories.

Senior captain Tim Hill paced the men in both giant slalom and slalom, placing 11th and seventh respectively. He was followed closely by Martin Magoun '87, who captured 12th in the giant slalom. Talented freshman Jed Scala rounded out the scoring with a 15th in the giant slalom, while Dave Sage '88 raced to 15th in the slalom.

The men's alpine team racked up enough points in the two events to place third overall in the alpine events. This decidedly strong showing was unfortunately met by lackluster results from the nordic team. Coming off a second place last weekend, they placed sixth in the individual race and seventh in the relay.

In Friday's individual race Macdara Nash '88 led the team in 17th place. He was followed by seniors Fredrik Eaton in 19th and Ole Halvorsen in 32nd. Overall, the Ephmen finished in sixth place, one point behind St. Lawrence.

Women take fifth

On the women's side, the alpine squad finished fifth in the giant slalom and sixth in the slalom, while their nordic teammates copped fifth in their events. The freshman alpine skiers showed their stuff in both events. The four women who registered team points are all new to the team.

Mari Omland paced the women in Friday's giant slalom with a ninth-place finish. She was followed by Amy Duncombe in 15th and Monica Kopp in 24th. In Saturday's slalom, Omland entered the second run in sixth but got caught up on a gate.

Kopp quickly stepped in to fill Omland's shoes, finishing 11th, while Duncombe took 15th and Lynda Glass 25th. In Friday's individual nordic race Kathy Wolf '88 skied to a 15th place finish. She was followed by Beth Schmidt '86 in 22nd and Kristin Seeman '89 in 24th. In Saturday's relay, Wolf and Schmidt teamed with freshman Ann Arnason to finish fifth, just ten seconds behind Dartmouth. Overall, the women placed fifth at the carnival.

Head coach Bud Fisher was extremely pleased with the strength and success of thte alpine teams, but noted that the nordic results were not indicative of the teams' skiing ability. He was confident of greater success in next weekend's events at the St. Lawrence Carnival.

Ephwomen lose to Amherst, fall to Albany and Hamilton

by Al Mottur and Mark Via

The women's basketball team was trounced by the Lady Jeffs of Amherst by a score of 73-35 on Saturday, setting their season record at 1-5. Amherst was led by Liz Garner, who poured in 22 points from her forward position.

Ephwoman coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin praised the Jeffs' strong defense, commenting that it prevented the Ephwomen from generating any consistent offense. Amherst led the entire game, taking a 38-16 lead into halftime.

Missy Crouchley '89 continued her outstanding play for Williams by connecting for 12 points. Sophomore point guard Kim Hatch also played well, making five steals and dishing out three assists. Junior captain Anne Schmutz had a solid game as well, with five rebounds and three assists.

Earlier in the week, the Ephwomen had lost two one-sided contests, 76-51 to Albany and 68-40 to Hamilton. Against a taller Albany squad, Williams was never really in the game as Albany jumped out to an early lead and led 39-16 at the half. Hudson-Hamblin attempted to use a press to force Albany into turning the ball over, but it was largely unsuccessful. "They simply passed the ball over our heads and made layups," said Hudson-Hamblin.

Freshman Nancy Hedeman scored 11 points and had 11 rebounds to lead the Ephwomen, but against Hamilton on Tuesday, she had a foot injury and was largely ineffective. Crouchley had 17 in that game to lead Williams as they saw Hamilton stretch a small halftime lead into the 28-point final score.

The Ephwomen play their next game tonight against Union in Schenectady.

Eph swimmers sunk

by Kurt Oeler

On Saturday the mens' and womens' swimming teams traveled to the University of Masachusetts at Amherst's Boyden Pool to face the powerful Minutemen.

The men lost 68-45 and the women fell 79-51 in meets closer than the scores indicated. Three days before, on Wednesday January 15, the women trounced nearby Mount Holyoke College.

Senior co-captains Bill Couch and Will Andrew led the men with double victories. Couch won the 1000 freestyle and 200 free. The foursome challenged UMass with a 16-2 run, drawing Williams within two points, but the Ephs could come no closer.

Kuilk also teamed with junior Chris Kirwan in the 200 breaststroke to finish two-three. Kirwan later called his spectacular finish "the strongest second-hundred yards of my life."

Scott Robinson '87 swam tenaciously against the Minutemen. Facing defending New England champion and recordholder Drew Donovan in his speciality

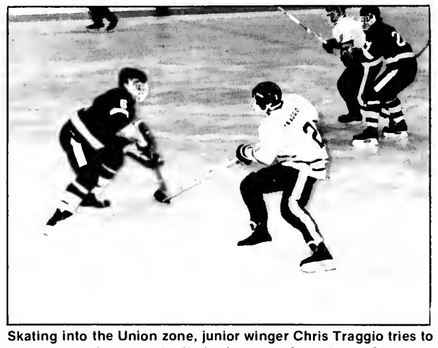
Hockey falls by three to Union



by Jamie Gallop and Rick Orluk

Although falling to 2-7-2 on the season, the men's hockey team in now playing good, solid hockey. Last Tuesday night, the Ephs traveled to Middlebury and skated to a 3-3 tie against the Panthers. On Saturday night, they found themselves on the losing end of a 4-1 score against a top-ranked Union squad.

After a very shaky first period which saw the Ephs fall behind 3-1 to Middlebury, they regrouped and played outstanding hockey the next two periods, getting a goal in each one while holding the Panthers scoreless. Senior goaltender Marty Collins, getting his first start of the season, got a quick education, with the Panthers finding the back of the Williams net three times in the fist period. Junior standout Denny Wright scored the Ephs' only first-period goal.

The second period saw Collins come out and thwart the offensive hopes of Middlebury with some fine goaltending, allowing Wiliams to creep back into the game. At 11:12 of the second period, freshman winger Walter Hoffman beat Panther goaltender Dom Ciarollo on a beautiful breakaway move which saw him fake Ciarollo to the ice and then flip the puck into the top right corner of the Middlebury net.

The Ephs continuted to pressure Middlebury with good forechecking, which did not allow the Panthers to clear the puck from their defensive zone. On several occasions, the inexperience of some of the Ephs' younger players showed as they passed up good shots to make the last pass when the puck should have been shot.

Skating into the Union zone, junior winger Chris Traggio tries to set up a scoring opportunity in the game Saturday at Chapman Rink. The Ephs fell by 4-1. (Mead)

In the third period Williams continued to dominate but their efforts were only good for one goal. Junior Defenseman Tim McKone, with help from freshmen Will Putnam and Chris Conway, netted the tying goal with just 3:05 remaining.

Williams came out strong in the overtime period, outskating Middlebury and creating numerous scoring opportunities. But they could not put the puck into the net.

The entire defense turned in a solid effort, including freshman Tim Frechette, junior Tim McKone, and junior Taylor Watts, who saw his first ice time of the year.

On Saturday, Union came into the Chapman rink carrying a second-place ranking in Divsion II college hockey. A very aggressive Williams squad surprised the Dutchmen for more than two periods with intense forechecking in their defensive zone. Marty Collins '86 got the starting nod again and played very well, turning away 27 Union shots.

In the first period, Williams came out flying, outshooting the Dutchmen 11-5. Solid contact between the blue lines allowed the Ephs to dictate the pace of play, keeping Union confused and frustrated while creating several good scoring opportunities for themselves.

In the second period, Union seemed to make adjustments to counter the Eph attack and took advantage of four Williams penalties to accumulate a shot margin of 3-to-1 in their favor, but came up scoreless due to some solid goaltending and fine short-handed defensive work. After two periods, the game remained scoreless.

Union's Curt Cole netted the first goal of the game 2:33 into the third period, but Williams

Black life at Williams: On a downward curve

by Virginia Demaree

A fear that racial tension at Williams may be getting worse instead of better haunts the current administration and members of the black community, but they say they are not sure how to stop the backsliding and keep Williams on a liberal, tolerant track.

"There are worrying signs of at least a slowing down and in some areas a threat of a reversal of some of the hard-fought gains of the last few decades," President Francis Oakley said.

Williams Black Student Union member Martin White '87 said he is worried that a nationwide trend toward conservatism extends to racial relations at Williams. "Williams is a microcosm of the country. I've never met as much racial insensitivity as blatant as I have this year," White said.

"Williams is so homogeneous that blacks are a little, make that a lot, excluded. It's not sufficiently different from society as a whole," he said.

'Run quicker'

The declining numbers of black students attending college nationwide hurts Williams, according to Oakley. "We have to run quicker, as it were, to stay in the same place," he explained.

Both Oakley and Assistant Dean of the College Roberto Ifill said that the small number of blacks here contributes to a problem in recruiting more. Ifill explained, "There are few blacks here. If a prospective looks around and sees only seven percent blacks, he may say, 'I don't want to go there.'"

White does not fault Williams' recruiting efforts, even though he says not enough is done on campus to help the blacks who do come. "I think they (the admissions officers) try hard to recruit black students. Williams is not well-known in the black community," he said.

The problems blacks face in society as a whole are intensified at Williams, Ifill said. "There's a basic problem. If you're a black American, this elite institution represents in part some of the things that have kept your parents and grandparents down for so many years," he said.

White, a junior advisor in Williams A, said black students often feel isolated, especially during freshman year. "You're isolated from the black community, family and friends from home. Through subtle hints, you're told you shouldn't be too friendly with other blacks. You should try to fit in," he said.

Mainstreaming

Feeling forced to fit in the mainstream is a problem for blacks throughout their Williams career, said Averil Clarke '87. "I like it here. There are just things I can't relate to. It's having to love football games, having to love tail-gating. If there were less pressure, people would benefit, not just black students, but everyone," she said.

Rudy Ford '87 said, in his on-campus experience, blacks and whites seem well integrated. Yet Ford said, "The College as a whole is not as well integrated as it should be. Some blacks are more interested in being together and not in expanding their horizons."

Clarke said she oftens hears other students say that blacks always seem to be together, for example eating together in the dining halls. "People notice that and view it as a problem," she said. "I see white students with four or five other whites. Why is it a problem with the one black table? Why isn't it a problem with the 10 white tables?"

White said, "There's an ignorance of what it means to be black at Williams. There's a feeling that the effort to get rid of racism must be initiated by black students."

Integrated social situations may be the exception and not the rule according to some black members of the Williams community. (Somers)

Being representative

Some black students feel pressured to be representative blacks and educate others about what it's like to be black, Clarke said. "Some people don't mind answering questions like, 'Why is your hair kinky,' or 'How do you get your hair to look like that,' but it can put you in a corner," she said. "You don't want to be known as so-and-so, black student."

This pressure can extend to the classroom, Clarke said. "You're the only black student in a class, and the teacher asks you what you think. It doesn't bother me, but many students don't like being turned to for the black perspective. They feel they're not being asked for their individual opinion."

White said students notice whether someone is black or white. "Some very color-conscious decisions are made here," he said. "It reminds me of (Martin Luther) King's speech about a man being judged on the content of his character, not the color of his skin."

"I don't see overt racism or institutional racism," Ifill said. "It'a moral exhaustion. A lot of folks don't want to reach out. There's not so much a polarization of black and white as an isolation."

One move that the administration and the BSU have made is to initiate discussions with junior advisors before freshmen arrive in the fall.

BSU for all?

Ford, a member of the black community who chooses not to participate in the BSU, said he recognizes that some black students need the support the BSU offers, but he thinks it does not answer every black students' needs. "I don't feel like I need what the BSU offers. When I

Vermont to vote on drinking age, up to 21 from 18

by Debbie Snyder

The Vermont State Legislature will vote this week on a bill which proposes raising the state's drinking age from 18 to 21. The bill contains a grandfather clause that would allow persons who are eighteen by June 30, 1986, to buy alcoholic beverages even after the drinking age increases.

The bill will first go to the State Senate, where the closest vote is expected, with a predicted one-vote margin for passage or defeat, according to a writer for the Burlington Free Press. Both the State House of Representatives and Vermont Governor Madeleine M. Kunin support the bill and are expected to pass it if the Senate does.

Kunin has made legislation to control drinking one of the top priorities of her administration. She introduced the bill last year, but the legislature did not pass it. It then went into a conference committee that revised the bill. The legislature is actually voting on the revisions to the bill, upon which the committee agreed.

During her State of the State address in Montpelier last Thursday, Kunin supported the bill and called for harsher penalties for drunk-driving convictions. She encouraged the legislature to require all persons convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol to spend at least one night in jail.

Young Massachusetts residents will have one less reason to go to Vermont if the drinking age there is raised as the governor wishes. (Albright)

Vermont's drinking age was reduced from twenty-one to eighteen in 1971. Four years ago, a bill to raise the age to 19 passed the Legislature but was vetoed by the then-governor. If the current bill is passed, Louisiana and Hawaii will be the only states in the country with a drinking age of 18 for all alcoholic beverages, including hard liquor. Several states, including North Carolina and Ohio, have lower ages for beer and wine, but the bill the Vermont legislature is considering would raise the age to 21 for all alcohol.

Ph.D.'s on decline

Black profs in demand

by John Canty

A declining national pool of black applicants and increased competition for them has limited Williams' affirmative action program of hiring black faculty and administrators, according to College officials.

Increased efforts in the past two years have succeeded in keeping Williams in a holding pattern, said Nancy McIntire, assistant to the president for affirmative action and government relations. McIntire and Dean of the Faculty John Reichert, however, said they see little hope for improvement in the immediate future.

"I don't want to excuse Williams in a complacent way, because it's always possible that we're not doing enough," McIntire said. "But we really have been increasing our efforts."

Both McIntire and Reichert pointed to significant drops in the proportion of new doctorates in graduate study held by blacks. Newly tenured English professor David L. Smith agreed. "We're not talking about problems in having people who are not qualified. We are just talking about declining numbers," Smith said. At Williams since 1980, Smith is the senior black member of the faculty.

More of same

Smith said that he thinks Williams' efforts to recruit black faculty will continue on the same course for the immediate future. "I see more of the same. That is, more of the traditional commitment by the administration and some departments to the idea of attracting blacks, and more of the same indifference, even outright hostility to this on the part of other departments," Smith said.

Williams' own affirmative action program began voluntarily in 1972, McIntire said. Federal law now requires large companies and institutions to make efforts to hire minorities.

The law, called the Philadelphia Plan, contains a system of goals and timetables under which employers must make progress in hiring minorities in numbers representative of the national pool. Should an institution not be making progress, it must have records documenting a good-faith effort to comply. McIntire said that in 1982 Williams underwent a check by the Department of Labor, which administers the law, and proved satisfactory.

At Williams, department chairmen each fall submit to the Committee on Appointments

An unbalanced proposal

The Chemistry Department and the Science Executive Committee have recommended to the Committee on Educational Policy that the minimum number of Division III courses be increased to three, including at least one lab science course. The joint proposal is a sincere effort to make the Williams student scientifically literate, but it ignores deeper problems within Division III. If the proposal is an attempt to reverse the unpopularity of Division III, it is unfair; if it is an effort to ensure that students take serious and rigorous courses to meet the core requirements, it is unnecessary.

Of the three divisions, math-science is the least popular. Fifty-five percent of students major in Division II, 29% in Division I and only 16% in Division III. Divisions I and II comprise 79% of the total class enrollment. These figures are a cause for alarm among math, science and computer science professors, but the solution lies within those departments, not in the core requirements.

If students do not chose electives in Division III, the professors should re-structure courses to make them more attractive, not just require an additional semester of unappealing course work. Common criticisms are that introductory lab sciences are not only quite difficult but also too tightly integrated into the overall structure of the department. Rather than being an overview of a particular discipline, introductory courses are often perceived as being in-depth studies that serve merely as stepping stones to further work in the departments.

If, on the other hand, the Chemistry Department and the Science Executive Committee are primarily concerned with what they see as students' efforts to seek easy Division III courses and thus skirt the intention of the core requirement, the departments themselves should make their courses for non-majors scientifically rigorous. The Division should require a lab science — a new technique of study to many students — as one of its two required courses, but that can be dealt with without requiring a third course.

Math, laboratory science and computer science are important aspects of a liberal arts education, but by demanding three classes in this field, the core requirements would emphasize Division III more than Divisions I and II. For these reasons, the CEP should not endorse this proposal.

Solutions?

To the Editor:

Here we go again! Another abortion debate! Nina Yanuzzi has defended, and defended well, the pro-choice argument for perhaps the billionth time in U.S. history. Rather than refuting her argument for the billionth time, I wish to bring up a possible solution to this never-ending debate.

Nina believes seemingly, that due to her experience in secondary school with one pro-lifer of the thousands that exist, all pro-lifers must therefore necessarily be "anti-choice." This common assumption, along with the equally common pro-life assumption which claims all pro-choicers to be cold-blooded killers, is responsible for keeping the pro-life vs. pro-choice debate bitterly unresolved.

Being of the pro-life camp myself ("of course," you say, "He's a male") I do sincerely believe that once conceived, a fetus is a human life — all the way back to the fertilized egg, regardless of the circumstances under which conception took place. To do away with that life is an act of murder. Now you will notice that I have said that I believe this; I don't know it, I believe it.

Where the pro-life and pro-choice arguments diverge is in the consideration of the unborn fruit of the womb. Pro-lifers see such fruit as human life, endowed with the same right to be alive as any adult; pro-choicers see the fetus as an organ representing perhaps the potential for human life. Neither side of the debate can prove its case. Is a fetus a human being? Pro-lifers say "absolutely!" and pro-choicers say "No — a fetus is part of our body!" Since both sides have arguments which begin with opposite assumptions, both sides argue and shout and demonstrate on steps of clinics and capitol buildings until blue in the face and convince nobody on the opposite side of the correctness of their argument.

What it boils down to is a classic argument of faiths that differ. Hence I shall suggest that since neither side agrees with the other as to where the argument starts, neither side shall ever prevail. If somebody were to prove that a fetus was not human life, then pro-lifers would probably stop opposing abortion, and if somebody proved a fetus to be human life for sure, then I'd guess that pro-choice people would oppose abortion. But as it stands, nobody knows for sure whether or not a fetus is life. Hence each side is arguing a point of faith rather than a matter of fact. This leads me to the conclusion that neither side shall ever prove itself to be "right," nor shall one side ever prove the other side to be absolutely wrong.

This being the case, it seems to me that for either side to impose its beliefs on the other side, whether through church law or federal legislation, is grossly unfair. What I am trying to get at is that abortion should not be illegal, but it should also not be federally funded. Too many people believe abortion not to be murder to make it illegal, but too many other people believe abortion to be an act of murder to make them pay for it through their tax dollars.

Our nation has declared separation of church and state — those who wish not to worship cannot be forced to. Freedom goes here both ways. The same type of stance should be taken regarding abortion. Those who wish to practice it should be free to, and those who believe it to be murder should not be forced to participate in it in any way. Neither side of the abortion debate should claim the right to impose its views on the other side — it is a debate too much based on faith and not enough based on knowledge.

Unborn

To the Editor:

As a former fetus, I must take issue with Nina Yanuzzi's op-ed (January 21, 1986) on abortion. In my opinion, it would seem that at the moment of conception a woman becomes a prospective mother, and that the zygote/embryo/fetus is a prospective infant, "wanted" or not. Aged nine hours or nine months, the unborn have a right to live which ought to be protected by statutes outlawing abortion.

If a woman's right to privacy includes a right to terminate her unborn child in the name of "reproductive freedom," how in hell can prostitution still be outlawed, in this country?

Log on rebound, Cutler says

by Eli Attle

Changes in the Log's drinking policy have been met by general optimism and higher attendance in the past two weeks. While the new legal drinking age still hurts patronage, the removal of the two-drink limit has restored a sizeable portion of the College-owned pub's former popularity, according to Log Manager Mike Cutler.

According to Dean of the College Stephen Fix, "There has been a very clear understanding among students about the College's obligations," which have necessitated the stricter carding procedures.

Cutler said he is very pleased with student reactions and observance of the new policies. Though the Log has still not reached last year's popularity, Cutler said he is confident that it will. "Students are undergoing a period of adjustment to the new Log," he said.

Cutler said the Log has been hurt by students' personal responses to changes forced by the new drinking age. "It's a very personal building, and it contains a lot of past, a lot of good times," he said. He cited changes in the menu and a better entertainment calendar, saying he hopes those will make up for the loss.

Students have repopulated the Log since the Deans removed the two-drink limit enacted last fall. (Albright)

Two-thirds legal

Despite the increasing emphasis on food and entertainment, two-thirds of the Log's customers since the changes were instituted have been above the legal drinking age.

"It's pretty evident that the Log's main attraction is alcohol," said Paul Caluori '86. He said he secs the changes in policy as positive. "Before, I felt as though I was being chaperoned. Now I feel as though I'm treated like I'm responsible. I never really want more than one or two beers anyway."

According to Leslie Whittle '87, the drinking restrictions are "OK for juniors and seniors, but a drawback for freshmen and sophomores." She said she worries that when current freshmen get older, "People won't know what to do at the Log."

Freshman Erik Marks says that he rarely goes to the Log, and when he has gone, there have been few freshmen. He cited the unavailability of alcohol as a drawback, adding, "If I want to go out and party, I'll go somewhere else. If I just want to socialize, I'll stay in my entry."

Fix said the Log belongs to the students, and that its future is entirely in their hands. He concluded, "I'm eager to see the students take responsibility for making it a more attractive place in all ways."

Ranking will not up pool, too late, Admissions says

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Williams College's ranking in US News & World Report as the number-one small liberal arts college in the nation will probably not have any substantial effect on the number of applications for the Class of 1990.

Instead, according to the Admissions Office, changes will probably be seen this year in the number of accepted students that actually decide to attend (the yield rate). There also may be increases in applications from next year's student pool.

The poll, the second issued by US News & World Report, ranks Williams as the best liberal-arts college in the nation. In the poll, Swarthmore finished second, with Amherst third.

According to Assistant Director of Admissions Elizabeth Connolly, one of the main factors which must be kept in mind when evaluating the effects of such a poll, is its validity. "This poll (surveying the opinions of college presidents across the nation) can say that we're number one and another poll taken by different people can place us at number ten," she said. "It's a very subjective thing."

Director of Admissions Phillip Smith concurred, saying, "The important thing is to be recognized as being in the top echelon of schools in this category. I'm not too sure about the precision of a poll such as this."

'Too late'

The consensus among the admissions officers was that it is too late in the year for the poll results to have a substantial impact on the number of applications for the class of 1990. Smith pointed out, "The poll is a long-term sort of thing, being printed every two years. More of an impact would be felt next year."

An increase may be seen in the yield rate for the class of 1990 as more students and their parents become aware of the poll. The yield rate for the class of 1989 was 42 percent, with no students accepted from the waiting list.

Snyder calls for action

by Tom Ewing

The only way to understand injustice and suffering is to experience it, and only in this way is it possible to make a better world, said Mitch Snyder, a member of the Community for Creative Non-Violence.

Snyder focused on the plight of the homeless in America in his speech Saturday night to about 130 people in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. He estimated that there are between two and three million people without homes in America, but no one is sure about the exact number, which he said proves that most Americans are not interested in the homeless.

Snyder said the homeless population is made up of the elderly, alcoholics, deinstitutionalized mental patients and young black men and women. The stereotype of the homeless as being mostly alcoholics is no longer true, Snyder said, but it persists because it is an image people like to preserve.

Snyder said that the increase in the homeless population is the result of a breakdown in traditional family structures, which has destroyed the bonds between the extended family. As a result, Snyder said, people no longer feel obligated to care for relatives who may be out on the streets.

Snyder placed the primary responsibility for creating the homeless on the economy, culture and institutions people are forced to deal with in today's society. Society's failure, he said, is reflected by the fact that in the richest nation on earth, there are people eating out of garbage pails and sleeping in dumpsters.

The homeless are not a temporary aberration, Snyder said. They are the result of "unbridled competition and rampant individualism (in an) irrational, inhuman and dangerous system." As a result, most Americans have become compartmentalized and work hard to distance themselves from the poor and homeless, he said.

Snyder said he and the other members of the CCNV began to break down doors to find shelters, to enter churches and keep them open at night to offer shelters and to provide Thanksgiving dinners for thousands of people in Lafayette Park, across the street from the White House. "We got a lot of people angry and a lot of people defensive," Snyder said.

The actions of the CCNV generate opposition because the group refuses to compromise with economic and state institutions, Snyder said, adding you do not have to compromise to get things done. When asked the specific basis for criticism, he replied, "We are rational," and called his critics irrational.

Snyder called for people to seek to change the world and make it a better place. The only way to do this, he argued, is to come into personal contact with the victims of poverty and injustice.

The College is not the place to start to bring about change, Snyder said. "This is the last place you will be equipped to make a contribution to humanity," he said, adding that a college like Williams can only equip you to find a job.

In conclusion, Snyder called on people to make a contribution to the creation of a new world before the world is destroyed by nuclear war or environmental destruction. The choice, Snyder said, lies between waiting for the world to blow up in our faces or coming to our senses and making the world the right place to be. In a mad world, Snyder said, things can only be changed by rational people who have the faith that change can come.

Snyder was the second speaker in the Poverty in American series, sponsored by the College Council.

MASS-PIRG seeks student approval

by Sonali Weerackody

The Massachusetts Public Research Group, referred to as MASS-PIRG, will start its campaign next week to establish a chapter at Williams. In a meeting last week, members of the group said it tackles issues concerning the environment, consumer demands and hunger projects.

"Before we work on projects, we need a chapter," explained Eve Weinbaum, a staff person at MASS-PIRG assigned to inform the Berkshire region of this group.

Weinbaum said that the group needs a majority student vote approving the chapter and its funding. The administration approved a $3 waivable fee for each student, which is added to the Student Activities Tax, but made it conditional on majority student support.

MASS-PIRG works for public interest issues both on- and off-campus, Weinbaum said. "We go into the state house and Washington, city halls, court rooms and corporate headquarters. Our energies are directed on improving the quality of life for all Massachusetts residents."

In the past year, MASS-PIRG has successfully initiated legislation not only on cutting acid rain emissions by 30 percent all over the state, but also on the Hazardous Waste Clean Up Bill, which orders the state to investigate and clean up dump sites. "We also set up the Citizen's Utility Board, which allows residents to have a more effective voice in legislation," Weinbaum said.

Stephanie Heath '86 said, "Last year, through voter registration by mail, we collected about 400,000 votes around the state."

Each chapter of MASS-PIRG set its own agenda, said Cameron Weisenberger '86. "We'll all decide together which issues to deal with," he said.

MASS-PIRG was started in 1972 by students at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. At the time, Weinbaum said, "The group was viewed as conservative because they worked within the system." Activity peaked in the mid 1970s but eventually lost energy. Now, however, renewed energy is being generated, Weinbaum said, with 24 other chapters throughout the state.

W.S. credit

Southworth said, "Schools like Amherst and U. Mass give academic credit for research projects with MASS-PIRG chapters. It would be possible to set up a Winter Study here at Williams, for example."

Several years ago, there was a chapter at Williams, which operated on a contributions system, according to Heath. The effort to reactivate MASS-PIRG at Williams started in the fall of 1984.

Each chapter of MASS-PIRG elects a representative to meet with representatives from the other chapters in the state each month. The campaign at Williams is targeted to begin on Feb. 19. There will be another meeting tonight at 8:30 in the student lounge at Baxter.

CEP discusses Div. III proposal

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The Committee on Educational Policy last week examined a joint chemistry department/Science Executive Committee proposal to expand the Division III requirement to three courses, including one laboratory science.

Stuart Crampton, chairman of the SEC, said the change seemed desirable, pointing out that national concern over science literacy. "You have to be embarrassed about the state of the American electorate when very obvious things about Star Wars are not being raised," he said.

"One can't argue here that the students are too stupid to know about science. The purpose of the Division III requirement is to make students intellectually at ease with science," Crampton said.

Students can now fulfill the Division III requirement exclusively with mathematics courses or science courses designed for the non-major, without ever taking a laboratory course.

"I wonder how much my students remember of molecular immunogenetics, it is the mechanism by which they remember that is more important," chemistry professor Lawrence Kaplan said.

One difficulty with changing the requirement is that introductory laboratory science courses are designed as entrances into the major, Professor James Skinner pointed out that although every student at Williams should be able to pass chemistry 101-102, many do feel overwhelmed.

Chris McGuire '86 said, "It is considered acceptable for non-science members not to succeed in science courses."

Some CEP members objected to the increased cost that would be incurred by adding laboratories to courses designed for the non-major. Skinner said he felt there would be a significant loss in the content of introductory courses if they were diluted for the benefit of non-majors.

The CEP plans to discuss the Division III requirement again at its meeting next week, where it will also tackle whether students should have to complete divisional requirements by the end of sophomore or junior year.

E.D. acceptances up slightly this year

by Anne O'Malley

The Admissions Office mailed acceptance letters to 129 Early Decision candidates last month. These students were chosen from a total of 352 Early Decision applications, said Director of Admissions Philip Smith '55.

Smith said only eight of the Early Decision applicants were rejected outright. The remaining candidates were deferred and will be reconsidered along with the regular decision applicant pool. Last year, 72 students who were deferred under the early decision plan were eventually accepted at Williams.

Smith said that the decisions in these cases are based upon new evidence submitted by the deferred students as well as the size of the regular decision pool. "If you have a large group of applicants, you will take fewer (of the deferred Early Decision applicants)," he explained.

Assistant Director of Admissions Katharine Fretwell said the Early Decision pool was very talented and enthusiastic. "We weren't stretching at all to take anybody," said Gordon Becker '85, Assistant to the Director of Admissions.

Siblings

At least two of the newly admitted members of the class of 1990 have siblings already attending Williams. Karen Adams '87 said her brother Christopher is looking forward to coming.

Kate Saunders '88 said her brother Andrew, who received his acceptance letter in mid-December, is "embarrassed to wear his new Williams sweats because all his friends who got deferred won't speak to him."

Smith said that Early Decision applications were up by three percent this year and that regular decision applications are running slightly ahead of last year as well. The admissions office expects to receive around 4700 regular decision applications this year, versus last year's total of 4686.

According to Smith, the Early Decision pool had a broader geographical range this year. He said that this was the first time that more students were accepted Early Decision from California, 10, than from Massachusetts, eight.

510 for '90?

The Admissions Office hopes for an entering class of 510 next fall, Smith said. He said the Admissions Office usually predicts the size of an entering class very accurately, noting, "We wanted 508 last year and 507 showed up."

Smith said he wanted to assure students, "There is no thought of increasing the size of the College, no matter how many mailboxes are in Baxter."

Admissions

The admissions officers contacted acknowledged that the poll may be used as a recruiting tool. Richard Nesbitt pointed to the 30,000 reprints of the article which the Admissions Office has available, saying that they may be taken to college fairs and high school visits.

In addition, other colleges mentioned in the various categories of the poll will probably use reprints which would allow more people to see Williams' standing, he said.

Awareness

Connolly added, "The important thing is to make counselors aware of the poll. After all, how many of these kids read US regularly? Their parents probably do, and this could influence some application decisions."

Nesbitt said, "It's very nice to be number one and, while no one can say for sure what's going to happen, it's definitely not going to hurt us."

Several prospective students waiting in the Admissions Office for their interviews had not read the article, although some of their parents had. One student who had read the poll said he viewed it as an extra plus.

A second student who had heard about the poll from friends at school said, "It reaffirmed my decision. I knew that I had made the right choice."

Sophomores seek major advice

by Meg Thomas

Sophomores will soon face a major decision at Williams. The dean's office last week sponsored four informal meetings on choosing majors to help students through the process.

Several faculty members told students about how they chose a major and the effect this decision had on their lives. They also discussed what a major is and the factors students should consider in choosing a major. They then fielded questions from students about both the major concept and specific majors.

Beyond providing students with information concerning choice of a major, these meetings also served as a forum for students to provide feedback on what is wrong with the current process for selection of a major, as well as problems with sophomore advising.

Those running the meeting were quick to emphasize that the choice of a major does not have to determine the rest of one's life. The ability to communicate, they said, is more important to getting ahead in the job market and getting into graduate schools than is the actual choice of a major.

Academic focus

The faculty present also stated that a major could have more or less of an academic focus depending upon the individual student.

Aside from the obvious questions of performance in a potential major subject, future goals and interest in that subject, Deborah Bergstrand, a math professor, said whether or not students want a small, intimate group of classmates should be taken into account. Smaller departments are more intimate, both in terms of the probability that the same students will be in many classes and the student-to-faculty ratio, she said.

There is also a difference between departments which use more of a linear progression through a major (i.e. natural sciences) and a department which uses more of an associative, skill-building process, such as history or English.

These are an important considerations because, in some sense, "You are who you study," Assistant Dean William Darrow said. Students who focus on humanities and social sciences see the world differently from those whose focus is natural sciences, he explained.

Hole in advising

Darrow said these meetings with sophomores have a central place in the curriculum review undertaken by the Committee on Educational Policy. Darrow said students made it clear that there is a large hole in academic advising in the sophomore year.

"Choosing the major towards the end of sophomore year is too late," Darrow said. Many students find doors closed to them as early as the end of freshman year, he said, especially with difficult majors such as political economics or the possibility of studying abroad.

Darrow implied that the end of the freshmen year would be a good time for at least an initial commitment to a major. At the present time only five to 10 percent of a given class will change majors. However, by the time a student decides that he has made a mistake in the choice of a major, he finds it next to impossible to do anything about it, Darrow said.

Darrow pointed out that confused sophomores can seek advice from the Dean's office, OCC and the departments' sophomore advisors, a list of whom will be coming out next month. These advisors will not tell a student what to major in but can help him figure out what he wants to do. As Darrow said, "It's not that advisors have answers, but they do have questions."

do go to the BSU, I go to find out a little more about my own blackness," he said.

"I see the whole idea of me being integrated as a result of me getting out on my own," Ford said. "The BSU wouldn't have helped me integrate at all."

BSU members met with Oakley last November to discuss problems. "They alerted me to a sense of heightened racial insensitivity on campus," Oakley said. He said that BSU members had also talked to him about the Williams curriculum.

"People can go through majors here without ever dealing with black America or Africa," Clarke said. "I'm not talking about chemistry; I'm talking about history. There seems to be a disregard for everything but western (studies), and it does put a value judgement on things."

The organization of a chapter of Society Organized Against Racism is one way to deal with racism at Williams, according to Ifill. The Williams chapter has not set an agenda but hopes to promote discussion on campus, Ifill said. Formed at Tufts University four years ago, a purpose of SOAR is to see that people are forced to confront issues. "If you're going to be insulated in a college," Ifill said, "you'll never learn to cope in life."

and Promotions a list of anticipated openings. By early January, the CAP gives final approval to positions. After the applicant pool is narrowed to three or four candidates, the CAP and relevant chairman interview the finalists at Williams.

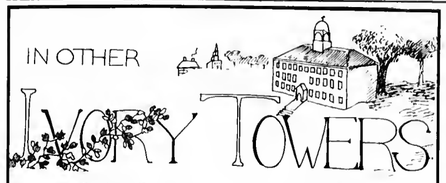
Enlarging pool

McIntire said she seeks to enlarge the pool of black applicants in this process. The College advertises in educational journals and uses a network of black alumni, former faculty and contacts compiled by McIntire. This fall, Williams sent about 500 black college administrators across the country a mailing asking for possible applicants.

The decline in the pool of blacks with new Ph.D.'s entering education has adversely affected this drive. A 1985 American Council on Education report on minorities in higher education found, "In the 1976-80 period, the number of blacks holding new doctorates declined by 7.8 percent." The latest figures available, 1982, show a decrease of 5.6 percent.

Competition for these applicants has increased in the last five years, according to McIntire. While Williams is on a competitive basis with Amherst and Wesleyan, it has been losing to large, research-oriented universities with an urban setting, McIntire said.

Assistant Dean of the College Roberto Ifill said Williams also encounters difficulties in retaining blacks. He traced this problem to the College's emphasis on granting tenure to already present faculty members.



Burden on jr's

"Williams' junior faculty bear a heavy burden in maintaining faculty-student relations," said Ifill. "New black faculty have the additional task of helping out black students here, who understandably seek role models. With a family, it is a serious weight to have." In the past, many black faculty members have accepted positions with immediate tenure at other institutions.

Smith said Williams' isolation makes it difficult to retain black faculty members. "There is no kind of surrounding ethnicity, not only for blacks but for other minority groups," he said. "It's a very homogenous, very WASPish environment."

In the affirmative action program submitted by Reichert and McIntire, Williams committed itself to offering tenured positions to minority candidates from other institutions. Reichert said, "I cannot overemphasize the commitment from President (Francis) Oakley on down to improving the situation. We will always demand excellence, but we seek results."

Reichert and McIntire emphasized the need to encourage blacks to enter teaching. McIntire said she sees the Gaius Charles Bolin Fellowship, proposed by Oakley and dedicated to Williams' first black alumnus, as demonstrating Williams' desire to attract blacks to teaching. The Fellowship will allow a graduate student the funds to complete his dissertation at Williams.

Dartmouth

Vandalism disturbed the Ivory Tower of Dartmouth College last week when three of the student-built shanties, which had housed protesters of the college's South African investment policy since September, were destroyed early Tuesday: the day after the first official national observance of Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birthday.

Members of the college community rallied on last Tuesday afternoon to voice their outrage over the incident. Over 250 people, including members of the College administration, the faculty, and the Dartmouth Community for Divestment, were on hand to express a need to fight racism and oppression at the College.

Senior Rajiv Menon said that the vandalism "is more than simply an attack on those of us fighting for divestment. It is an attack on Martin Luther King."

There has been no decision as to what disciplinary action, if any, will be taken against the students involved, several of whom were editors of the conservative Dartmouth Review.

The timing of the incident was particularly distressing to the protesters. A front page article in The Dartmouth on January 20, King's birthday, discussed the impact that the civil rights movement had on the College. Black admissions have increased sharply due to the Negro Application Program, established at Dartmouth in 1963. King had spoken at the College in 1962.

One senior remarked that "Dr. King's efforts were undermined" by the destruction of the shanties.

Harvard

A new Harvard study has found that male students are apt to dominate classroom discussions even when the professor is female.

Harvard Education Professor Catherine Krupnick, who has conducted studies on several college campuses, says men dominate classroom conversations at colleges throughout the country.

Women's career problems are directly related to both their restraint in class participation and instructor's acceptance, according to Krupnick. Marriage and child bearing are not the main obstacles to career success.

"In the real world, the ability to express ideas forcefully is important. It's highly correlated with how you do in your career,' she noted.

Instructors may be at least partially at fault for this phenomenon, according to Bernice Sandler of the Project on the Education and Status of Women. Female instructors were often brought up with the idea that men's views are more valuable, said Sandler. This theory may explain why they allow men to dominate class discussions.

According to one of Sandler's colleagues, Roberta Hall, "Many of the different expectations for men and women are carried over from the larger social situation into the college classroom." (Based on an article in The Skidmore News)

In Other Ivory Towers, written by Record reporter Bill Obrien, was compiled from campus newspapers.

Profile: Professor Fred Stocking

by Bill O'Brien

"When we arrived at Williams in the fall of 1932, the enrollment was 750 students, 80% of whom were from New England and the northeast corridor; today about half of the 2,000 students are from this area."

Frederick Stocking began teaching at Williams in 1940. He retired in 1983, and remains an active member of the faculty as Professor Emeritus of English by teaching an occasional class and heading The Birth of Modernism freshman seminar. The Record recently caught up with him while he was napping in his office.

Record: What is your opinion of Winter Study at Williams?

Professor Stocking: I'm much in favor. It can dramatize the pleasure of using the mind. My definition of an educated person is one who is incapable of boredom because he or she enjoys the company of his or her own mind. The body has appetites — good. The mind has appetites — good. No opposition is necessary.

In Winter Study you can learn just for the pleasant sensation of learning. For example, several freshmen in my seminar now know how to tie bow ties: their request, not mine. This is a minor form of learning, perhaps. But they did take pleasure in it.

Birth of Modernism is an interdisciplinary seminar: literature, art, music, and science at the turn of the century. Are there significant correlations? I am not sure. But fascinating experiments were being made. Artists and scientists were expanding the boundaries of human knowledge and human experience.

Record: What does Williams need to improve?

Stocking: It must continue the trend to have a more varied student body — students from all over the United States, from farms, factories, all economic groups. In 1940's, the College started to move away — consciously — from being a "country-club college." It's important to keep moving away.

Record: Have students changed since the forties? Were kids more industrious then? Have standards dropped?

Stocking: No. Students do more work now. They work harder and do better work. They play harder too. Grades are up. But the preparation of the students — the quality of the students — is better. Entering freshmen today know far more than freshmen did forty years ago.

Record: Getting away from academics somewhat, who is your favorite author?

Stocking: I'm proud to join the millions of English teachers who say Shakespeare. Others? Joyce, Virginia Woolf, E.B. White, Hardy as a poet.

The best production of Shakespeare I've seen recently was a production of The Tempest, by third-graders at the Williamstown Elementary School just before Christmas. It was adapted by people at Shakespeare & Company in Lenox.

It was a wonderful thing to hear treble voices speak some thrilling lines: for example, Gonzola, awakening on Prospero's island after the shipwreck, looking around, liking what he sees, and with a grand flourish of his right arm, saying, 'Here is everything advantageous to life!'

Record: Favorite music?

Stocking: Mozart. I like the security within which I can revel in the melodies. I particularly enjoy music featuring woodwinds and brasses — not the yearning violins. Also jazz, especially Benny Goodman.

Record: Favorite painting at the Clark?

Stocking: "Onions" by Renoir. The colors, arrangement, and spirit combine to equal celebration. The onions are proclaiming, "Wow! Isn't it great to be onions!"

Record: Favorite recent movie?

Stocking: "The Gods Must Be Crazy." Why? It joyously celebrates throwing a Coke bottle off the end of the world. Had it been a milk bottle, the movie would have been ruined.

Record: What are your views on athletics?

Stocking: Their purpose is fun, not building moral character or teaching human relations, though these are often commendable by-products.

Fun should be taken seriously...thought about. Each person should define it for himself or herself. Savor it. Relish it.

Record: Should P.E. be compulsory?

Stocking: If you make fun compulsory, it isn't as much fun. But I wouldn't mind if a minimum knowledge of nutrition were made compulsory.

The Williams athletic department is superb. It wants everyone to enjoy athletics, not just the tall, the weighty and the swift.

Record: Just a couple of questions to finish up. How can hangovers be avoided?

Stocking: By not overdrinking.

Record: How many roads must a man walk down before they call him a man?

Stocking: Well...at least one.

Pianist O'Riley short on emotion

by Mark Canuel

A small, snow-bound college, in competition with city concert halls and large universities, cannot often boast the names of internationally-known performing artists. It was not surprising, then, that the Brooks-Rogers recital hall's audience last Tuesday night overflowed into the aisles for a concert by Christopher O'Riley, one of the nation's finest young pianists.

The program — featuring music of Schubert, Chopin, Scriabin, and Debussy — as well as Mr. O'Riley's success at major competitions promised one of the year's greatest concerts. Although some of his playing suffered from strident sound and a lack in depth of emotion and dynamic coloring, O'Riley satisfied the musical appetites of his audience with a nearly flawless technique. He has proved that he is a performer capable of both hair-raising virtuosity and subtle delicacy.

Opening his recital with Debussy's three Images, Book II, O'Riley achieved a startling balance in the first two pieces between the bell-like clarity of the melodic line and the sustained echoes beneath through a sensitive touch and use of the pedal. The third of this set, the virtuosic Poissons d'or, was playfully and crisply played, with a keen attention to the variety of sound textures.

Schubert's Sonata in D major, Op. 53 followed: those accustomed to hearing the sonatas played with greater equanimity were surprised to hear the pianist's stirring, if not wild, performance of the first movement. The larger sounds tended to be harsh and strident; his playing, almost frenzied, threatened to lose control in the coda. Still, the performance was dazzling overall, and the audience restrained their applause with difficulty in between movements

Lost identity

The second half of the program consisted of a series of encore pieces, played without interruption to form a continuous "movement." Unfortunately, some in the series of short showpieces lost their identity, yet Chopin's Mazurka in A minor and the Polonaise in F-sharp minor were truly memorable. Based on a traditional Polish dance form and raised to the height of a masterpiece, the Mazurka was performed with a sensitivity to dynamics and an awareness of the composer's voice through the haunting opening phrases. O'Riley's performance of the Polonaise captured the tension and drama of the opening chordal theme, as well as the broad splendor of the second dance-like melody.

Perhaps the pianist's finest playing of the evening, however, was in Scriabin's Sonata No.10, Op.70. Scriabin, often known as the "Russian Chopin," clearly departs from such an image in his later works, as in this last sonata, which reveals a restless romantic on his own path to modernism. O'Riley played the recurring trills and mysterious chromatic melodies of the piece with a clarity and a depth of feeling that rarely joined with such force in his other selections.

O'Riley closed his program with Chopin's Barcarolle. One of the most poular (and overplayed) of Chopin's concert pieces, it was faultlessly, but certainly not distinctively, performed. Like much of the music on the evening's program, it

Free University jitters through Winter Study

by Caroline Koeppel

Free beer and Free University are two of only a few things at Williams College for which a student will arrive early and wait in line. At the beginning of this month, hundreds of students filled Mission Park dining hall to register for Free University courses, offered only during Winter Study. The courses range in subject from Juggling to Jesus Christ.

Created five years ago by Jim Foley '84, Free University is organized this year by seniors Lisa Ferrari, Kate DeGroot, and Bruce Smith. DeGroot describes forming the committee as more of a "passing of the torch" among friends than anything else, though anyone interested is welcome to join. Steve Theodore '87 will organize next year's courses.

The committee starts compiling courses and recruiting instructors in October. DeGroot did not attribute the decrease in courses offered this year to a lack of interest. "Last year approximately fifty courses were submitted," she explained; "this year there were only about thirty-five due to two factors: more students are choosing to go abroad, and the attitude of the townspeople solicited to teach courses has changed. Many of them don't understand what Winter Study means for the students and are turned off by what appears to be a frivolous attitude among students. The result is an increase in student teachers.

Nevertheless, there is less interest in teaching and more in enrolling. "Students often over-enroll but are only able to attend a few courses," DeGroot said.

Popular courses

Jitterbugging, knitting, beer hack, and kayaking are some of the most popular courses. In Jitterbugging only twenty-five out of almost one hundred couples could be chosen due to space considerations; Currier Ballroom provides ample room and good acoustics. Having taken the class in a previous Winter Study period, Bill Leininger '86, an instructor, enjoys teaching the course. "Jitterbugging is really social and a fun way to dance," he noted. "It looks good and it's something you can take around with you; you can always learn new steps by watching others." Leininger also noted that, "holding hands," (mentioned in the catalog as a decaying skill at Williams), "adds to the fun of learning the dance."

A growing competitor to Jitterbugging, Zen and the Art of Beer Hack, is almost equally oversubscribed. The class primarily emphasizes the basic skills of hacky sack; beer hack is optional after the class has officially ended. Courses concerning beer or drinking are discouraged and must be submitted to Dean Fix for approval.

As far as the religion part of hacky sack is concerned, "Zen seems to have faltered the first few weeks," said Hollenberg, "but the course is still more popular than last year. We are hoping to continue through second semester. Beer hack is going to take over jitterbugging."

Marc MacDermott '89 takes the low road against his opponent in their match against Oneonta last week. (Radomisli)

Racquetmen squashed by Eli, defeat Big Green and Jumbos

During the past week, the Williams varsity squash team faced the toughest four days of their season. Starting midweek, the Ephmen faced three perennial top-ten teams with only one day of rest. Nevertheless, the squad showed its mettle, taking victories from Dartmouth and Tufts while falling only to the heavily favored Yale Bulldogs.

The deluge began on Wednesday as Williams traveled to Hanover, N.H. to play Dartmouth, ranked number nine last year in the country. Before the match, coach Sean Sloane had told his players, "the match will be 5-4 and can go either way." His words held true as Williams edged Dartmouth by one. Captain Doug Robie '86, playing number one, and Sam Fortenbaugh '86, playing two, both beat their opponents 3-0.

Keith Goldfeld '87 took a dispute-ridden contest 3-1 in what proved to be the pivotal match. Dave Applebaum '86 and freshman standout Lewis Fisher, playing sixth and seventh respectively, sealed the victory with convincing wins. Coach Sloane was very pleased at the result, citing the team's ability to play on the road. The coach also made special note of sophmore Wendell Chestnut's fine play.

Yale squashes Ephs

With a couple of days of rest to prepare themselves, the team hosted the highly touted Yale squad on Friday. The Bulldogs were just too much to handle as they handed the Ephmen their third defeat of the season. Matt McCall '87 and Lewis Fisher '89 both extended their opponents to five games, but that was the best any Ephman could do as Yale left Lasell Gym with a convincing 9-0 victory.

The squad was given no time to recover from this humbling experience. The very next day they traveled to Medford to do battle with the Tufts Jumbos. Coach Sloane was again expecting, "a very close match." And again he was on the mark as the Ephmen snatched a 6-3 victory over Tufts.

The team was buoyed by the return of sophmore Robert Hallagan from a sprained ankle; with his tender ankle heavily taped, Hallagan spear-headed the victory by crushing his opponent 3-0 despite severe pain. Matt McCall, Chestnut, Applebaum, and Fisher played very well in taking victories. Senior Sam Fortenbaugh did not have it so easy, staving off two match point in the fourth game before eeking out a close five-game victory. Coach Sloane was very pleased by his teams performance at Tufts as well as during the rest of the week. "The team had a very tough week but kept its composure and won some very tough matches."

The team's record now stands at 9-3. The Ephmen now have a few days of rest before they meet last years national champion Havard Crimson on Thursday in the Lasell squash courts.

Grapplers drop three

The wrestling team suffered three losses this week and face a tough schedule coming up, but several good performances indicate that there might be a brighter future for the squad.

This week the Ephs fell to nationally-ranked Buffalo St., to Oneonta St., and to Potsdam St. Coach Joe Dailey was not unhappy with the results, noting that the level of competition will decrease in the coming weeks as the team faces Massachusetts teams.

Junior Dan MacDonnell has led the team so far, as he has yet to lose a match. Dailey also noted the fine performances of juniors Jon Stanley and Mark Tompkins. He also pointed out the presence of several promising freshmen, most notably John Dillon, Mark McDermott, and Ben Pearlman.

On Saturday, the squad faces Trinity at Lasell Gym.

Men third; MacCauley, Davis go to NETAC

by Stewart Verdery

The men's track team continued to have difficulty in competing with more powerful squads last week, finishing third in a tri-meet against MIT and Tufts. Falling far behind after the field events, the Ephs could not narrow the gap during the running events, finishing in last place with 17 points. Tufts placed second with 50 and MIT won the meet with 87 points.

The main highlight of the match for the Ephs was Andre Lopez's '87 performance in the 400. His time of 50.21 not only took first, but set a Towne Field House record. John Servin '89 also won first in the 800 at 2:03.34 as the only other individual winner for the Ephs. However, the squad took both relays, the one mile in 3:33.00 and the two mile in 8:29.4.

Dan Root '87 finished second in the shot put at 40'9¼" to win the Ephs' only field events points. Runner-up status was also gained by Dave Nadelman '89 in a surprise performance in the 500 with a time of 1:08.90.

Coach Richard Farley said the results were somewhat expected as MIT has been the the strongest team in New England over the past few years and Tufts has had a strong squad as well. With people out due to Winter Study obligations and injuries, Farley was not dissapointed in the performances of those who competed. The men will hit the traek Friday night in a state school meet against Westfield, Fitchburg, and Worcester State at home at 6:00.

Women fare better

The women's squad fared better in their outings this past week. Two Ephs placed in the NETAC Invitational at Harvard last Sunday. Dawn MacCauley '89 set a school record in the 400 at 61.5 to place fifth and Joan Davis '88 ran to a fourth place finish in the 200.

In the Jumbo Invitational at Tufts on Saturday, Williams totaled 17 points to finish near the middle in the 18-school tourney. Competing with many Division I schools, the Ephs had three indivduals and three relay teams place. MacCauley took fifth in the 50 meter hurdles, Becky Conklin '87 set a school record at 5:01.6 in the 1500 and took sixth in the 800, and Jenny Garrett '89 landed fourth in the 5000 with a time of 18:42.42 to become the 6th Eph to qualify for the ECAC post-season tournement.

Coach Farley noted that the meet was "a worthwhile experience," as the less experienced Ephs were able to compete with the superior squads. The squad does not compete until Feb. 8 when it faces Amherst, Wesleyan and Trinity at home.

A Tufts pole vaulter goes over the bar in action last Friday in Towne Field House. The Ephs fell to the Jumbos and MIT in the meet. (Radomisli)

Swimmers sink Bears

The men's swimming team traveled to Bowdoin College on Saturday to challenge the Polar Bears in their home pool. Apparently the icy Maine water suited the Ephmen quite well, as they proceeded to rout Bowdoin 77-34. Meanwhile, the Ephwomen also crushed Bowdoin by a 85-52 count.

Eph coach Carl Samuelson attributed the weakness of the Polar Bear squad to illnesses suffered in training. Even though the Bowdoin pool is narrow and considered somewhat "slow," Ephs swimmers managed to show Samuelson some good times.

He was especially impressed with junior Chris Kirwan, who had a 2:04.08 in the 200 IM and finished with a 2:16.8 in the 200 Breast. Senior co-captain Bill Couch set a new pool record with his 4:46.7 mark in the 500 Free. This time qualifies him for the Nationals this March.

The win ups the Eph record to 4-1. They will travel to Springfield on Saturday to meet the Division I Maroons.

Ephwomen pull ahead

The women's team traveled to Bowdoin for a match with the Lady Bears which was supposed to be a relatively early one. But this one was neck and neck until the end. Two Ephwomen started early in the 200 Breast, disqualifying themselves and handing the event to the Lady Polar Bears.

Samuelson called the meet "very exciting," and he lauded senior Kathy Kirmayer for her winning times of 25.4 in the 50 Free and 55.3 for the 100, possibly qualifying her for the nationals. Other Eph NCAA qualifiers include juniors Lanianna Searfoss and Joan Horgan, and senior diver Emily Parker.

The Ephwomen's record now stands at 4-3 as they prepare to meet Springfield on Saturday, who they trounced 86-54 last year.

Hoopsters lose to Colby in Maine, get 7th, 8th wins in earlier games

by Cliff Peale

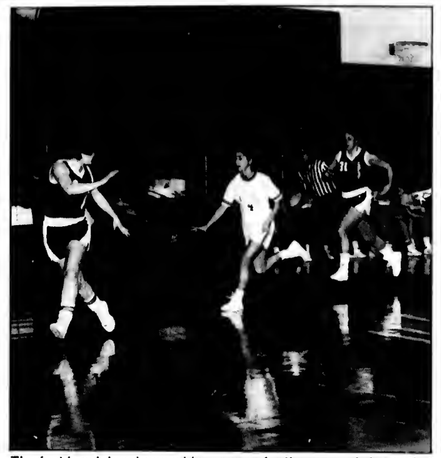
"This is a big weekend for our program." Basketball coach Harry Sheehy reflected optimism over his team's trip to Maine this weekend, in which it fell to Colby 85-80 on Friday before trouncing Bowdoin the next day by 72-58.

The importance of the weekend was clear after the team's 82-72 win on Tuesday over Middlebury. They had been ranked sixth in New England that morning and needed a good showing up north to hold that ranking.

The Bowdoin win on Saturday was an example of the Eph's inside power asserting itself. Brandt Johnson '87 led the Ephs by scoring 24 points, including 13-14 from the free throw line. It was the continuation of a fine season for the junior forward. "I'm really pleased for Brandt; he works so hard every game," said Sheehy. Co-captain Greg Lang '87 also enjoyed a great game, as he pulled down 10 rebounds to go with his seven points and did a great defensive job on Bowdoin's big men.

Senior point guard Tim Walsh followed up with 22 points on nine-for-15 shooting. This came after his sterling performance Friday night as he scored 28 points in the disappointing loss to Colby. Johnson scored 21 points in that game, and Sheehy also commended the play of freshmen Bill Melchionni and Mike Masters.

"I think the game was lost at the defensive end of the court," said Sheehy. After shooting out to a 37-29 halftime advantage, the Ephs fell into numerous defensive lapses, allowing Colby to beat them down the court in the transition game numerous times. Point guard Ernie Perry scored 20 points in the second half for Colby after being held in check before the intermission.



Rebounding was also a problem for the Ephs, as they were clearly beaten on the backboards. Lang was injured early in the second half, hampering his play for the remainder of the game. "We just didn't show defensive intensity in the second half," lamented Sheehy. " The tempo got away from us a little bit."

The split in Maine set the team's record at 8-6, but more importantly, the Division III record is 8-4. Last year the team failed to make the ECAC playoffs (after playing the top eight seeds), but big wins over Trinity, Norwich, and Amherst this year make the first bid since 1979 much more probable if the team keeps playing well. Sheehy remains cautious: "This team can do it, but we can also lose a lot more games."

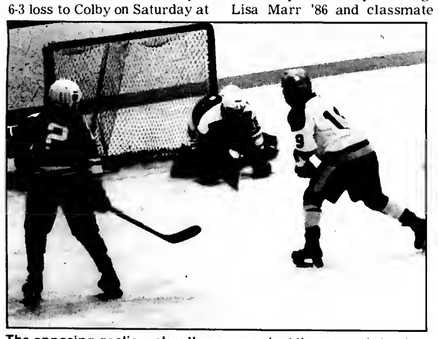
If the team is to do it, wins like the one over Middlebury last Tuesday night are essential. After trailing by two at the half, the Ephs went ahead with about 10 minutes to go and rolled to the 82-72 final. "It was nip-and-tuck for a while, but our guys kept their heads and played a good second half."

Walsh again led the team with 22 points, while John Ciulla '87 had 21 and Johnson scored 19.

The team returns to Lasell Gym to play Brandeis tonight before taking on Little Three rival Wesleyan, ranked fourth in New England, on Saturday.

The fast break has been a big weapon for the women's basketball team this year, and sophomore point guard Kim Hatch shows her teammates how it's done. (Mead)

Ephwomen fall to Colby by 6-3



The women's hockey team lost two games this week, a 3-1 defeat to UConn followed by a 6-3 loss to Colby on Saturday at Lansing Chapman Rink.

In the Colby game, Haley Clifford '87 opened the Eph scoring. Lisa Marr '86 and classmate and co-captain Beth Ebel followed with goals to set the Williams scoring for the day. Co-captain Sue Klein '86 said that the game was a very physical and frustrating one. "They were rough out there," she said. "We outskated them but we just couldn't get the puck into the net. We couldn't buy a goal."

Daisy Hagey '88 again enjoyed a fine performanee in goal. Kirsten Rooks '87, about to leave for the semester, skated well, as did Kirsten Neuse '89 filling in on the first line.

The loss to Colby should probably be seen in a positive light, eonsidering that the same squad had beaten the Ephwomen 7-1 earlier in the season.

The team faees two away games this week, at Skidmore and Wesleyan.

The opposing goalie makes the save against the women's hockey team as Kirsten Neuse '89 looks for the rebound. (Albright)

Squash takes Bowdoin, trounces Wellesley 7-2

by Al Mottur

Running its record to 4-2, the women's squash team routed both Wellesley and Bowdoin last Saturday in its only action of the week. Both matches occured at Wellesley and were part of a round-robin matching the three teams. Bowdoin took second in the meet, edging Wellesley 5-4.

The Ephwomen first faced Bowdoin, dispatching them easily by a score of 9-0. Senior and number two player Caroline Cento said that "We didn't know what to expect. But we were definitely the better team." Captain Laura Rogers '86 echoed her teammate's sentiment: "We are looking better and better each match, and we simply walked all over them."

In the team's next game, it faced a similarly inferior Wellesley squad, defeating them 7-2. Rogers said that Wellesley was "slightly better than Bowdoin but still worse than us."

The team will take its modest two game winning streak to the eourts tomorrow for a home match against Vassar at 7:30. Rogers said that Vassar "should probably be a relatively easy match because we beat them rather handily last year and they probably didn't get any big recruits."

Looking ahead to the rest of the season Rogers expressed optimism. She said the team's goal for the year is to "do well at the Can-Ams." They will take place next week at Vassar and will field six squash teams: Vassar, Dartmouth, Williams, and three Canadian squads. Said Rogers, "We lost to Dartmouth earlier but we've improved a great deal since then. The match is what we've been striving for all season, and we have a good shot to do really well."

Lady cagers lose twice, junior Schmutz injured

by Al Mottur and Mark Via

The women's basketball team dropped its seventh straight game on Saturday as it fell to Division III power Colby by a 77-41 score. Earlier in the week they had lost their captain, junior Anne Schmutz, to a serious injury.

Playing a slow-tempo game, the Ephwomen kept it elose for the first eight minutes of the game, trailing only by two at 11-9. But Colby started forcing the ball inside, taking advantage of its height advantage. They went on an 18-2 scoring spree, running Williams right out of the game. The score at the half was 37-17 Colby.

The second half was like a mirror image of the first, with both teams trading baskets for the first ten minutes as Colby maintained a 57-37 lead. But the Ephwomen went cold, and the Mules outscored them 18-0 during an eight-minute spurt, for all practical purposes ending the contest. Williams was paced by freshman Missy Crouchley's 16 points and classmate Nancy Hedeman's ten points and nine rebounds.

On Thursday, the squad lost to North Adams State by a 64-55 count. The contest was a close one until there were about five minutes remaining, when three quiek layups put North Adams up by ten. From then on, the Mohawk lead seesawed between a three and seven point margin.

The game was dominated by Williams' now healthy and fired up Hedeman, who contributed one of her best efforts of the season. She poured in 22 points and pulled down 12 rebounds, as well as blocking two shots. Sophomore point guard Kim Hatch was effective as well, directing traffle while eonnecting for eight points.

On Tuesday, the Ephwomen fell to Union by 53-39. They suffered a major blow as eaptain Schmutz went down in the first half. Hedeman scored 11 to lead the Ephwoman seoring attack, followed by sophomore guard Joyce Rogers with nine.

The two losses drop the team's record to 1-8. Their next eontest will be tomorrow night at Lasell Gym against Vassar.

Hockey loses to Colby, Bowdoin, NE

by Rick Orluk

The men's hockey team experieneed a very tough week, struggling through losses to New England College, Colby, and Bowdoin. The losses drop the Ephs' reeord to 2-10-2 on the season.

Against New England College on Monday night before a large home crowd. Williams turned in a good offensive showing but on the defensive end of the ice, the Ephs were plagued by defensive lapses and poor goaltending. Senior goaltender Marty Collins was not on the top of his game as he allowed several cheap goals.

To open the game, New England exploded for two goals in the first 33 seconds of the game. By the end of the first period, Williams had narrowed the margin to 4-3, but the Pilgrims opened the second period with three unanswered goals to take a eommanding 7-3 lead on their way to an eventual 11-8 win.

Eph coach Bill McCormick noted, "Anytime you score eight goals, it should be enough to win." Offensive standouts for Williams were freshman Chris Conway, who netted two goals and got credit for two assists, and junior forward Chris Traggio, who added two goals. Single goals were scored by junior defenseman John Booth, junior forward Guy Kurtz, freshman defenseman Tim Freehette, and freshman forward Mike Swenson.

2 losses up north

On Friday evening, the Ephs traveled to Waterville, Maine and were shut out by the Mules of Colby 3-0. And on Saturday, Williams faced a good Bowdoin squad which toppled the Ephs by a score of 11-1. Williams was plagued by 18 penalties, 16 minor penalties and two 10-minute misconduets. Playing down at least a man most of the game, Williams allowed six power-play goals. Williams' lone goal was scored by senior Joe Sciaeea, and it, too, was during a Bowdoin power-play.

So far this season the Ephs have been hurt by injuries to several key players. Currently, seniors Chris Pappas, Scott Karmozyn, and junior Mike O'Connell are still injured and have been out for most of the season. Senior Joe Sciaeea just returned to action, but during Saturday's game at Bowdoin the Ephs lost defensemen John Booth and Erik Knutzen with separated shoulders.

Coach McCormiek observed, "We are missing some very key people due to injuries, and against teams such as Colby and Bowdoin in their home rinks, it is important to feel the presenee of your older, more experienced players."

Williams next faces Division I Army away on January 28th and then on February 1st, the Ephs play host to arch-rival Amherst College.

Theme house approved for '86-87

by Tom Ewing

Next year, a small group of upperclassmen sharing a common intellectual interest may be able to live together in a theme house. The theme house, proposed by the Gaudino Committee, would take over one of the College's co-ops, traditionally residences for groups of seniors chosen in a random process.

The theme for next year's house will be selected by a committee of students, faculty and administration from the Dean's Office, who will choose a theme from those submitted by students.

Kurt Tauber, chairman of the Gaudino Committee, announced the new policy last week in a letter. According to the letter, "The Theme House will serve as a center for conversation, inquiry and activity related to the chosen topic for both the house members and the Williams community."

The members thus have an obligation, according to the letter, to organize events and lectures, concerning their particular interest, that will involve the Williams community.

Is this a co-op? Guess again. If the theme house proposed by the Gaudino Committee becomes a reality, there will only be five co-ops left.

Greater interaction

According to Tauber, the proposal would allow students who have a common intellectual interest greater opportunity for interaction and communication. As examples of such interests, the letter suggested artificial intelligence, 17th Century England or environmental protection. Tauber mentioned language houses as a possibility, but said purely social or non-intellectual groupings would not be acceptable.

Gaudino Committee member Ed Stein '87, who is applying for the program, said the goal of the theme houses is to enliven intellectual debate on campus, with the hopes that the whole campus will benefit.

The procedure for choosing a theme house next year is still not definite. Tauber said a committee of faculty and students from the Gaudino Committee, as well as representatives from the Dean's Office will review the applications and choose one for next year.

Tauber said the decision will be based on the quality of the theme and the quality of the students applying. The students who apply, he said, must be genuinely interested and committed to the theme they are proposing. The themes will be evaluated partly on the basis of ideas generated to spread the themes to the rest of campus.

Only one

During 1986-87, there will be only one theme house, according to Assistant Dean William Darrow. The choice of which co-op will become the theme house will be based on the number of people involved in the theme house, which can range from

Lewis gauges Manila mood before election

by John Canty

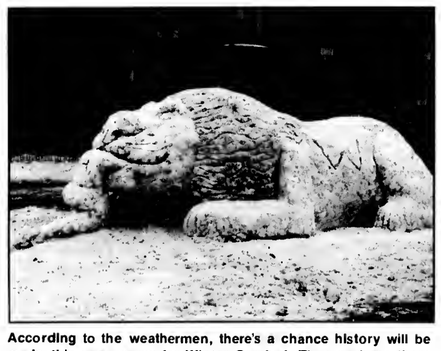
The future of the Phillipines "will turn heavily upon the resolution of the current elections" held there last Friday, according to Economics Department Chairman Stephen Lewis.

As of Sunday, vote-counting in the Phillipines' presidential election had slowed amid reports of fraud. The New York Times reported that forces supporting President Ferdinand Marcos had stolen ballot boxes and attacked U.S. observers. Opposition candidate Corazon Aquino was ahead in the preliminary vote, according to the story.

Lewis travel in the Phillipines from Jan. 19 to 28 as part of a project funded by the Asia Society, a non-profit organization based in New York. In a statement released Jan. 31, the Society announced that the mission's purpose was to analyze "medium and long-term issues in the Phillipines and in U.S.-Phillipine relations." The team's report, written by ten Americans selected, will be released in March.

The team members devoted their time to visiting the three provinces of Mindanao, Negros and Cebu, with a long period spent in the capital city of Manila. They also divided into groups to observe conditions in the cities and in the rural areas.

Lewis said the Americans met with officials of the government of President Ferdinand Marcos, business leaders, opposition figures and civilian representatives for the communist New People's Army.



'Awful shape'

Lewis said, "The situation appears pretty clear. The economy is in awful shape." He attributed the Phillipines' economic problems partly to external factors: large foreign debts and falling prices for the commodities upon which the country relies.

However, Lewis also said the corrupt practices of the Marcos government threaten national development, as well as the government's bad planning in borrowing and building programs.

Along with waste of resources, internal corruption has helped to stagnate the Phillipines' economic growth, Lewis said. "Mismanagement and cronyism have been on such a scale that it has an effect," Lewis said. "It's eroding their whole future."

Vt. legal age to hit 21 in July

by Debbie Snyder

Vermont Governor Madeline M. Kunin signed legislation into law last Friday raising the state drinking-age from 18 to 21. On Wednesday, the Vermont House passed the bill 77-69 after the State Senate had already approved the bill 16-14 the previous Friday.

The law, which will go into effect July 1, 1986, includes a grandfather clause that allows those who turn 18 before that date to continue to buy and consume alcohol.

Kunin strongly supported the bill in her State of the State Address in January. She said she believes, because Vermont was the only state in New England without a legal drinking age of 21, it was becoming a barroom for 18- to 20-year-olds from neighboring states.

Officials from other New England states supported raising the drinking age because they said they hope it will reduce alcohol-related car accidents. David McCarthy, police chief of Greenfield, Mass., held a press conference at the Vermont Statehouse on Jan. 28, after two teenagers from Greenfield were killed in a suspected drunken-driving accident as they were coming back from Vermont. McCarthy said, "The laws of ... Vermont are starting to kill the children of Massachusetts."

Because of the grandfather clause, the higher drinking age should not immediately affect bars and liquor stores, according to Stephen Hooks, manager of the Next Door Store in Pownal, Vt. Hooks, who estimates that 90 percent of his customers come from Massachusetts, said he expects an increase in business even after the grandfather clause expires because, "Kids that can't go into bars will get someone else to buy liquor for them."

More grads want jobs now, OCC says

by John Faust

More than half of the class of 1985 went directly to work, many in business-related fields, according to data released by the Office of Career Counseling. The number of students going straight to work, 66 percent, represents a significant increase over last year, according to Fatma Kassamali, director of the OCC.

Enrollment in graduate schools also increased, but only slightly, claiming 18.7 percent of the class. Medical school proved the most popular choice for graduates going directly to graduate school. Business claimed the highest overall percentage of graduates, 33.6 percent, according to the statistics.

Kassamali said graduates showed a particular interest in advertising and communications, adding that there was more interest than existing positions in those fields. "That's not where the jobs are," Kassamali said.

Education

Almost 13 percent of the graduates went into education. OCC Resources Coordinator Kathleen Case said some of the increases in this category and in the working category overall, might have resulted from graduates who had gotten jobs during the extra two months during which data was taken this year. The statistics were collected in January this year but in November last year.

Medicine, arts and sciences and law topped the list of graduate school choices. Though percentages declined from last year in all these individual categories, graduate school as a whole gained two-tenths of a percent over last year, Kassamali said.

Case said significant change is rarely noted from year to year and trends become apparent after a minimum of five years. Over the last five years, Williams enrollment in graduate schools has declined, but Case said she believes this year's figures show a leveling off of that decline.

Last year's graduates continued to favor English, history and economics majors, according to information from the Registrar's office. The trend did not follow into graduate school, however. "They (graduates) are really spread over all the better American universities," Case said.

Theme house approved for '86-87

by Tom Ewing

Next year, a small group of upperclassmen sharing a common intellectual interest may be able to live together in a theme house. The theme house, proposed by the Gaudino Committee, would take over one of the College's co-ops, traditionally residences for groups of seniors chosen in a random process.

The theme for next year's house will be selected by a committee of students, faculty and administration from the Dean's Office, who will choose a theme from those submitted by students.

Kurt Tauber, chairman of the Gaudino Committee, announced the new policy last week in a letter. According to the letter, "The Theme House will serve as a center for conversation, inquiry and activity related to the chosen topic for both the house members and the Williams community."

The members thus have an obligation, according to the letter, to organize events and lectures, concerning their particular interest, that will involve the Williams community.

Is this a co-op? Guess again. If the theme house proposed by the Gaudino Committee becomes a reality, there will only be five co-ops left.

Greater interaction

According to Tauber, the proposal would allow students who have a common intellectual interest greater opportunity for interaction and communication. As examples of such interests, the letter suggested artificial intelligence, 17th Century England or environmental protection. Tauber mentioned language houses as a possibility, but said purely social or non-intellectual groupings would not be acceptable.

Gaudino Committee member Ed Stein '87, who is applying for the program, said the goal of the theme houses is to enliven intellectual debate on campus, with the hopes that the whole campus will benefit.

The procedure for choosing a theme house next year is still not definite. Tauber said a committee of faculty and students from the Gaudino Committee, as well as representatives from the Dean's Office will review the applications and choose one for next year.

Tauber said the decision will be based on the quality of the theme and the quality of the students applying. The students who apply, he said, must be genuinely interested and committed to the theme they are proposing.The themes will be evaluated partly on the basis of ideas generated to spread the themes to the rest of campus.

Only one

During 1986-87, there will be only one theme house, according to Assistant Dean William Darrow. The choice of which co-op will become the theme house will be based on the number of people involved in the theme house, which can range from

Lewis gauges Manila mood before election

by John Canty

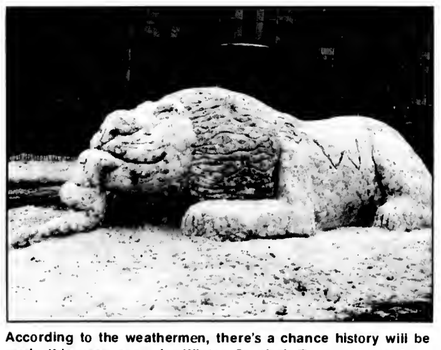
The future of the Phillipines "will turn heavily upon the resolution of the current elections" held there last Friday, according to Economics Department Chairman Stephen Lewis.

As of Sunday, vote-counting in the Phillipines' presidential election had slowed amid reports of fraud. The New York Times reported that forces supporting President Ferdinand Marcos had stolen ballot boxes and attacked U.S. observers. Opposition candidate Corazon Aquino was ahead in the preliminary vote, according to the story.

Lewis travel in the Phillipines from Jan. 19 to 28 as part of a project funded by the Asia Society, a non-profit organization based in New York. In a statement released Jan. 31, the Society announced that the mission's purpose was to analyze "medium and long-term issues in the Phillipines and in U.S.-Phillipine relations." The team's report, written by ten Americans selected, will be released in March.

The team members devoted their time to visiting the three provinces of Mindanao, Negros and Cebu, with a long period spent in the capital city of Manila. They also divided into groups to observe conditions in the cities and in the rural areas.

Lewis said the Americans met with officials of the government of President Ferdinand Marcos, business leaders, opposition figures and civilian representatives for the communist New People's Army.



'Awful shape'

Lewis said, "The situation appears pretty clear. The economy is in awful shape." He attributed the Phillipines' economic problems partly to external factors: large foreign debts and falling prices for the commodities upon which the country relies.

However, Lewis also said the corrupt practices of the Marcos government threaten national development, as well as the government's bad planning in borrowing and building programs.

Along with waste of resources, internal corruption has helped to stagnate the Phillipines' economic growth, Lewis said. "Mismanagement and cronyism have been on such a scale that it has an effect," Lewis said. "It's eroding their whole future."

Vt. legal age to hit 21 in July

Vermont Governor Madeline M. Kunin signed legislation into law last Friday raising the state drinking-age from 18 to 21. On Wednesday, the Vermont House passed the bill 77-69 after the State Senate had already approved the bill 16-14 the previous Friday.

The law, which will go into effect July 1, 1986, includes a grandfather clause that allows those who turn 18 before that date to continue to buy and consume alcohol.

Gaudino bypasses students

The Gaudino Committee has advocated and the Deans have approved a proposal that one co-op house be designated as a "theme house" next year. To the student body this has to be accepted as a fait accompli.

A significant change in the housing system demands serious discussion with the student body. A theme house would remove from the random selection process one of the six co-ops, a housing alternative consistently in high demand by seniors. Theme houses may very well become a factor discouraging intellectual discussion by isolating those interested in a topic in a corner of the campus. Furthermore, this proposal could perpetuate cliques and reduce everday interaction between diverse groups of students.

These and other reservations may prove to be unfounded, but at least they deserve student attention. The Gaudino Committee, which aims to enlarge and enrich intellectual life at Williams, did not adequately consult the student body. At the committee's inception last year, Gaudino Scholar Kurt Tauber hand-picked the original nine student members. Since then student selection has been handled solely within the committee. The only students specifically consulted on the theme house idea were those involved in the short-lived French House of several years ago. Although the committee sponsored an open meeting one evening last spring, only a handful of students attended, hardly enough to present a general student opinion.

Regardless of the prospective merits and problems of the theme house idea, however, the student body should have been consulted before the proposal was enacted. It is incumbent upon the committee members to solicit a wide range of student opinion and to test the waters by publicizing their proposals before requesting approval from the Deans. Gaudino Committee members should not be able to dictate programs without extensive discussion with students.

Division III

To the Editor:

I wish to clarify a number of points raised in the editorial, An Unbalanced Proposal, in the January 28th Record. It was never the intention of the Chemistry Department to modify single-handedly the College's distribution requirement. The issue has been discussed in all the science departments and a working paper summarizing the views of the Chemistry Department was submitted to the Science Executive Committee to facilitate further discussion. Any proposal for change in the Division III part of the requirement must naturally have the support of all the science departments. This discussion is in a very preliminary stage.

In 1968, when the College moved to the current "4-1-4" curriculum, with two semester courses (down from four) required from each division for 12-week rather than the 15-week semesters, the distribution requirement was reduced to about 40% of what it was prior to 1968. There is some concern that this reduction no longer ensures that a graduate of the College will be liberally educated.

Any proposal to increase the distribution requirement to three semesters would, of course, extend to all three divisions, i.e., three semester courses would be required in each division. It is clear that a very wide spectrum of subject material and pedagogic approaches is covered in the departments within the three academic divisions. Perhaps expansion to three courses is needed to make certain that each student is exposed to this rich curricular variety.

The science faculty have discussed what distinguishes intellectual pursuit in sciences from that in other areas. It has been generally agreed that an important difference is our ability to perform reproducible experiments, to control external parameters and to base our conclusions upon these empirical results. This led to the suggestion that some form of laboratory study or field work might be an essential part of the Division III distribution requirement.

The editorial suggests that in order to satisfy their distribution requirement, students should select the science courses that are part of the major sequence in these departments. Students are free to do this. And some of the science courses currently described as being for non-majors (or non-sequential) should be of interest to science majors.

But there is a significant difference in the goals of these two types of courses. The present non-sequential courses are designed to offer a broad, rather descriptive perspective of important scientific concepts, often with referenee tocurrent issues in society.

Majors from our science departments have always gone on to the nation's finest graduate schools in disproportionately large numbers. To prepare these students for further study in the changing fields of science, we need to offer a series of rigorous, cumulative courses, covering conceptual details important to their complete understanding of the material, but not essential to the person not going on in the sciences.

Finally, the editorial noted that the science departments should offer more attractive courses to those not interested in majoring in these areas. I would point out that Chemistry 117, Consumable Chemicals, taught by Professor John Burke, appeared to be attractive to 132 students last semester. The science faculty do make every effort to present interesting courses.

Equality

To the Editor:

In my opinion, the headlines of the sports seetion of the Record sexually discriminate against women. For example, in the January 28 issue I read: "Hockey loses to Colby, Bowdoin, NE." My reaetion was: "We did not." Hockey did not lose to Colby, Bowdoin, and New England, Men's hockey lost to Colby, Bowdoin and New England. Women's hockey never even played Bowdoin or New England, though we did lose to Colby.

Likewise, the "Hoopsters" did not get their "7th, 8th wins in earlier games." Men's hoopster's got their seventh and eighth wins, as well as a loss to Colby. Women's hoopsters lost to Colby and North Adams.

The way the headlines read now is very condescending to women's athletes. In sports that have both men's and women's teams, the headlines should specifically state Men's or Women's.

Occasionally , as a kind of joke, the headlines are reversed to read "Hockey" and "Ephmen" or "Squash" and "Raquetmen," but that is even worse than simply condescending, it is insulting and childish.

The women athletes at Williams work just as hard as the men, and deserve to be treated with more respect by the Record. I realize that headlines must fit into the space allotted to the artiele, but if the headlines for women's sports can include "Women," "Ephwomen," or "Lady——," than the headlines for men's sports can include "Men," "Ephmen," etc.

I'm not asking for a reversal of headlines, I'm demanding equal representation as a female athlete at Williams College! I hope this problem will be corrected.

Why make unnecessary and harmful curriculum changes?

by Charles P. Goodwin

Back home over the last break, I saw a commercial on television for a certain university in Boston, which was trying to sell itself on the principle that it provided "An Education that Works." That is, its departments are pre-professional and involve a Co-op program. The students are not only prepared for the career market, but are excellent candidates for their desired job.

There has been, in the Record's reports of the recent curriculum review, a certain tone that seems to mimic this. The people involved seem to be enraptured by increasing the focus of the Williams education, by centering us more upon certain disciplines, by a desire to increment the academic requirements of the college. This is unfortunate.

While one respects the devotion Williams professors give to their fields, while one must admire the dedication with which many professors attempt to tansfuse this dedication to us, the idea of expanding the major is a questionable one.

First, the purpose of a liberal arts education is more to endow the student with the capacity and a taste for life than with a particular expertise. Life is a tumultuous experience, a chaos of beauty and pain which will confront us repeatedly with the unimagineable. No specialized body of knowledge can prepare one for this.

Flexibility, insight and a strong sense of analysis are required. These are learned through a broad, vigorous education that is as much of a single discipline as of the expansive skills involved in creation and understanding.

To ask one to become cloistered within a particular field before he has been declared "legal" by the state is a mistake to which Williams should not subscribe. To expand the major is to demand that the student devote himself with great ardor to a field that may only be a passing fancy.

At nine courses, a student can still develop himself in other fields if he is unsatisfied with his major. At twelve of fifteen courses, this changes. One should not be choosing a particular course of life at the age of twenty for one will undergo intense growth within the next five (not to mention thirty) years.

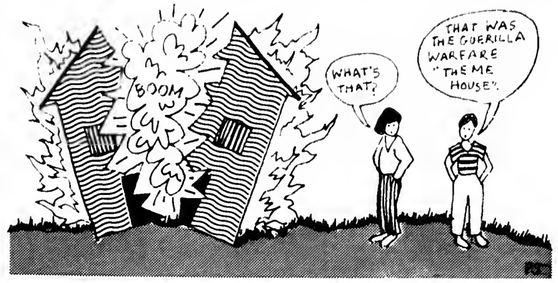
If the major is expanded, a great strain will be placed on many departments which do not have the resources to maintain an enlarged major. This will lead to an increase in the teaching load of an already overworked faculty or to an increase in the size of the faculty needed to maintain any given department.

Neither of these alternatives are desirable. The second alternative is especially so since it will actually lead to a reduction in the overall number of degree granting departments as more faculty must be added to the "big four" departments at the expense of the smaller departments.

There is no need to ereate seperate majors, one for students who plan to continue learning in a graduate program and one for those who do not. Any department that needs to do this should simply do what the Chemistry department currently does: specify a program of courses that students interested in continued education should take. To ereate two majors within a department will inevitably lead to more favor being given to those who plan to continue since they will be considered to be the "serious" students. Again, one senses that pressure to determine the course of one's life during the sophomore year.

The profound absence of tiresome, annoying and petty academic requirements is an overlooked but strong selling point for the college in the market of college admissions. As I remember, Williams was second to Brown in academic freedom among the colleges at which I looked. The academic freedom makes up for some of the distance between Williams and a real city.

Before adding to the curriculum in general, before creating a common or core curriculum, Williams would do better by enhancing existing courses, by fortifying the interdisciplinary programs, and by reinforcing the idea of the liberal arts within all departments.



Sure this is difficult, sure this takes more effort, but wouldn't it be worth it to have an auditorium filled with enthusiastic students, as opposed to a roomful of grim faces knowing that they have to meet another supposedly inane requirement. Both the students and the faculty would benefit instead of suffering through a course that few want to take and few will want to teach. It is easier to get a child to eat his vegetables by convincing him that they are tasty than by threatening to withhold his dessert.

Lastly, it is quite possible to bring forth the liberal arts within any discipline. The liberal arts are a method of inquiry and a basis for life, not a set of two thousand year old books. They are a method of inquiry that is as valid for physics as for literature, a method that involves the constant questioning of both the general understanding and of even the most basic assumptions.

A mistrust of the student seems to be present in the current curricular evaluation. A low but pronounced tone seems to be whispering that Williams students do not live up to their end of the bargain, that students deliberately shirk the responsibility of their education, that we, the students, no longer care for our education or for any challenge. I suppose it is true that some students do not take advantage of all that is presented to them, but that is their loss. This is the only time that any of us are going to be in college; and, for many, this is the last chance to learn within the classroom. Very few would waste this opportunity. If the faculty wish the students to give more, perhaps it would be best to ask for more. Do not the most demanding courses bring forth the best effort?

Before dramatically altering the Williams education, find out just what the problem is. In fact, stop assuming that something is wrong. Look first at how much we have and then see how that can be added to without ramming reform down the throats of students.

Caution must be exercised. The college's curriculum is too precious to be altered to fit the latest fad or a passing whim. Maybe, it is time that we all — students, faculty, administration alike — look around the classroom and see that just maybe something wonderful is happening now.

Theme Houses will hamper real intellectual interaction

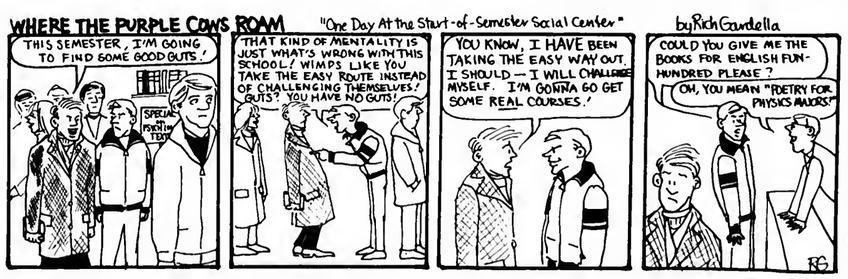
by Paul J. Mahoney

It was with considerable disappointment that I read about the Gaudino Committee's proposal to have "Theme Houses" as an option for next year.

I have to wonder about the direction this is taking us, leading to two main areas of objection. The first is to question whether this truly serves the purpose of the Gaudino Committee: to promote intellectual development and exchange. Does "intellectual" imply sitting in seclusion, holding small intimate discussions of obscure subjects limited only to those who have the time to go out and track it down? I think not, but in light of many realities on the Williams campus, I think that this proposal begs for that definition.

The community, although small, is a complex weave of the academic, social, athletic and political concerns of its members. If we believe the admissions material, we are scholar/athletes, scholar/artists or scholar/"something elses". To remove students, even voluntarily, (and, I suspect, gladly), from this matrix in order to devote themselves, (more or less), for an entire year seems to cut away at the scope of the entire community. We already decry the relentless Grade Point Average pursuit that causes so many of us to hear the closing announcement in the library and to fret over that endless stream of anagrams: LSAT, MCAT, GMAT, GRE, FSE, (etc.).

This program seems to go in exactly the wrong direction. It is a retreat from intellectual life, putting it off where it cannot be an active part of our daily operations. It has always been remarkable to me that we have such a wide range of interests in our already intimate housing arrangements. If I come across something that needs explanation, I can usually find someone next door who can help. Or, believe it or not, intellectual discussions sometimes take place between commercials on "Cheers". But where is that exchange, so wonderfully informal, once we start excusing people from this main body? It becomes a chore.



The proposed system will make intellectual life rigid and formalistic, which is antithetical to the spontaneous and relaxed atmosphere in which intellectualism really does exist at Williams. Perhaps the depths of critical theory are not sounded fully in the snack bar, but how much will we all gain if we have to pull on the snowboots and gloves every time the matter of artificial intelligence comes to mind?

I believe that the end result will not benefit the College any more than would proper reallocation of the same resources. We already have many programs that allow for a wide-range of intellectual options, from honors majors to 99's and Independent Study and good ol'Winter Study, plus research with faculty, a Lecture Committee, and the incredible ease with which even a small club can get College Council funding for a matter of particular interest. I also recall that the Residential Housing System was also designed to support readings, films and discussions. Most of the student body lives within that system, whereas only a handful can live in a co-op.

My other objections include the violence being done to the residential system by removing one or more co-ops from the pool, and by setting these new parameters for having access to them. In addition, in this year in which we are closely examining the social life at Williams, I see a wedge being driven between the spheres of learning and living. A Williams student is unlikely to say, "I've had two seminars, an hour exam, my colloquium, and a twenty-page paper today. I think I'll go down to Hoxsey Street and wrestle with the Hegelian dialectic." And that has nothing to do with not having an intellectual turn of mind...

In short, I have to protest potentially turning "intellectual" into a perjorative term. We are a liberal school; our collective learning is broad-based and varied. Particular pursuits are secondary and left to the individual. We are a school of miniscule departments with just a few majors in each. How can we afford to remove entire strains of thinking from the main body into the eloistered confines of one house? It must be cloistered, or I doubt the theoretical purpose would be achieved anyway. It is unfair to those who seek a wide-range of informal and accessible intellectual interests.

Intellectual life is not a seperate realm, and it's segregation from the living conditions of the "mainstream" can only lead it to be. Williams College is not a think-tank. It is more of a process of education. Those people who want to live off by themselves in a limited environment have missed the entire point of our learning experience. The pursuit of intellectualism here is exemplified in those professor-student conferences that start as "add/drop" questions but become half-hour journeys into knowledge. Intellectual life is not a perogative of the few, especially not here at Williams, and to think otherwise may be insulting. I ask the Gaudino Committee to look to the many, not the few, and to put our energies to use for every Williams student, not just to those who wish, in fact, to limit themselves.

Kline: love, sex and honesty

by John Faust

According to author and lecturer Nancy Kline, all of the world's problems can be reduced to the idea that men should not touch each other. The stereotypes and prejudices behind such a restriction, she said, are responsible for tensions in the world as well as in individual lives.

Kline addressed these concerns in her talk, "Love, Sex and the Relationship You've Always Wanted," last Thursday to a standing room only crowd in Brooks-Rodgers Recital Hall.

"Almost all of the policies of the governments of the world are built around blaming someone else when things go wrong and looking out for the enemy that's about to invade," Kline said, adding that the real enemy is our inability to love ourselves.

Our reluctance to admit we are good, she said, is a self-doubt, which leads to doubting others, and hence, to global misunderstanding.

Jokes, rejection and stereotypes, Kline said, force us to reject meaningful relationships and keep us from loving ourselves. "One of the most finely polished social skills is the put-down," she said, explaining that she feels put-downs are responsible for the negative self-image many people have.

'Sex ... distorted'

According to Kline, "Sex has been badly distorted as the only way to make a connection with another human being. It has emerged as something which is focused on most, talked about least." Kline said she believes social pressures have made honest exchange difficult for most people.

Kline told the students in the audience she knew that they had come to Williams with certain goals in mind and are working to reach them.

"You're working hard for you and your parents and whoever else is out there telling you what to do," she said, adding that getting into the right institution seems very important. But, she went on, "In looking back, it is the special moment when you and someone else made a meaningful, honest connection that made it all worth it."

Kline encouraged the audience to seek out honest, sincere relationships and to work through the fears that she said will naturally surface. Doing so will create rather than use time, Kline said. "The challenge is to do it here," she said. "You don't have to add one thing to your busy lives."

The event was sponsored by the Deans' Office, the Chaplain's Office, Williams Disarmament Forum, Feminist Alliance and the Lecture Committee.

Grants

Three Williams professors have received grants from the Research Corporation to continue basic research at the College. Assistant Professors of Biology Marsha Altschuler and Mlehael Lynes and Assistant Professor of Physics Kevin Jones '77 received grants totaling $38,700.

Altschuler received a $17,000 grant to study DNA processing in in the ciliated protozoan tetrahymena thermophilia, an organism possessing two nuelei, one for genctie-hereditary fuctions and the other for day-to-day regulatory purposes. Altschuler's work will use genetic and molecular biological techniques to study the cell's regulated processes during sexual reproduction.

Jones has received $13,700 for laser spectroseopic experiments on highly excited states of the sodium molecule. He will use the laser to excite electrons of the sodium atoms into orbits away from the nucleus of the atom, and then study how each eleetron contributes to the molecular bonds.

Jones will use a laser system, to be installed later this month, funded by the National Science Foundation.

Lynes will use his $8,000 to map the surface of lymphocyte cells, the main type of cell in the body's immunologieal system. Lynes said, "(Lymphocytes) seem to depend on molecules found on their surfaces for specific function. If these molecules are absent or in the wrong place, cell function may be lost, and disease may result."

Oxfam

On Thursday, Feb. 20, the Williams Hunger Action Project will sponsor a campus-wide fast as part of Oxfam America's annual "Fast for a World Harvest" program.

Aecording to Jennifer Mead '86, a member of WHAP, the fast is not being held simply to make students experienee hunger but to raise students' awareness of worldwide hunger and poverty.

Students who wish to fast may sign up ahead of time in Baxter Hall beginning this week and continuing into early next week. Those who sign up agree not to eat in the dining halls on the day of the fast.

The money saved will be sent directly to Oxfam America to be used in its relief and development programs overseas and in educational programs within the United States.

This year WHAP is making a broader appeal to faculty, staff and off-campus students to join in the fast, Mead said. Last year about one-third of the student body fasted, raising more than $2000.

Astronaut

Mary Cleave, an astronaut who flew on a spaee shuttle mission last fall, will not speak at Williams next week as planned.

Astronomy Professor Jay Paseaehoff said he received a phone eall from the National Aeronauties and Space Administration's astronaut office, telling him that all astronaut appearances have been cancelled until further notice.

Cleave had been scheduled to talk at Williams as part of Pas-eaehoff's class Astronomy 334, "Exploration of the Universe," in which manned and unmanned spaee flight are discussed.

The joys and pains of alumni life

by Corinna Lamb

9:30 p.m. Boston. Steve Haggett is falling asleep in front of the television set as "Cheers" ends. No surprise, since he woke up at 6 a.m. to go to his job as financial analyst.

Meanwhile, in New York, his friend Jeff Speck (also an analyst) is being driven home from the office, which he left at 8:30p.m., after ordering out a quiek dinner. Says Speck, "I get a free ride home in a Cadillac. But when you're tired, you don't really care." As these Williams alumni prepare to go to sleep, students at Williams are just starting to go out and party.

The two friends began their discovery of the business world after they graduated last June. Life in the "real world" can be a difficult adjustment for many students accustomed to the supportive atmosphere of college.

"It's tough," says Speck. "At first, it was weird. You look at yourself and what you're doing and say, well, 10 years ago this would have seemed like real adult stuff, but I still feel like a kid."

One's first job after college is a gamble; it could lead to the career of a lifetime, or it could turn out to be a disastrous mistake. At any rate, disliking one's first job does not guarantee a lifetime of collecting welfare checks. "The problem with a lot of students is that they view their first job as their life. It really doesn't matter all that much in the long run," says Speck.

Haggett has not found his work to be as stimulating as he expected: "What I'm doing now isn't very challenging, and I don't feel rewarded for having helped mankind when I come home at night, but it's a learning experience." Nor does he find the work more difficult than Williams. He confesses, "I'm not working harder now. I did at first, until I realized I didn't have to work hard to do well."

Haggett paints and does volunteer work at the Y.M.C.A., but lacks the time to be as involved in art work as he was in college. He says, "I'm not really satisfied with the business world. I'd like to get back into some kind of art field."

Speck seems to be training for Workaholics Anonymous with his 70 hour a week job: "One week I worked 98 hours so I could go to Florida for vacation. While I was there (my office) called me up three times to check on information." When asked whether Speck might be working on Saturday, Haggett replied ,"Of course he's at work on Saturday. He's always at work!"

Speck enjoys his job, however hectic it may be. "A lot of what I do requires creativity," he says. He doesn't mind the fringe benefits either: "There's a lot of benefits like getting a discount at a gym." He also gets a free dinner if he works overtime (a frequent occurrence.) Says Speck, "I thought I'd become a

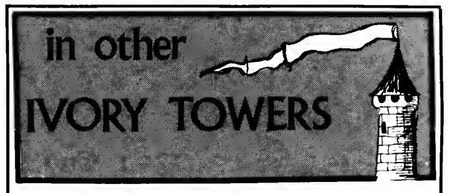
OCC counselors: They make a career out of it

by Midori Sonoda

After finally locating the Office of Career Counseling, better known as the OCC, the rest of the road to job hunting seems a breeze in comparison. While there is no guarantee that every student will leave the Stetson Hall office with a job, according to the OCC staff, each person should have acquired the skills vital to finding a job.



OCC's main function is to provide as much career information as possible in many areas, not just business. Such areas include social services, government, communications, publishing, teaching and research. The office also has resources on summer jobs and internships.

In addition to providing information, OCC counsels students on how to go about getting a job as well as advising those interested in going to law school, business school, or similar institutions. The office's primary emphasis is on counseling and information and not necessarily placement.

Financial institutions remain very popular with Williams students looking for jobs. According to Fatma Kassamali, Director of the OCC, "Undoubtedly the business world is very much seen in OCC...constantly seen. They have the money to recruit." At the same time, however, there are new trends toward communications and advertising; teaching jobs are also becoming increasingly popular.

The staff is particularly concerned with sudents who assume that non-profit organizations are not eovered by OCC. The office fears that many students think there is no time to

Dartmouth

Dartmouth's Committee On Standards has begun proceedings on the case involving the attack on the shanty town two weeks ago. The Committee took an oath of confidentiality after hearing 10 hours of testimony and will not diseuss the case at present.

There is, however, considerable controversy over the fairness of the proceedings. Several students have requested separate and open hearings which have been denied, aecording to Bill Clauson, the attorney acting as an advisor to the students. The COS will hear the twelve students involved as a single group in a closed hearing.

"Obviously the college has set out to deny everything we request," said Laura Ingraham '85, former editor of the Dartmouth Review. Ten of the students who allegedly destroyed the shanties belonged to the Review staff.

Clauson has also stated that four members on the Committee, ineluding Dean of Freshmen Margaret Bonz, should remove themselves from the hearing proeess. He argues that they have already "made up their minds" eoncerning the shanty attack.

The Committee will reconvene early next week.

Swarthmore

A deeision has been reached concerning the punishment of 41 students who protested Swarthmore's South Afriean Investment polley by disrupting a Board of Managers meeting on Dec. 7. The Student Judieiary Committee ruled that the protestors had committed a "serious offense" and that each student must pay a fine of $20 for the "act of eivil disobedience."

The Committee members agreed that the protest was motivated by "personal conviction and moral conscience," but they also stated that the students were "in violation of the said college policy" against "the disruption or interference with college activities" and had to be punished.

Holy Cross

Forty-five students from Holy Cross traveled to Washington, D.C. on Jan. 22, the 13th anniversary of the monumental decision on the Roe v. Wade case, to protest the Supreme Court ruling which legalized abortion. The student group joined approximately 70,000 Pro-Life supporters in the March for Life.

The group raised money for the trip through candy sales, personal donations and fees, a collection at weekend masses, and donations from the Chaplain's Office and Knights of Colombus. They were denied funding by the Student Activities Fund Committee.

Bentley

An Issue drawing considerable attention on the campus of this Waltham, Mass. school recently is the controversial discontinuation of the loeker room towel serviee for those not on sports teams. The new policy has been instituted in response to the negligence of many students who fail to return their towels in spite of leaving their ID cards.

In a letter to the Vanguard, the College's newspaper, Bentley Professor R. Lawrence called for a towel amnesty program: turn in your dirty towels—no questions asked.

"All of this (the towel problem) seems pretty moronic to me," he wrote, "especially at a Business School where we are learning and teaching things such as customer service, goodwill, etc."

In Other Ivory Towers, written by Record reporter Bill O'Brien, was compiled from campus newspapers.

Students dive into gutsy dorm fun

by Susan Fine

"Thunk, thunk, thunk, thunk, CLUNK! Thunk, thunk, thunk, thunk, CLUNK!" These sounds ring through Hubble House as eager partygoers participate in stair diving: an activity which has made this dorm and the parties there notorious across the campus.

Although stair diving continues to be a tradition at Hubble, house resident John Woodward '86 said, "It's a sport reserved for once a semester." At those specially designated times, partygoers (usually males) wait in line for the chance to flail there bodies head first down either the first or second floor staircases.

The stairs, although carpeted, are hard and the sport is brutal. Woodard has a scar on his hip from hitting the banisters, and he claims elbows and knees are always guaranteed to get scraped. Almost any stair diver you talk to has his own personal injury story.

The most famous stair diver, Ned Stiker, graduated in 1984 but his swan dives have yet to be duplicated. Aecording to witnesses, Stiker would throw his body over the stairs, not touching the first six or eight stairs at all, with his arms spread wide apart as if jumping off a diving board. "It was a beautiful thing to watch," said Sean McEvoy '86 of Stiker's stair dives.

Stair diving is not a recent Williams invention, but a fraternity tradition which Woodard claims is used "as a substitute for sex."

Another game made popular In the Dodd main house is Zing. The game arose when the net on the ping pong table did nothing but droop, making ping pong difficult but setting the scene for the invention of Zing.

The game involves rotating around the table as each player follows his designated man. When a player hits the ball, it must bounce on the table (hence the need for a netless table), drop on the floor, and then be returned by the following player in the same manner. John Ellison '86 enjoys the game because it "combines the skill of ping pong with the athleticism of tennis." Mark Rothstein '86 enjoys the game less because he feels his friends are overly abusive just because he lacks skill.

Dodd House: behind these walls the popular game Zing was born.

In the recent past, the game has become quite competitive and many Dodd residents speak scornfully of the noise and disruption the game always involves. In the spring of 1985, Dodd house ran up $300 in damage bills from holes made in the walls during Zing games. Now the walls are covered in wood paneling and the game continues to be played.

In Fayerweather Two, the freshmen play Shoe Golf. While these freshmen appear the most recent shoe golfers, the game is an old Williams sport. It involves naming a target at which each player will fling his or her shoe in a certain number of flings (the number of flings is determined beforehand). The game appears quite similar to traditonal golf with shoe flings serving as what would be strokes in ordinary golf.

Apparently the best shoes for the game are loose ones which are not too heavy. Loafers are said to work well, although sneakers are most commonly used. Boots are totally out. "They have no lift," said John Watkins '89.

The season for the game is not firmly established as Watkins claims the game is played "at the beginning of the year and at immature times." Watkins does, though, advise wearing thick socks for those playing in the winter.

Over at the Thompson Infimary, the infirmed residents partieipate in whiffleball and bowling. Usually these games take place late at night after studying finishes. "Whiffleball has become a replacement for the Log. It serves as a release," said Howie Patlis '88.

The bowling pins are old, unwanted ones from the North Adams bowling alley, and a basketball replaces the traditional bowling ball used in bowling allies. The infirmary residents have a lot of fun with the games, but one nurse doing late night duty downstairs found herself questioning her hearing after she thought she heard bowling coming from upstairs late one night.

"Were you guys bowling last night?" she disbelievingly asked the residents the following morning. "I heard a ball rolling down the hall, a big crash, then a lot of cheering."

include such organizations, especially during the hectic business recruiting period. Indeed, there is an inherent problem with the field since there are not many jobs in the area and those that do exist generally have lower starting salaries than many positions in the business field. OCC stresses, however, that they can provide resources in this field and tell people how to go about following up with virtually any organization.

In an effort to improve this situation, OCC has brought in non-profit organizations which would not normally have the funding to visit Williams. One such program is "Many Paths" in which non-traditional careers are explored. Such occupations include carpenters, foresters, farmers, and small businessmen. Student attendance, however, has been extremely low.

Poor attendance

Mary Lamb, Assistant Director of OCC, explained, "Our efforts to try to serve all of the student body have not been well-attended, but we're experimenting and still trying." Kassamali added that the office needs feedback from students so that programs can be developed to fit their needs.

In addition to narrowing down what they want to do and where they want to do it, students must also learn how to make themselves more marketable. The OCC reports that the majority of organizations look for students who know what they want to do and where they want to go, and who have done their research regarding the organization they are interested in. Applicants must be able to package and market themselves well, explained Kassamali.

Williams has a relatively low percentage of students going directly to graduate school from college. Most graduate school preparation is done by individual departments, with OCC counseling being offered primarily for professional schools. Law and business school information sessions are given by OCC and are open to all seniors, even those who are not interested in immediate matriculation. These sessions are often the only chance seniors have for personal contact with business and law schools.

Practically all students are interested in the current trends among Williams alumni. 66% of the class of 1985 has gone to work, with 19% of the class attending graduate school (1 2%-1% more than last year). One percent are involved in special programs, such as scholarships. The rest of the class is either not classified, unreported, or undecided.

The trend for people to avoid immediate entrance to graduate school after Williams has persisted for quite a while, mainly because there are more opportunities for them to work or do something else. Yet overall, for any given class, within ten years after graduation 62%-65% have gone to graduate schools, a very good percentage for a liberal arts college of Williams' caliber.

No pressure ... yet

Things have been heating up recently at the OCC. Lamb and Kassamali claim they have not witnessed excessive senior tension yet, though they expect to see it before too long. Every senior questioned seemed very calm about next year. J.P. Conlan '86 claims to be fairly relaxed right now. He decided to avoid corporate interviewing and look for a job teaching instead. So far he has had an interview with the Delbarton School arranged through OCC and has attended various OCC panels.

Jenni Koski '86 was also at OCC for the first time, though she admitted that she wished she had gone there before. Interested in a job in advertising or possibly consulting, she has sent in a cover letter and resume to New York agencies through OCC. This is a service OCC provides for organizations who don't interview on campus but have expressed an interest in Williams students. She said, "I used to be tensed but am now relaxed. I can see it's a process you can take step by step. It is a full-time job getting a full-time job."

Alumni

master chef, but since July, I've only cooked two dinners."

You make your best friends in college, as the saying goes. In the professional world, there is no promise that one's colleagues will be as charming, fun-loving, or diverse as one's former classmates were. Of course, depending on one's luck, co-workers could make Eddie Murphy look boring.

Haggett misses the diversity of the Williams students; "Equal opportunity is fairly new here. I work in an office that's all white males, except for one woman, who's a secretary." He finds a large contrast between their educational background and his: "Everyone else except me went to accounting school and majored in accounting. Williams people are much broader, much more cultured." On the other hand, Speck's co-workers "could have all gone to Williams. They went to places like Princeton and Middlebury."

Having a liberal arts education helps, says Speck "Because it teaches you how to think." He stresses that it is not necessary to major in economics or business in order to go into finance: "As far as econ. theory and all that goes, the actual theories aren't all that handy." Still involved and interested with art, Speck says, "I was an art history major, and on the job that come in handy at a cocktail party. It really helps to impress clients."

Social life

Partying after college is a different experience. "You have to be determined to have a social life," says Speck. Haggett comments, "You don't have the convenience of partying in the Rec. room until four when you go upstairs to bed, then wake up the next morning with someone cooking breakfast for you." Says Speck, "At Williams, it's so easy to have a social life without working at it. Here, you walk down the street and you just don't recognize anyone."

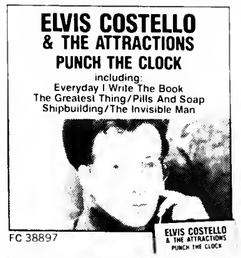
His friend Haggett observes, "You get out of training. You just can't party in a bar. If you don't have the people around you who you know and love, you can't go wild anymore."

Both men seem to prefer socializing with their Williams friends to their colleagues. "It's funny how the Williams people cling together," says Haggett. Speck lives with three fellow alumni and says, "I party mostly with my Williams friends because it's easier."

"(The social life) in New York is more civilized," says Speck. "You go out to dinner or the theater. That doesn't mean it's better — I had a hell of a time being uncivilized at college!"

Dating, however, is an improvement in the real world, according to Speck: "It's not a fishbowl. At Williams, you go out with someone twice and everyone thinks you're married. A lot of relationships at Williams are forced." In New York, he observes, people don't know or care about one's every move.

New surroundings



"Entertainment is much better in Boston," says Haggett. "You get to see better concerts, and there's more access to museums and art works." Living in a large city can be a culture shock for students used to the purple mountains of Williamstown. Speck points out, "There's more diversity in one bloek of Greenwich Village than in all of Williamstown." (he is quick to explain that this is not his only hang-out.)

"New York is an evil city, but it's kind of a fun city," Speck says. He is uneoncerned about the eity's element of danger, explaining, "I figure that any smart mugger is probable not going to attack a 6'2" guy."

The two men feel that the competetiveness of Williams helped prepare them for the outside world. Says Haggett, "Everyone wants to be the champion at Williams. They all have that driven mentality." Both men realize their lives have changed as they accept more respons ibilities. "It's about becoming an adult," says Speck of his first year out.

Though their lives have changed inevitably, the two friends look baek on Williams with happiness. Says Speck, "College may not be the best times of your life, but you'll think they were. When you leave, what you'll remember is Winter Study and the Log."

Lewis

Since he declared martial law in 1972, Marcos, whom Lewis described as a very shrewd politician, has embarked on "the centralization of power and the destruction of indepondent Filipino institutions," Lewis said. Marcos has destroyed the Philipine Congress' power and the professional military.

Lewis said, "(Power has) tended toward onc man at the top and his cronies."

Rich vs. poor

Lewis at the same time deseribed Inequality in the Phillipines. "It's possible to go from conditions of poverty to ones of incredible opulence very easily," Lewis said. "The difference between very rieh and very poor in the Phillipines is probably as great as it is anywhere in the world."

Because of increased repression and a declining standard of living, the Mareos government has come under strong fire from a reviving opposition. Lewis, who travelled to areas close to the army-NPA fighting, said the insurgents are feeding more off of popular dissatisfaction with the Mareos regime than procommunist sentiment.

Lewis said, "There is eonsensus as to their (the NPA's) growing strength. There is a common view that there has to be change, and sinee Marcos will not change, people turn to the NPA."

Outlining the worsening conditions in the Phillipines, Lewis said, however, he holds hope for a reversal beeause of the existing infrastructure. He pointed to "strong financial institutions, a skilled civil servlee, literate people and abundant resources."

"Marcos will, of course, eheat," Lewis stressed, referring to last Friday's elections against Aquino. "The important thing is the size of the cheating and the amount of protest it will ease. If the opposition feels that Marcos stole it blind, we will see a dramatle worsening of the situation."

Wednesday at 7:00 in the Dodd House living room, Lewis will report on his trip and lead an informal discussion titled "The Philippines: What now?"

Theme

seven to 13. The formation of the theme house will reduce the number of available co-ops from six to five.

The proposal for theme houses came from the Gaudino Committee in consultation with the Dean's Office, according to Tauber. The Gaudino Committee, made up of students and faculty, is, according to Tauber, supposed to come up with innovative and interesting proposals for the College. Tauber stressed the commlttee is not usually involved with the implementation of its proposals.

The theme house, however, will be different. Both Darrow and Wendy Hopkins, director of housing, made it clear that the Gaudino Committee is to be responsible for organizing the theme houses.

Opposition

The theme house proposal has generated some opposition among students. Miehelle Barry '87, president of Prospect House, said she is strongly opposed to the theme-houses concept because it further reduces an already diminishing number of co-op spaces. The loss of Scely House last year, she said, has reduced the chance of getting into a co-op to less than 50 percent.

Darrow admitted the theme houses represent the one exception to randomness in the residential house system. The current co-op selection process is completely random, he said, but he does not object to changing to a judgemental process for one of the co-ops.

The houses are oriented towards rising seniors, but rising juniors can apply with a group of seniors, according to Darrow. Groups that are interested should apply for both a theme house and a co-op, said Darrow, because they will then have a better chance of living together.

Darrow emphasized that the theme house was a proposal and not a commitment. He said that if there are no acceptable applications, then there will not be a theme house, and the number of co-ops will revert back to six.

Hoopsters drop a pair while topping Vassar

by Al Mottur

Despite continued outstanding efforts from several individuals, the women's basketball team has continued to struggle and has seen its record drop to a disappointing 2-10.

In its most recent action, the squad fell to a taller and more talented Mt. Holyoke team by a score of 75-45. According to Nancy Hedeman '89, "they were too big for us. Their front line would get the ball inside and score almost every time."

Earlier in the week, the team traveled to Wesleyan where it played an inspired 25 minutes before letting the game slip away to the Cardinals. The final score was 76-56..

Freshman Jennifer Storey came off the bench to play what Hamblin called "her best game of the year," as she scored ten points and yanked down seven rebounds. Other standouts for the Ephwomen included Hedeman, who had eleven points and ten rebounds, and point guard Kim Hatch '88 who played an exeellent floor game, scoring twelve points and dishing out six assists.

Before the Wesleyan game, the team defeated Vassar 51-39 to record its second victory of the season. The Ephwomen jumped out to an 8-4 lead and never lost it, rolling into halftime with a 25-18 advantage. Vassar mounted a short rally, cutting the margin to 25-24 with 15 minutes left to play, but at that point Williams went on a 10-2 run to retake control of the conrtest.

The squad owes its second victory of the season to the outstanding play of Hedeman, Beasley, and Missy Crouchley '89, who combined for 35 points, 20 rebounds, and 11 steals. The team will face its next test tomorrow against Trinity at home at 7:30.

Skiers take 5th and 6th at UVM

The men's and women's ski teams traveled to Stowe, Vermont last weekend to compete in the NCAA Division I University of Vermont Winter Carnival. The men finished sixth while the women copped fifth place.

UVM grabbed top honors in the overall men's team standings while Middlebury topped the women's field. The men's alpine squad was particularly impressive in Saturday's slalom event where they shared top honors with UVM.

This weekend both teams will compete in their home Winter Carnival, which will include some of the top skiers in the country. Mac Nash '88 and Kathy Wolf '88 will be some of the top Eph participants, as they each just missed making the US Junior National Nordic team this year. Mari Omland '89 will compete in the Alpine competition, trying to solidify her position as the top freshman on this year's Carnival circuit.

Last weekend, the men's team braved snow, fog, and generally poor visibility on Mt. Manfield's North slope to finish fourth in Friday's giant slalom. Tim Hill '86 and Helge Weiner '87 led the assault by finishing 11th and 12th, while freshman Jed Scala placed 19th.

In the slalom, Hill finished in third place, combining with junior Martin Magoun's sixth and Weiner's 10th to give the team their first slalom victory of the season. They shared first place with UVM. The alpine team wrapped up the weekend placing second in the combined giant slalom/slalom point standings.

The men's nordic team raced to a ninth place finish in Friday's 15K individual and a 10th place in Saturday's relay. Fred Eaton '86 led the individual scorers by placing 27th. He was followed by Ole Halvorsen '86 in 34th and Tod Niedeck 38th.

Women take fifth

The women's alpine team faced perhaps greater visibility problems in the giant slalom than did their male teammates and yet managed to finish fourth. The freshman duo of Amy Duncombe and Mari Omland finished ninth and 10th, respectively, while Monica Kopp '89 finished 30th.

The team finished fifth in Saturday's slalom. Kopp led the team with an eighth place finish and was followed by Duncombe in 14th, Linda Glass '89 in 28th, and Annie Gilbert '87 in 29th. Alpine coach Ed Grees was particularly pleased with Kopp's slalom finish, which he noted would greatly increase her chances of qualifying for the NCAA Championships in March.

The women's nordic squad braved challenging downhills to finish fifth in the 7.5K race. Wolf led the Ephwomen with a 14th place finish. She was followed by Beth Schmidt '86 in 20th and Ann Arnason '89 in 30th.

In Saturday's relay the team finished a disappointing eighth place, following an unfortunate pileup of skiers in the early stages of the race that left the Ephs' lead-off woman, Arnason, with a shattered pole.

Men's squash

by Jim Goodwin

The Williams varsity squash team raised its record to 10-6 this Sunday as it crushed SUNY-Stonybrook by a score of 7-2. The raequetmen are now assured a national ranking of eight or above.

Captain Doug Robie '86 and a very ill Wendell Chestnut '88 led the team with 3-2 victories, coming from behind to defeat their opponents. Sam Fortenbaugh '86 took his match to four tough games, winning 3-1 as the rest of the team's winners took their matches 3-0.

The team took a solid win against Tufts, as the Jumbos fell by a 6-3 margin. Sophomore Rob Hallagan, coming off of debilitating injuries earlier this season, led the Ephs with a crushing 3-0 win at the number seven position.

Trinity edged the Williams squad last Wednesday, as Robie and McCall turned in upset victories. Playing "out of my head," captain Robie beat three-time All-American J.D. Cregan at the number one position, virtually assuring himself a slot on this year's All-American squad.

McCall turned in a gutsy 3-2 win at the number three position, but the Ephs fell by a final score of 5-4. Williams plays Wesleyan next Saturday in Middletown, and Amherst the following week, looking for its thirteenth consecutive Little Three title.

Men's hockey

by Rick Orluk and Jamie Gallop

To add to a disappointing season, the men's hockey team dropped a 7-5 decision to Amherst last weekend and then tied Wesleyan on Saturday night 1-1, giving the Jeffs the Little Three title. The Ephs also lost to Division I Army and Division II power Union.

On Saturday night, the Ephs hosted a spirited Wesleyan squad in a battle to avoid the cellar in the Little Three. Both teams came up short, sharing second place as they skated to a 1-1 tie.

The Ephmen opened the scoring at 6:48 of the second period to take a 1-0 lead. Senior Dave Fritz skated down from the point to knock a puck left unattended in the slot into the back of the Wesleyan net.

The Ephs outshot the Cardinals by a wide margin of 41-24, but due to some fine goaltending on both ends, both teams only managed a goal apiece.

Last Tuesday night, the Ephs traveled to Union for their second meeting of the season with the Dutchmen and a repeat performance, losing 4-1. Williams' lone goal came from freshman defensemen Tim Frechette.

During midwinter recess, the squad played host to archrival Amherst. Williams opened the scoring at 5:45 of the first period on a goal by junior forward Guy Kurtz with help from defensemen Dave Fritz '86 and Tim McKone '87. Amherst answered with a late first period goal to tied the score at one.

In the second period, the Jeffs took the lead at 5:59, but the Ephs quickly answered with a goal of their own only 45 seconds later on a goal by Craig Cheevers '87. The Ephs regained the lead at 11:04 thanks to the efforts of their outstanding freshman line, Will Putnam getting the goal with assists from Mike Swenson and Chris Conway. The goal came on a beautifully exeeuted power play.

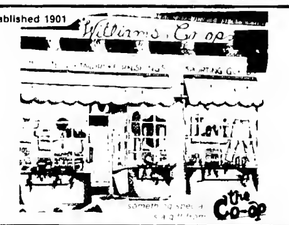
Again the Jeffs managed to even the score at three just two minutes later. But Williams regained the lead for the third time on an awesome slapshot from junior Mike O'Connell, the assist going to senior Joe Seiacca.

Amherst came out strong in the third period, scoring just 13 seconds in to gain a 5-4 lead, which they never relinquished on their way to a 7-5 win. The Ephs' final goal came from freshman Walter Hoffman with help from junior Taylor Watts.

At 2-13-3, the future doesn't get much brighter for the team, among those still to play include Babson and Salem State. Tonight, they face Hamilton at 6:00 and then play host to Middlebury on Friday.

Women's hockey

by Michele Barry



The women's hockey team beat Skidmore 6-5 and tied Wesleyan 2-2 at the end of January to bring their record to 3-7-1. With strong fan support at Skidmore, the Ephwomen dominated the game.

Senior co-captain Beth Ebel raised her own stats by scoring all six of Williams' goals. Co-captain Sue Klein '86 said, "It was really great to see my co-captain turn in an exeellent performance with strong support from the rest of the team."

At Wesleyan, both the offense and defense did an excellent job of keeping the puck in the Wesleyan zone, and a lot of shots were taken, but the Ephwomen were unlucky. After five minutes of overtime, the game ended in a 2-2 tie.

Filling in for the several players who left for the semester were three freshmen: Lani Wishnie and Julie Barbo both played wing and Kirsten Neuse played defense. Klein was "excited to see the fine play by the freshmen" and was pleased with the way the defense played, particularly Haley Clifford '87 who "held the blue line really well."

The women pucksters play at home against RPI tomorrow at 7:30 pm. During the RPI game, the raffle drawing for the dinners-for-two with your favorite hockey player (or coach) will be held.

Swimmers split with Colgate, men stand at 6-1, women 5-4

by Kurt Oeler

The men's swimming team overpowered Colgate 63-52 Saturday while the women fell to their Division I opponents. Both squads swam well in familiar Muir Pool after three conseeutive away meets.

Colgate jumped to an early lead, but Bill Coueh '86 and Dom Kulik '86 swept the Red Raiders in the 100 fly. Williams then surged to a 16-11 lead it never relinquished.

Scott Robinson '87 won the 200 free in national qualifying time and Kulik won an important race in the 200 fly. Will Andrew '86, upset in the 50 free, stormed to a deeisive win in the 100 to maintain his unbeaten streak in that event.

Coueh won the 500 free in 4:45.85, breaking the pool record and qualifying him for nationals. Colgate refused to quit, however, foreing the meet down to the last event, the 800 free relay. Couch then joined Andrew, Robinson, and Dave Brown '89 in convincingly winning the relay and the meet.

Women fall to 5-4

Senior co-captain Kathy Kirmayer led the women's squad with good swims in the sprint freestyle events. Katie Bacon 'Ex turned in a solid performance in the 1650 free and Jody Skidd '88 and Katie Anthony '87 swept their opponents in the 200 back. Lani Searfoss '87 eaptured the 200 breast and elassmate Joan Horgan showed versatility in placing seeond.

The men's record now stands at 6-1 while the women are 5-4. One week earlier, each squad gained wins against Springfield College on the eve of Coach Sam's ban.

Saturday's win over Colgate represents Williams seeond victory over the Red Raiders. Coach Carl Samuelson's charges now look forward to winning Little Three Championships with wins over Wesleyan next week and the upcoming New England championships.

Tracksters trounce Jeffs, Cards

by Stewart Verdery

The Williams track program had a most satisfying day on Saturday, as both the men and women swept past Amherst, Wesleyan, and Trinity to elaim both meets. The men gained a come-from-behind win over Amherst, while the women were never headed in their 46 point vietory.

After the six field events, the Ephmen found themselves in a 21-point hole to Amherst's men. Joe McGinn '88 won the weight event at 44', and Bill Leininger '86 garnered seven points by finishirg seeond in the weight at 39'6", second in the pole vault at 12', and fourth in the shot put. Dan Root '87 and Scott Purdy '88 took third plaees.

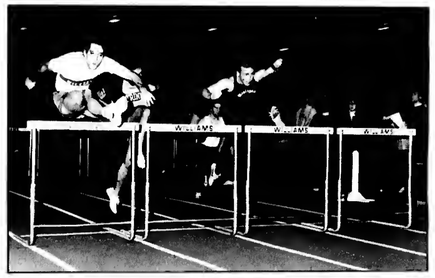
However, in the 1500, the first running event, the momentum turned. Ted Arrowsmith '88 won the 1500 at 4:05.16, beating two runners from Amherst who had posted faster times in previous meets. This event saw the beginning of a string of 10 eveuts where Williams outseored Amherst.

Andre Lopez '87 captured a rare double when, only minutes after taking the 400 in a time of 52.33, he headed a 1-2-3 Wiiliams sweep in the 55 meters at 6.86. Tom Pingree '86 led a elose 800 finish in winning at 2:01.59, and Ed Toneili '86 bested tired Amherst runners in the 1000 at 2:37.72. Purdy contributed a second in the 55 meter hurdles and a third in the high jump, and Dave Nadelman nailed down second in the 500 at 1:09.81.

Williams then eonciuded the meet by taking both relays in easy fashion. Williams ended the meet with 71 points, surpassing Amherst's 60, Trinity's 23 and Wesleyan's 17. Coaeh Richard Farley was elated with the vietory, but noted that the meet was not a Little Three ehampionship meet, as there exists no such title in indoor track.

Earlier, the men had taken first in a meet against Westfield, Fitehburg, and Worcester. John Servin '89 in the 1500, Lopez in the 500, and Pingree in the 800 captured the only first plaee finishes for Williams, but superior depth enabled the Ephs to pick up points in almost every event, and they were able to defeat Westfield 55-53.

Women lap rivals



The women's meet against Amherst, Wesleyan, and Trinity was much less eompetitive. Nine of the thirteen events were won by Williams en route to a final tally of Wiiliams 77, Wesleyan 31, Amherst 13, and Trinity 13.

Susan Northern '89 started the meet by winning the long jump at 15'9 1/4" and the triple jump at 32'2 1/2" in her first meet of the year. Sara St. Antoine '88 set a sehool record in the 1500 at 4:59.84 and also won the 1000 at 3:16.28. Dawn Maeauley '89 eaptured the 55 meter hurdles in 9.57, took second in the 1500 at 5:04.25.

Beeky Conklin '87 nailed down first in the 800 at 2:30.33 and seeond in the 1500 at 5:04.25. Joan Davis '88 sped past her rivals to elaim the 55 meters in 7.81, and Sarah Pieree '88 outlasted the field to win the 3000 in 10:59.76.

Other second places were taken by Noriko Honda '89 in the 55 meter hurdles, Beth Schaefer 'Ex in the 500, Lauris Wren '88 in the 1000, and Jenny Garret '89 in the 3000. All in all, it was a very convineing win for the Ephwomen, and it concluded an outstanding week for the Williams' track program.

The men's team goes to Bates Saturday to faee Colby, Bates and Bowdoin with Amherst and Wesleyan. The women are at home Sunday for the Williams Women's Invitational.

Flying over the hurdles in Towne Field House, Scott Purdy '88 heads for the finish line while helping his team to the Little Three title. (Mead)

Ephmen lose a pair, now 10-8

by Cliff Peale

"We just have to be a little tougher," says men's basketbail coach Harry Sheehy. He spoke in the light of his team's two losses last week, a 95-90 defeat at WPI followed by a 76-70 loss to Connecticut College on Saturday in New London. The games set the squad's record at 10-8.

Those two losses followed a 96-73 destruction of Brandeis last Wednesday, which saw forward Brandt Johnson '87 explode for 41 points. And last Saturday, the squad played a tough Wesleyan team at home and prevailed 71-65 as backcourt mates Tim Walsh '86 and John Ciulia '87 scored 25 and 19 points, respectively.

The win over the Cardinals gave the Ephs a 2-0 record in the Little Three; combined with Amherst's recent win over Wesleyan, this Saturday's eontest with the Jeffs in Laseil beeomes a Little Three championship game.

In the openlng minutes of the Conn. College game on Saturday, the Ephs looked as if they could not challenge for any kind of championship at ail. Walsh and Johnson each hit for two baskets early to keep the contest close, but the Camels' game-long dominance on the glass ("We got hammered on the boards," lamented coach Harry Sheehy) gave them numerous easy baskets.

Junior co-captain Greg Lang was nabbed for two early fouls, and the Ephmen's inside defense suffered as a result, as David Benjack hit three hoops in close to extend the Camel lead to as much as nine.

The Ephs came back late in the half to pull within two at 38-36 when the intermission came. Walsh had hit for 16, while good defensive work from freshman Mike Masters and senior Mike Meadows also helped fuel the comeback.

Ephs come back

The first ten minutes of the second stanza saw seven lead changes. Walsh hit four baskets and Lang put in two offensive rebounds before a Walsh jumper put the Ephs up 60-58 with seven minutes left. A tip-in by sophomore Rob Stubbiebine and a Walsh running one-hander put Williams up by six at 64-58, but that would be their biggest lead of the game.

Going inside at every opportunity, the Camels took advantage of several turnovers and tied the score at 68 before taking a timeout with 2:08 on the clock. They then reacted much better to the pressure of the last two minutes than Williams, outscoring them 8-2. "I think we showed a lack of floor savvy out there that hurt us," said Sheehy.

Walsh, almost singlehandedly refusing to let his team lose, hit yet another jumper for the last of his 34 points (no other Eph would crack double figures), but the squad's one chance to stay even evaporated when Masters stole the ball and passed to Stubbiebine, who was standing on the baseline.

A clearly disappointed Sheehy commented after the game: "We showed poor play at crucial times. I think this game is very indicative of our weaknesses," mentioning rebounding and court awareness as two of those.

Sheehy's attitude was almost identical after the Wednesday night loss at WPI, in which the Ephs seored 90 points but fell by five. Walsh hit for 36, passing the school scoring record of Art Pidoriano '84, and ending the game with 1507 points. Sheehy indicated that the team as a whole was just flat. "I thought it was a typleal game," he said, "for being right after a big Little Three game."

That Little Three game was the squad's 71-65 Saturday night win over the Cardinals of Wesleyan. Masters started for the first time, and the duo of Ciulia and Walsh carried the scoring load. It was Sheehy's ninth win against one loss in the Little Three as a coach, and he has a chanee to win his second outright title on Saturday when the Lord Jeffs come to town. Tonight the Ephs will face RPI in Laseli.

Squash 2nd in Can-Am, Cloppse wins top honors

by Al Mottur

Paced by the consistently excellent play of number one seed Jeanne Cloppse '88, the women's squash team ran its record in individual matches to 5-2 with a 9-0 rout of Vassar over Winter Break. One week later, the squad traveled to Poughkeepsie to eompete in the seeond half of the Can-Am tourney and placed second, winning three matches, and losing two. In the first half of the tournament, held two weeks earlier, the Ephwomen finished in sixth place.

In the Vassar match, the outcome was never in question, as the women avenged an earlier loss to Vassar in outstanding fashion. Cloppse defeated her opponent in four games, winning 15-7, 15-4, 16-17, and 15-5. Number two player and senior Carrie Cento, who just recently moved up the ladder, responded to her promotion with a eonvineing 15-5, 15-8, and 15-5 victory.

Coach Renzie Lamb attributed the earlier loss to Vassar to the fact that only three varsity players were available for the mateh, forcing Williams to forfeit two matches. This paueity of players also was a large faetor in the Ephs' sixth plaee finish in the first half of the Can-Am's.

That six place finish, did not bode well for the team as it traveled to Vassar for the seeond half of the tournament. Yet the squad responded with a strong second place showing, displaying mueh of the improvement that has become more and more evident the last few weeks.

The team lost to both Dartmouth and Toronto by a seore of 3-2, a marked differenee form their earlier thrashing by Dartmouth. The Ephs also shut out Vassar for the seeond straight time and beat Queens and York, both by 5-0 scores.

The tourney was also a great individual suecess for Cloppse who went the entire tournament without a single defeat, and was selected as the tournament's top player.

The squad also competed this past weekend at the Yale-hosted Howe Cup. However, the tournament iasted the whole weekend and the team did not return until late. They will next take to the courts against Trinity in a home mateh tomorrow at 7:30.

157 hope to be JA's next year

by Jim Hartnett

Almost a third of the sophomore class has filed Junior Advisor applications, hoping to become one of 54 JA's for the class of 1990. A committee of 25 sophomores, juniors and seniors will review the 157 applications, announcing its choices just before spring break.

The committee members will spend more than eight hours a week reviewing the qualifications of the candidates. The six sophomores, six juniors and 13 seniors on the Selection Committee consist of 13 of last year's JA's, five current JA's and seven students who were not JA's.

According to Tom Goodspeed '86, chairman of the Selection Committee, the 157 completed applications represent an increase of eight over last year and 15 more than the average for recent years.

College Council Vice President Amy Jeffress '87 said she communicated the results of a November survey on the JA selection process and JA effectiveness to the Selection Committee recently.

Survey response

This survey, which had more than 200 responses, asked a variety of questions about the effectiveness of JAs and the type of people that usually become JAs. Jeffress said the results of the survey varied according to what year the respondents were, with freshmen being overall more positive about JA's. "The upperclassmen like JA's, but they see more problems with the system," Jeffress said.

Only a small group of respondents thought the number of current and ex-JA's Gaudino aims to install 'college within College'

by Debbie Snyder

Hoping to increase the intellectual atmosphere on campus, the Gaudino Committee has proposed a freshman "college within the College." It will consist of about 45 self-selected members of the class of 1990 who will live in one entry and take a common, interdisciplinary, interdivisional course each semester as one of their four courses.

The freshman college will begin next year if the proposed courses are approved by the faculty at its March meeting.

The courses in the freshman college, which are still in the planning stage, will be devoted to theoretical and practical reason, according to Kurt Tauber, Gaudino scholar and chairman of the committee.

The first semester course will deal with "the nature of the evidence, what it means to know someone in the humanities, what meaning is, if and how language structures our view of the world, (and) what a social or scientific fact is," Tauber said.

The second semester course will focus on public and private morality and bases for making ethical judgements. The professors tentatively scheduled to teach the courses, according to Tauber, are Professor of Physics David Park and Assistant Professor of English Stephen Tifft for the first semester, and Associate Professor of Political Science Richard Krouse and Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong for the second semester.

Social-Intellectual

The freshman college is one of several Gaudino committee proposals intended to dissolve a perceived compartmentalization in students' lives and create a more intellectual atmosphere on campus. Tauber said the committee feels students sharing the same course and living

Tenure decisions ring hollow in music

by Anne O'Malley

Tenure has become a major issue in the music department this semester, as a tenure-track instructor has been denied tenure and a visiting professor has been recommended for it.

Assistant Professor of Music Paula Ennis-Dwyer, denied tenure by the Board of Trustees last month, is appealing that decision, and Visiting Professor of Music Robert Suderberg has been nominated, by the department, for a permanent position.

The Board of Trustees gave official approval to six out of 10 candidates for tenure last month, but Ennis-Dwyer was not among them. She is appealing this decision, and several of her students are protesting it as well.

Amy Champagne '87 plans to circulate a petition in support of Ennis-Dwyer, and Laura Kubzansky '89 has sent a letter of protest to all the members of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. Both Champagne and Kubzansky spoke with President Francis Oakley in support of Ennis-Dwyer.

Student support

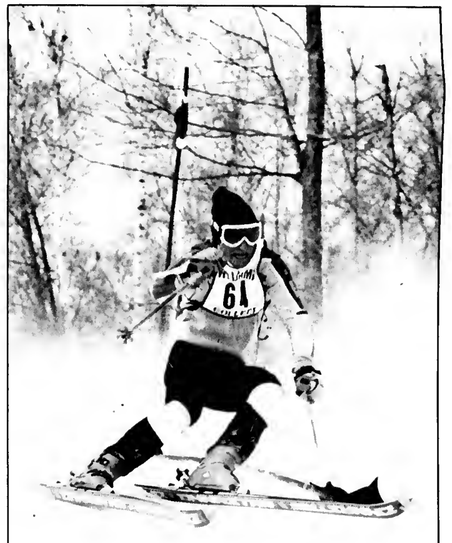
Greg Capaldini '83, who took courses from Ennis-Dwyer while he was at Williams, sent a letter in support of her appeal.

Champagne, a music major, claimed, "(Ennis-Dwyer is) among the best professors I've had at Williams, and that includes many tenured professors and many department chairmen."

Kubzansky, a freshman, said Ennis-Dwyer's presence was part of the reason she chose Williams. Kubzansky said, "I think it would be a real mistake to let her go because it's really unusual for a school out in the boondocks like Williams is to have someone of her caliber, both as a performer and a teacher."

In his letter supporting Ennis-Dwyer's appeal, Capaldini said he believed the loss of Ennis-Dwyer as a performer would hurt both the student body and the local community. He wrote, "For students who never before made a habit of going to classical recitals, the presence of such a talent can attract them to a whole new experience."

He also praised her classroom performance, saying that while he understood "the question of Ms. Ennis-Dwyer's classroom teaching had been a problem ... Ms. Ennis-Dwyer has a grasp of her subjects that enables her to challenge the minds of all her students."



Members of the music department and the administration refused to comment on the case while it is under appeal.

Suderberg

In another tenure decision, Visiting Professor of Music Robert Suderburg confirmed that the College has offered him a permanent position with tenure and said he has accepted the offer. This appointment will not become official, however, until it is approved by the Board of Trustees in the spring.

John F. Reichert, dean of the faculty, explained that, while an instructor usually teaches at Williams for six years before receiving tenure, the six-year tenure-track is geared toward candidates who have recently finished graduate school. He said a professor could be hired with tenure, or offered tenure after a shorter amount of time, if he has had extensive experience prior to coming to Williams.

Reichert and other members of the administration and the music department did not want to comment specifically on the Suderberg case either, because the Board of Trustees has not yet approved the appointment.

New entry to take Dodd satellite

by Harwell Wells

A new freshman entry will be formed in a satellite of Dodd House next year, according to Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh. The entry will house 10 or 11 freshmen and will most likely be in Sewall House or Dodd Annex.

The space will be needed because the Class of 1990 will have approximately 515 members, said Director of Admissions Philip Smith, about eight more than the Class of 1989. The strength of the applicant pool is so pronounced that an increase in the class is desirable, Smith explained.

He particularly cited the increasing number of students spending a year abroad, most notably at Williams-in-Oxford. This, combined with some reduction in transfer and exchange students, will allow the College to maintain approximately 1925 students on campus each semester.

"I think there may be some problems with them (the freshmen in the Dodd building) so far away ... but with a good choice of JAs it won't be major," Kavanaugh said, also noting that this increases the number of JAs from 52 to 54.

Former Dodd House President John Woodard '86, who handled the discussion for the House, said, "There's not much

Ten lonely freshmen

Next year, one of the Dodd satellite houses, either Sewall or Dodd Annex, will become a frehman entry. Despite Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh's opinion, good Junior Advisors will not alleviate most of the problems related to a very small entry isolated in one of these houses. JAs who work hard to provide an active social life and are very supportive of their freshmen can help make the freshmen experience a successful year, but they cannot ameliorate stifling housing circumstances.

No matter how good the JAs, an isolated ten-freshmen entry would have so many factors stacked against it that making it integrated with the rest of the class would be impossible. Small entries need other freshmen in the immediate vicinity. Seeing the same nine faces, and only those faces, in one's dormitory would cause most people to go stir crazy.

An immediate stop-gap measure is needed to house a larger incoming class, but a small Dodd satellite entry is not the answer. The most important consideration of an isolated entry is making it large enough to be socially self-supportive. One possible location would be the recently renovated Thompson Infirmary. While this suggestion raises questions about where to house the current residents as well as those who would have been included there this spring, giving the incoming freshmen a fighting chance must certainly take precedence.

This proposal is the lesser of two evils. The fact that it is necessary reflects the underlying problem. While the Admissions Office cannot predict the application of a very large, very qualified pool, they do not have to accept a larger group of candidates. Emergency measures are unavoidable when more accepted candidates than expected enroll, but planning to accept more candidates than can be housed in the freshmen housing system creates a situation where some upperclass house must lose out.

Co-ops

To the Editor:

I'm a little amazed. Reading the Record last week, I discovered the number of co-op houses the College offers in its lottery is about to decrease by one for the second time this year. Leaving aside for the briefest moment the reasons behind these decisions, I want to make it clear that this loss would be serious indeed.

The co-op housing program is one of the most attractive features of Williams student housing system, a unique and valuable opportunity for upperclassmen to assume some of the responsibility for feeding themselves and maintaining a home, a responsibility they will be required to assume in full upon graduation.

As many seniors know, the stock of co-op housing is already so limited that only one in three applicants was granted co-op status last year. The success of the co-op lifestyle has become widely known among upperclassmen this year. We can expect that the number of applicants will increase this year, while the number of co-op beds drops from 67 to between 47 and 53.

Before I start what some will call pointing fingers (and inevitably making some enemies), let me single out one person not responsible for the change. Wendy Hopkins, the Director of Student Housing, has always been one of the strongest supporters of the co-op system and its strengths. The effort she has put into maintaining and improving the co-op houses and her solicitation of student input on such improvements speak well for her commitment.

The Economics Department is in need of more office space, and has been granted the use of Seeley House next year as a satellite to Fernald. Seven beds and a brand-new kitchen gone; I hope economists are good cooks. I am not informed enough to comment on the search for possible alternatives to this move or the solicitation of student input; suffice it to say that no one found out about this decision until well after it had been made.

The current decision, to turn one yet unnamed co-op into a theme house, is just as troubling. Somehow, a committee that is far from representative decided a co-op should be the location for concentrated intellectual pursuit. Obviously, my issue is not with the idea of a theme group of students. We are primarily, as President Oakley has stated, an intellectual community, and I am convinced that a group of mutually concerned students living together would result in a productive and provoking environment.

How in the world did the Gaudino Committee choose a co-op? Do people have to cook and clean together to think together? The primary consideration in forming such a theme group is only that the participants live together. The convenience of the fact that the co-ops will allow for the placement of a variably sized, yet intimate group is only that, a convenience. How can the convenience of such a small group of individuals outweigh the strength of the co-op system?

A better way to pose the question may be this: If the students involved in the theme group lived together, yet in a non co-op house, wouldn't more students be able to have one of these positive experiences? It seems that for one group to have the opportunity of living in an environment of common intellectual stimulation and live in a co-op while another equally sized group gets shut out of both experiences is a little unfair.

The Dodd satellite houses present themselves as an attractive alternative. If these are too large for the group which is selected on the basis of its intellectual theme, then I might suggest the rooms which were formerly the inpatient area of Thompson Infirmary. Accomodations are available on the same scale as in the co-ops, and a living room and kitchenette are in place. The rooms are of similar size to rooms in Greylock or Mission Park, and few improvements will be necessary. If this proves infeasible, an attractive alternative could still be found. Even a relatively private section of a row house might be a solution. The bottom line is this: It is senseless to gut one of the strongest and most attractive components of our housing system, even for such a laudable cause. With the Gaudino proposal, gutted it we have.

Gaudino

To The Editor:

The Record's recent coverage of the theme house, though it contains some misconceptions, also raises some legitimate concerns. These concerns were discussed by the Gaudino Committee in its deliberations last year. Since the Committee issued its report and held its open meeting in the spring, the possibility of having a theme house has been widely discussed in a variety of forums. These discussions have included faculty, students, administrators, and trustees, whose consensus has been that this is an experiment worth trying. It was also commonly agreed that a theme house should not become an intellectual cloister by insuring that the campus as a whole would benefit from its existence. In addition, the Committee made every effort to obtain student opinion.

The primary criterion for selecting a group for a theme house (if one is selected at all — if no proposals meet their criterion, there will be no theme house) is that participants are committed not only to pursuing an area of inquiry among themselves, but that the wider community will also benefit from their endeavors. That is, for a proposal to be sufficient, it must include plans to involve the community in a variety of events related to the theme. We expect theme houses to bring in speakers or films or performances. We are anxious to see theme houses sponsor discussions and presentations open to the entire Williams population. It is fundamental to a theme house proposal, if it is to be accepted, that the house members "reach out" to share their interests with others. In addition, it is expected that the events sponsored by the house will encourage others to pursue further the issues on their own and with their housemates. The theme house will not be a place for a group of people who share an interest to "escape" from the housing system. Moreover, since residency in any theme house is limited to one year, participating juniors will return to their residential houses in their senior year and can be expected to impart something of the excitement of the theme house to their friends.

The Record also suggested that students were not properly consulted with regards to all of the Committee's recommendations, of which the theme house is one. Quite the contrary is true. As mentioned, the Gaudino Committee presented its report to the President, the Trustees, the Deans, as well as to the CEP and the CUL, student/faculty committees which represent the concerns of students on educational and social matters, respectively. In addition, we made our report open to the public, held a public forum and presented our case to the Record so that everyone who was interested could respond. The Gaudino Committee received at least as much student input and allowed for at least as much student reaction as most committees do at Williams.

The Record raises one further objection, namely that the theme house unjustifiably takes a co-op house away from students. But are the benefits from the Williams community of a co-op house necessarily larger than those of a theme house? We can only tell by experimenting. The theme house experiment is a modest one and can readily be discontinued is it in anyway disappoints our expectations.

Christmas in Nicaragua is a time for peace and hope

by Carrie Parker

Carrie Parker graduated last spring and has been in Nicaragua with Witness For Peace since August.

Matagalpa, December 18, 1985

I'm feeling the effects of the war very strongly right now. Yesterday Herb, Julie, Mary (all Witness for Peace volunteers) and I began the trip from Managua to Paiwas. We're driving out to Paiwas in a new ambulance, a truck that belongs to the church parish. It will be used as an emergency vehicle, so Paiwas will no longer have to be dependent on the once daily cattle truck run, but will have a vehicle based in Paiwas.

The road past Bacao is closed because the contra ambushed a civilian truck yesterday, killing three civilians and two soldiers also on the truck. We interviewed the owner/driver of the truck who had just been released from the hospital with shrapnel wounds. Because the two soldiers had been given a ride, the truck was considered "fair game" by the contra. It is one of those aspects of this war that infuriates me. In order to kill two soldiers, the contra shot and killed three civilians as well, and injured the driver who doesn't support the Sandinistas anyway. The soldiers shouldn't put civilians in danger like that, knowing that the contra willingly kill three civilians to get two compas (a common term for Nicaraguan army soldiers). The driver told us that the two women who were killed, friends of his, only had planned to ride one kilometer more.

I am scared, knowing more clearly now that next time I come someone I know may have died.

I write this now from Matagalpa, where we came this afternoon, hoping that tomorrow we can reach Paiwas by the other road. We're travelling with Lucilla and Edgar, two local Paiwas teenagers who study in Managua and are hoping to be home for Christmas. They don't seem to be too worried about this delay, they've probably lived through this so many times before. Edgar's father was killed by the contra in an ambush two years ago when Edgar was thirteen, on the same road we'll take tomorrow.

Bocana de Paiwas, December 20

Three days of travelling in order to get to Paiwas, normally a 6-7 hour drive. It feels great to be back again. It's like coming home — the best part was watching Lucilla and Edgar greet their families. Edgar has five little brothers and sisters, and when they saw him get out of the truck, they jumped all over him. Reunions take on new meaning after such a trip. And it was a relief for us to find that despite the attempts by the contra to push through an offensive at Christmas, Paiwas continues to be well-secured.

Bocana de Paiwas, December 23

I've just returned from a quiet walk to the river, where I sat and looked at the stars and the moon. I have so much to think about, here in Palwas this Christmas. What does it mean to be here in at this time of year, with all this activity going on? There are combats to the east of us in the mountains, combats to the west of us near Rio Blanco and Matiguas. This morning there was a funeral for a one year old chid who died from diarrhea — so common here.

Tonight Julie, Herb and I visited Juan Carlos, the twelve year old younger brother of Lucilla and a very gifted guitar player. Julie had her gultar, and the two of them traded songs for two hours. The first song Juan Carlos played he wrote himself — a song about Paiwas, about how the contra are scared to attack Paiwas because they know the people will defend the town and push them back. I wonder if he'll have to go and fight some day, in order to keep the contra out of his town. I wonder if he will be able to use his musical talents, or if he will die defending the town he sings about.

Bocana de Paiwas, Christmas Eve

The junta, the town government, sponsored an afternoon of games for all of the children today — sack races, pinatas, etc. The children were all gathered in the main square playing, when a BLI company (the special forces of the Nicaraguan army) came into town. They had been dropped off at the town entrance, and were walking through town in single file, carrying their guns, bullets, some mortars. I was struck by how long their hair was — a funny thing to notice, but I

We hope the theme house will contribute to the process of bringing together the social, intellectual, cultural, and academic spheres of Williams life by promoting intense interaction within the natural context of shared residency. In this way, the theme house will not weaken, but will rather complement, the residential housing system. The size and diversity of the residential houses makes them appropriate sites for small scale, intermittent discussions ranging over a wide variety of issues. The theme house, in a complementary way, provides a setting for delving into a shared, broad concern in much greater depth and intensity.

Concern

To the Editor:

Toward the end of winter study, the Gay and Lesbian Union bulletin board beside the south side stairs of Baxter Hall was vandalized. The frame was broken and the glass was shattered. Members of the GLU discovered the damage and reported it to the Dean's Office and Security. The student responsible was asked by the Dean's Office to pay for the damages and to write a letter of apology to the GLU. As members of the GLU, we would like to thank the deans for their concern and prompt response.

Even though this particular incident has been officially resolved, however, we feel that something more needs to be said. This one act of vandalism was a particularly visible expression of anti-gay and anti-lesbian sentiment among many here at Williams. We are dismayed at the lack of any kind of public outcry over this effort to intimidate and silence the Williams gay community.

This incident should have caused concern among everyone at the college. The GLU's right to exist as a visible campus organization is the same as any campus organization's right to participate free of harassment in the life of school.

We wish to affirm the special role gays and lesbians have here at Williams and our intention to remain an integral part of the college.

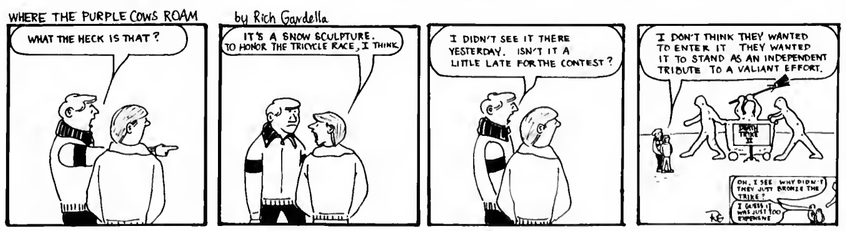
MASSPIRG

To the Editor:

Many people like to talk about student apathy here at Williams. We say, "Let's stop talking and start doing something!"

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) is a student organization which gives us just that opportunity to start doing something. Twenty-four PIRG chapters in the state and dozens of others across the country have published hundreds of ground-breaking reports and useful guides, passed scores of important laws in state legislatures, called state and often national media attention to environmental and consumer issues, and successfully promoted solutions to these and other problems affecting us all.



Behind everything the PIRGs do is the underlying principle that all students are citizens, and therefore their education should include experience in recognizing and solving some of society's problems. A MASSPIRG chapter here at Williams will give us that experience first hand.

MASSPIRG is a student funded organization. We would like to see a waivable fee of three dollars placed on the term bill to fund a Williams chapter. This fee can be waived by any student that does not agree with what MASSPIRG is doing. In this way MASSPIRG respects the value of all.

A petition drive will begin tomorrow (February 19) so that we can all express our support for establishment of a MASSPIRG chapter at Williams. With support from a majority of students, the faculty, and the administration, we can join the twenty-four other Massachusetts colleges — including UMass, Tufts, Boston College, and even Amherst — and prove that students can be effective on the issues we care about.

If you want to stop talking and start doing something, come to a meeting tonight at 7:30 in Baxter Lounge or sign the petition tomorrow!

Shoe Golf

To the Editor:

We here at East Two are amused, yet disturbed to say the least, about the egregious blunder in the February 11 article "Students dive into gutsy dorm fun." The article credited shoe golf and its practice, rules, knowledge and strategy to Fayerweather Two. This is utter fallacy at best. While it is true that we did not invent the game, East Two members are the real shoe golfers.

Starting in mid-September, we played steadily (twice a day) until heavy snows dampened socks and threatened pneumonia in November. We plan on picking up the sport again as soon as weather permits.

A few corrections to set the Record straight: the number of "flings", (we prefer to call them "shots" and "drives") is not determined before a round. We start from Baxter and golf back to East, up the stairs, down the hall, and into the wastebasket in the living room. We keep score (a good score is 15, but scores range anywhere from 13 to upwards of 25). Contrary to what John Watkins (jokingly, according to him) said, loose, heavy shoes provide the best result.

In the future, it would be nice if the Record researched its facts before printing articles such as this one. If you would like to write a correct article on the subject, feel free to contact a real shoe golfer.

Library, gym install stricter security

by Midori Sonoda

The College has instituted new protective measures in Sawyer Library and Lasell Gymnasium in response to recent security problems. The library installed a $22,847 security system to prevent borrowers from taking books without signing for them. Meanwhile, entrance to the gym is restricted to the Spring Street door on weekends and after six p.m. weekdays.

problems with theft and suffered many permanent losses. According to a recent library report, in the past five years an average of more than $6000 per year has been spent on replacements. In the last two years, more than 1,000 requests have been made each year for materials not on the shelves.

In that same period, 817 books and 613 periodical issues were labeled permanent losses. A book is considered permanently lost if it is not found for a year and periodical issues are thought permanently lost if they are missing at the times scheduled for binding, according to the report.

Sawyer Librarian Phyllis Cutler, had been proposing the 3M Whispertape System, just implemented, since 1983.

Cost no concern

In addition to the $22,847 price tag for the system itself, 800 to 1,000 hours of student labor to install targets will cost between $3,400 and $4,250. The price of the security system is about equal to four years of replacement expenditures, Cutler said. "The deprivation (of books) to users is more important than the financial cost. So many things are out of print now," she explained.

The 3M Whispertape system operates on an electromagnetic principle. However, magnetized material such as computer

Faculty open meeting talks major with CEP

by Meg Thomas

The Committee on Educational Policy held an open meeting last week with the faculty to elicit ideas for changing or keeping the major at Williams. This was a part of the CEP's ongoing curricular review, expected to continue through next year.

The main points of discussion at the meeting included the number of courses required for the major, the cumulative rigor of these a proposed minor.

The speakers agreed that the number of courses required for the major should not be reduced below the present level of nine or 10. History department Chairman Charles Dew pointed out that because an increased number of students study away or have advanced placement credit, departments have had to set a minimum number of courses that must be taken at Williams.

Older faculty members, who may remember when the number of required courses for a major was dropped from 12 to nine, seemed to be in favor of raising the number of courses needed for the major.

Philosophy professor Laszio Versenyi, however, said he believes the purpose of an undergraduate education is to give the students exposure to a discipline — not to produce full-fledged scholars, but to give students an idea of what it means to be a professional in one field.

Continuity and depth

Much of the meeting was spent discussing how to encourage a major with continuity and depth. The very nature of different disciplines makes the comparison of continuity and accumulation of courses between departments a problem, according to members of the CEP.

A difference exists between disciplines such as the social sciences, where depth is more difficult to define, and the natural sciences, where depth is fairly well-established. Several speakers warned against attempting to apply one definition of depth to all these groups.

One of the CEP's biggest concerns, in terms of cumulative rigor, is the integrity of the course numbering system, especially in two- and three-hundred level courses. In an extreme example, the committee cited one course which was a four-hundred level senior course in one department and was cross-listed as a two-hundred level course in another department.

College Council proposal

At last week's College Council meeting, the Council considered a motion to change the two minority representatives from appointed, non-voting members to voting members elected by minorities and foreign students at Williams. The Council decided to place the motion on an upcoming ballot, allowing the entire student body to vote on the issue.

Current representatives John Calderon '87 and Gail Henderson '87, who initiated the proposal, originally suggested that the minority representatives be chosen by the College community at large. However many Council members felt the interests of minorities could best be represented through an exclusive vote.

A similar referendum was held last year, with fewer than 50 percent of the student body responding, making the vote invalid. Calderon and Henderson shortened the wording of the previous proposal in an attempt to elicit greater response. In addition, the Council voted to place it at the top of the ballot, which will cover several other issues as well.

Blood-mobile visit

The Red Cross collected 269 units of blood during the Bloodmobile visit to Williamstown last week, with 69 first-time donors.

In a drawing at the end of the visit, Paul Rardin '87 won a valentine T-shirt made and donated by Leith Colen and autographed by Joanne Woodward. Tom Halg, Cheryl Salem '87 and Angie Hogencamp all won Red Cross mugs.

Spencer-Brooks-West won the traditional Vampire Sweepstakes with more than 35 percent of the residents contributing blood. Residents of the house will receive chocolate-chip cookies from The Orchards.

The next four finishers in the competition were Fayerweather, A-Gar-Wood, Sage and East. All six freshmen dorms finished in the top 10.

The Bloodmobile will visit Williamstown again April 15 and 16.

Bookstore doing well, say Fix and Dewey

by David Gelobter

Book-buying is moving along more smoothly this year at the Williams Bookstore, according to Dean of the College Stephen Fix. After student and faculty complaints about the operation of the bookstore last year, a faculty-student committee formed to devise ways to improve service and apparently has had some success.

Fix said no one has reported any complaints with the service or the availability of books at the Williams Bookstore this semester.

In the past, there were problems with missing books for several courses and confusion between professors and the bookstore. This semester, with the exception of a few courses, all books ordered arrived on time and in sufficient quantity. The few mix-ups that did occur have already been corrected, according to Joseph Dewey, owner of the The Williams Bookstore.

Dewey said the improved service is a result of new order forms and earlier deadlines for teachers in submitting syllabi. The earlier deadlines allow Dewey to contact the publishers and have them ship the books ahead of time. He described this semester as a new world without confusion.

Books here

Most of the books for this semester were in the bookstore before Jan. 1. Professors, with what Dewey called a few minor and expected exceptions, did not mind turning in course listings earlier than usual.

According to Dewey, the service in the bookstore has improved because of the high attendance rate of the runners who get books from the back of the store. In addition, the bookstore was open more hours for greater student convenience. Dewey estimated the average time each student spent in the bookstore was under twenty minutes.

He also said that the increased efficiency was helped by the positive attitudes of most students. "Students are great," Dewey said, "that means a lot to us."

Of course there are still some problems with the cost of books

Amazingly enough, the lines at the Williams Bookstore never got too much longer than this, cutting students' time in the store way down from last semester, according to owner Joseph Dewey. (Silver)

Computers conspire to create Eph collocation

by Jennifer Sills

Dating — a novel (or practically unknown) concept at Williams College? Many students would say yes. Somehow, neither the age-old practice of boy asking girl out, nor the more recent practice of girl asking boy out, seem to have taken root and flourished in the Williams soil. What happened upon the introduction of a computerized dating service? Ah well, the Williams tradition is certainly virile.

Actually, the founders of the Computer Dating Service, Daniel Wolsk '88, Michael Weber '88, Aaron Milenski '88, and Robert Mecarini '88, set it up in the spirit of fun, and not so much with the goal of uniting people in meaningful, long-lasting relationships. (After all, one can't expect marriage for a dollar!)

Wolsk said that he had friends in high school who had participated in computer dating services and enjoyed it, so he thought it would be fun to try it at Williams. When asked if he'd done it to make money, he replied that the money he and the others made did not come close to compensating for the amount of time they invested in writing and coordinating the program.

In order to participate in the service, each person filled out a questionnaire of 51 items with approximately five possible answers each, ranging from "very liberal" to "very conservative." These answers were then typed into the computer program and each person was matched up with five people of the opposite sex who had the most corresponding answers.

Participants were not necessarily on the lists of those whose names they had received. In general, however, a person was on the list of the number one name (the one who had the most matched answers) on his own list. The participants were given the names of the five people and it was left up to them to contact each other.

Class not considered

In matching the people, the service did not take class (e.g. freshman, sophomore, etc.) into consideration. Wolsk commented that they had decided that separating the classes would be too restricting. They also felt that by not separating classes, people would have the opportunity to meet members of different classes whom they might not otherwise meet. Wolsk and his friends especially felt that freshmen might like the idea of meeting upperclassmen. In total, 85 freshmen, 74 sophomores, 19 juniors, and 28 seniors — 120 men and 86 women — participated.

According to Tara Feret '88, a friend of Wolsk who has spoken with many of the participants, names of good friends were frequently among the five choices. Many people, Feret believed, took part in the service for the fun of seeing who would appear on their lists, and not really with the intention of asking the people out. She also stated that many of the participants were friends of the four students who ran the program.

In general, it appears that very few, (if any) of the participants actually contacted any of the people they were matched up with. Student reaction, however, was generally positive. "It was a different thing and it was fun to try," said Vicki Rummler '88. Others saw it as an opportunity to improve what they consider Williams' questionable dating situation. As Steve Groh '88 put it, "It was a good idea. It can't hurt anything around here!"

Others students perceived the service in a more lighthearted sense. "It was funny just to fill it out but I didn't really intend to follow up on it," said Seth Burns '89

Non-participants gave numerous reasons for their hesitation. Many simply felt that the service wasn't really serious. "I thought it was a good idea but I didn't do it because I thought people might not take it seriously " explained Terry Jessie '87

When asked if he thought he might run the program again, Wolsk replied that it was a possibility for next Winter Study. Until then, Williams students will have to rely on more traditional methods of dating.

Student vocalist sings with unique precision

by Tara Kazak

Valerie Anastasio '86 is a soprano who possesses the rare ability to sing from the heart. In her senior recital Sunday night in Brooks-Rogers recital hall, Anastasio fully displayed her tonal coloring and expressive capabilities, singing a diverse selection of very demanding songs from the 20th century.

Assisted by Tim Harbold '86 on piano, Anastasio opened her recital with five Banalites by Francis Poulenc. She sang the piece with the necessary grace, lightness, simplicity, and directness. Both soloist and accompanist carefully shaped Poulenc's simple melodies. Harbold played with strong clarity throughout. In "Chanson d'Orkenise," the piano's rippling effects complemented the soprano's delicate phrasing. Anastasio shaped her phrases especially well in "Sanglots" and "Hotel." She contrasted the soft dreaminess of "Sanglots" and the sentimentality of "Hotel" with the spirited "Fagnes de Wallonie" and the joyful "Voyage a Paris."

Anastasio displayed the height of her musicality in her performance of four physically demanding songs by Rachmaninoff. She sang these songs in Russian with a love and warmth that touched the listener. She delicately sang "The Lilacs" and elicited "The Answer" with warmth and grace. While her upper register was occasionally tight in "Before my Window," she opened up with a beautiful full sound in the heartbreaking "Oh, never sing to me again!" which was sung with poignant grief. Harbold's accompaniment was also very sensitive and effectively complemented Anastasio's shadings.

Trouble with Strauss

In contrast to her solid grasp of Rachmaninoff, Anastasio did not seem fully comfortable with the four songs of Richard Strauss. While possessing the lyrical Romantic quality necessary for these songs, Anastasio's voice lacked the necessary strength and depth. In "Allerseelen" and "Fur Funfzehn Pfennige" her upper register was sometimes tight and her phrase coloring was not as expressive as in her other pieces. She had more command of the last two Strauss songs, as she sang "Morgen" with great expression and "Heimliche Aufforderung" with fervor and energy.

In contrast to the evening's lyrical pieces, the program included a dramatic vocal work A Night in the Royal Ontario Museum written in 1983 by the American composer Nancy Van de Vate. This unconventional piece used a taped accompaniment of a collage of eerie and almost extra-terrestrial sounds. A dark auditorium and slides of the universe created the atmosphere of the interior of a museum. Anastasio exhibited her acting talents and outstanding stage presence in her powerful and compelling rendition of a woman trapped in a museum. In this work, she effectively varied the tone of her voice, which ranged from annoyance to anxiety to resignation.

Anastasio closed her program with five songs by the Chilean composer Juan Orrego-Salas. These songs highlighted the various contrasts of which Anastasio's voice is capable. In the lyrical "Prologo" and "La Gitana," her voice was beautiful and strong as it wove through the Latin American melodies. By contrast, her voice was quite light and sweet in "La Flor del Candil." In "La Novia"

Student groups jam at annual winter concert

by Jane Becker

Last Friday night, the seven Williams College singing groups performed in Chapin Hall at a gala celebration of Winter Carnival, the annual Jamboree. Even without the extra spice of visiting singing groups, the evening was a definite success.

The Springstreeters began the fun with four tunes highlighted by the soft, rich solo of Chris Gascon '88 on Elvis Costello's "Alison." These Springstreeters were much tighter musically than the Springstreeters of the Log performance a few months back. One of their prized newcomers Russell Werkman '88 kept the enthusiasm on tap with his uncontrollably happy feet.

Essence followed, explaining in song that they had been waiting for so long to sing us some of their songs. The group did a spirited version of "Take Me to the River" as well as the jazzy "At the Waldorf" with a difficult, fast last verse. With only two men and four women, Essence did not lack volume or stage presence because of their small size except when they attempted a semi-spoof on two movements from the Vivaldi Gloria. This piece, meant for a large chorus, only served to display the group's lack of accuracy. But their performance style carried through; especially funny were junior Helga Davis's deadpan cues.

The Early Music Ensemble showed us just how early their music is by dressing in nightgowns and yawning as they entered to the ringing of an alarm clock. Unfortunately, the ensemble reads their music, a practice which detracts from what otherwise could be a vibrant stage presence. The voices often did not blend or went sharp; the strong soprano sound tended to overpower the smaller sections. Songs such as "Sing the Enchanted" had an uneven texture too. Also, enunciation was a problem in a few of the pieces, especially since medieval music is less accessible to the Eph-audience than the music of the six other singing groups. Though this group leaves much room for improvement, the ensemble was still better than they were last year.

Ephlats

Next came the Ephlats, singing and snapping as they walked onstage. This coed group of twelve sang tightly and with seeming ease, especially in "Chattanooga Choo Choo." Their set of tunes started with two Valentine's Day choices: "Be My Valentine" as well as "My Funny Valentine," which featured an impressive solo by Vicky Rummier '88 whose voice texture fit the song perfectly. Scott Rigby '88 sang strongly on their final "This Night is Mine."

The new Williams Gospel Choir of seventeen entered and exited from the rear singing "Sign Me Up" and clapping their hands. Among the many new faces in this group was the freshman conductor, Michelle Thomas. At the piano was another student, Rodney Cunningham '88. The gospel choir shows much promise and will hopefully be a lasting contributor on campus. Rita Brown '88 and Erik Valdes '87 sang solos strongly. Occasionally, the men did not blend, as in "Steal Away," or the clapping was not sufficiently sustained, but the mood conveyed by the choir's music and their traditional rocking back and forth was joyous.

The all-female Ephoria sang four songs with spirit too. Diane Rosnagle '86 sang the solo on "Please Don't Go" gracefully and Maureen McDonnell '86 sang a humorous but long "Popsicle Toes." Their final choice was an old Williams Winter Carnival tune from 1900 in which the group's sound balanced well. It was, at times, hard to hear Ephoria's messages to the crowd, but their singing proved to be enjoyable all the same.

Finally, the Williams Octet (actually a group of ten) bounded onstage. The group had a very tight sound, especially on their final "Hodja," a rhythmic, jazzy piece boosted by a strong tenor solo by Gregg Walker '86. The group was definitely an animated, enthusiastic bunch.

In the finale, a Williams College first, the Springstreeters joined the Octet for a rendition of the Williams song "The Mountains." Werkman again caused many laughs by hoisting Walker atop his shoulders and dancing all over the stage. Overall, many strong performances made the evening thoroughly enjoyable.

The Ephlats, led by soloist Scott Rigby, croon the tunes at last Friday's Jamboree. (Somers)

The winning snow sculpture pays tribute to a respected — and much imitated — Roman tradition.

by Corinna Lamb

"This is the first Winter Carnival in a long time that actually has some Winter in it," said Professor John Stambaugh in his keynote address to open the weekend's ceremonies. Compared to last year's tropical weather, which made the obstacle course seem more like a mud slide, this year's abundance of snow was a cheerful sight.

No doubt the weather improved the skiing events at Brodie Mountain, and for snow-sculpting Michelangelos it was a gift from the gods (Roman Gods, that is). Using the carnival's theme to its full potential, students went haywire re-capturing Ancient Rome in all its festivities.

Frozen visions of orgies, gladiators, a roman nose, and a toga-clad purple cow could be seen all over campus, but the most creative (bizarre?) work, which won the sculpting contest, was given to us by the Sage A men (they're the ones who greeted President Oakley's inauguration with the "Way to go, Frank" banner - remember?). Squatting over a trough outside Baxter was an overindulger of good times in a reconstruction of a Roman vomitorium.

While the skiers raced down Brodie, equally fierce competition took place in the Freshman Quad, with the annual trike race, known this year as the "Chariot" race. Based on their costumes, it seemed that the contestents had just stepped out of either "Road Warrior," "Caligula," or a local comic strip. The "Trojans," appropriatly dressed in plastic garbage bags, won the race, although their chariot was dubious (a skateboard and a wheel tied to one runner's foot).

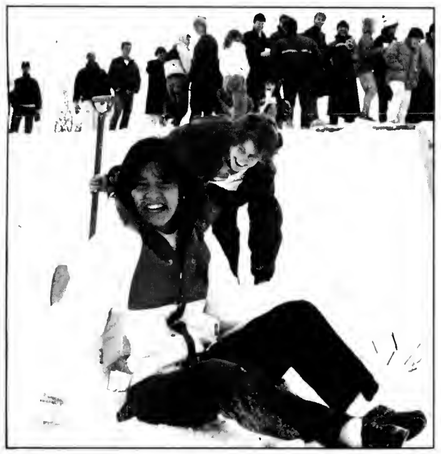
Kids' stuff

Best costume went to the members of the "Baby Finster" group, who wore diapers and baby bonnets and not much else. They pushed one member of their team around in a giant baby carriage. The members of another group, "The Kegs," were clothed in togas and attempted to ride a trike made from three kegs. Things got a bit kinky as Bill Hilty '88 tried whipping Robbie Hallagan '88 to make him pull the chariot, but his slave-driving had little effect.

The "Chariot of Fire" group, wearing British flags on their chests, won the prize for the best trike, but other entrants, like the Death Trike, looking like leftovers from the Death Squad, were also entertaining.

The faithful fans then moved down to Cole Field House for the rest of the races, ignoring the freezing temperatures. The obstacle course was very popular, although some participants had trouble grasping the complex set of rules. The race involved running around a baseball bat with one's forehead on the top, doing the bunny hop, running up and down a few hills and jumping some hurdles, among other things.

Things began to heat up as one unsportmanslike character kicked his opponent over as he tried running up the hill. Julie McGuire '88 battled it out with Jim Reichheld '87 as she knocked over the hurdle with a karate chop that would have made Bruce Lee proud. The race resulted in a tie, which was decided by a quick drink-off, although one team's cups were considerably smaller than the other's.



Passionate competition

The most erotic event was the Banana-Eating contest, although students were warned not to repeat the infamous act of Paul Meeks '85 the year before. "Keep your clothes on," warned

Man on the Quad

The Record recently showed students the 1986 "Men of Amherst" calendar and asked "Would you go out with any of these guys?"

Interviews by Caroline Koeppel; photographs by Jeff Somers.

"Yeah, we would. I wouldn't say no." — Anna Henriques '89.

"Yeah, I'd definitely go out with some of them. They're cute." — Brittany Peacock '89

"They're from Amherst. Why would we go out with them?" — Lisa West '89

"Yeah, I think they're good-looking. They must be kind of egotistical to be in this calendar." — Lisa Marraek '89

"I wouldn't even hang it in my bathroom ... They had to dig really deep to find the men that they found." — Julie Silverman '87

"Anyone could be in this calendar." — Jim Reichheld '87

The Men of Amherst: Are twelve too many?

The views expressed in the following article are those of the author and are not necessarily representative of the opinions of the Record editorial board. OK?

by Bill O'Brien

So stop whining already girls. While your male counterparts are gawking at the Sports Illustrated swimsuit issue, you can be pouring over the pages of the "Men of Amherst" calendar — all year long!

Yes, it has happened. Amherst, the little college down the road toward Boston, has produced a "Men of Amherst" calendar. The title itself is a contradiction in terms.

"It's really a gay idea," admits one Amherst female freshman, who begged not to be identified. "It's really weird. The golf team is a bunch of wimps. They put it out, and then they have the general studs of the campus in it."

The "general studs" were chosen by the captains of the women's golf team. The calendar was sold by both the men's and women's teams for fund-raising purposes. Eighteen men were photographed and the top twelve were put into the calendar.

"It's no big deal," claims pin-up Kevin Minnicus '89. "One of the girls on the golf team asked me. She said it was a fund-raiser, so I said I'd help out." When asked if he considers himself a sex symbol, Minnicus replied "No, not at all."

"He thinks he's Joe Stud," said my anonymous Amherst confidant.

Will Hannum '86 insists that he is not a stud. "They (the editors of the calendar) were looking for categories of looks. I'm the blond preppy guy who looks like he studies all the time."

OK.

Dave Washington '88 was asked if he would have been in the calendar with only a swimsuit.

"Ah, you mean if I were, like, in the swimsuit?" he replied. Thanks Dave, that will be all.

The response to the calendar from the female population has apparently been somewhat frosty (which may or may not be the standard response from the female population to all males at Amherst).

"I looked through it and didn't buy a copy," said Pam Hall '89. "I didn't think it was representative of the best looking guys on campus."

I should hope not.

According to Andrea Savage '86, "the general consensus is that it was a good idea. I think there are guys who are better looking on campus though."

In all honesty, the calendar is not as obnoxious as this article is. The exploited personalities are fully clothed for the most part. The photographs are black and white. The tone is sombre and respectful. The damn thing's a bore!

But what do I know? You be the judge. I'll be studying my Sports Illustrated in my room if you want to talk.

David O'Keefe, the coordinator of events. The winners were Britta Bjornlund '88 and Michael Harrington '88 who continued what they had started in last year's contest. Last year they ate a banana simultaneously with one end in each of their mouths, ending with a simple kiss. But one thing leads to another, so it seems, and this year they elaborated, eating the banana in the same manner but with a lot more, uh, passion. (Parental guidance was suggested.) After they won, O'Keefe offered them another banana so that they could continue their fun alone behind the field house.

Most people were reluctant to enter this contest, perhaps for lack of ideas about what to do with a banana. John Edie '88, ate his a la John Belushi, mimicing the cafeteria scene from Animal House "Can you guess what I am? ... a zit!" as he spit out his banana all over the crowd. Two other contestants took the masochistic route, eating the whole banana: skin, stems and all. One of them liked it so much that he ate two more, much to the disgust of spectators.

Students had a chance to show off their pectorals as they grunted in the tug-o'-war in an attempt to determine the "real" men and women of Williams. "The Disease " and "Morty's Revenge" fought it out, but Morty evidently got killed by the disease, as his team members fell. The sight of Tom Newhall '88 sprawled on the ground epitomized the agony of defeat. The team of seniors beat the juniors (the one year advantage) but surprisingly lost to a mostly freshman team in the finals. The women's war was even rougher, as members from Women's Hockey took on other powerful Ephwomen.

The tug-o'-war ended Friday's events, as students returned home to recover from frostbite, (optimistically) check their mail for Valentines, and look for sheets to wear to the toga party.

Broomball

On Saturday, most students were either recovering from the night before, wondering how, when and where they lost their togas, or preparing for the house parties, but some athletic diehards made it down to the hockey rink for the broomball championships. The "West" group, dressed in yellow, first crushed "We Love Liz," in the semi-finals, and then went on to defeat the group from Hopkins, otherwise known as "The Schroeder and McEvoy clans and their friends." Unfortunately, the latter group hadn't brought enough women to satisfy the two-women requirement per team, so this reporter got drafted to play (not entirely of free will.)

Players became feisty, as one fight erupted in the middle of the game, but it just added to the raunchy spirit of the game. All in all,"It was a pretty routine game for the West squad,"said team member Brooks Foehl '88. "West" won 4-1.

So the games ended, and most of the athletes went back into hibernation until next February. Sunday night, students groaned as they tramped to Sawyer Library to read 300 pages of overdue Psych 101 reading.

she contrasted excited and agitated fortissimos with expressive pianissimos. The final "Madrigal del Peine Perdido" captured the sensitive quality of her singing as she carefully shaped each phrase and left the listener with a sense of peace.

Anastasio has been a featured soloist with the Berkshire Symphony and Choral Society and has performed in studio recitals and summer musical theater productions. She currently studies with Terrence Dwyer. Later this spring, Anastasio will sing the role of Blonde in Mozart's The Abduction from the Seraglio.

CEP

Another concern is that, in many departments, the major requirements are so broad that majors do not have any basic knowledge in common. CEP members noted that, of the seven largest departments, only psychology has one senior seminar. The other departments offer a choice of several seminars.

Minor possibilities

The other question on which the meeting focused was double majors and the possibility of replacing them with a minor system. Most faculty present seemed to be very opposed to the double major, with Political Science professor Kurt Tauber claiming that students who double major are simply doing so to further their career opportunities.

Most faculty believed a minor would take the pressure off of the students to double major. Economics professor Gordon Winston said that the minor would be advantageous in helping to ascertain which students in a department are more or less serious.

Professor William Wagner expressed his fear that the minor might lead more people away from the smaller departments and into the more career-oriented minors. English department chairman Peter Berek suggested that the minor might be used as a way of achieving the distribution requirements. He said a minor could be required in a different division than a student's major or the administration could insist on interdisciplinary minors.

CEP Chairman Thomas Jorling said he was happy with the tone of the meeting and pleased to see faculty making suggestions for the good of the collective whole and not just individual departments. The CEP will will hold an open meeting tonight at 8:00 in Currier Ballroom to get students' views on the proposed curriculum changes.

disks can be carried through the sensing units unharmed. A section of the circulation desk is magnetized, and disks, videotapes or other magnetized items should not be left there, Cutler said.

Only those areas of the library's collection with a history of great loss, such as music and art, will be completely targeted, Cutler said. In areas with lower records of loss, random books will be targeted. Since the targets are installed in the binding, books with targets cannot be identified, and targets cannot be removed without ripping apart the binding, she said.

Cutler said 8,000 to 10,000 targets already have been attached. "I don't see it as shocking, since it's been in the libraries I've worked in and is the norm of libraries today," she said.

However, Cutler said she does not think the new system reflects the effectivenes of the honor code. She said removing books without authorization is not like stealing or cheating because those who remove the books do have the privilege to use them.

Gym not as bad

Although there are not a lot of problems right now, according to Athletic Director Robert Peck, in the past the gym has been vandalized, and property has been stolen. In addition, many unauthorized people have used its facilities. Peck said the only problem now is wallets being stolen from outside the squash courts.

"We don't want to restrict anyone's access to the gym," Peck said, "but without the recent changes we would have no way of knowing who is coming in or out." The gym's hours remain the same, but after six and on weekends only the Spring Street entrance will be open.

Anyone entering the gym must sign in, allowing the athletic department to monitor use patterns, Peck said. The other doors cannot be locked because of fire regulations, but eventually they will be alarmed. In the meantime, there are monitors at the other doors to prevent people from opening them, Peck said.

Peck proposed the measures and discussed them with students on the Committee on Undergraduate Life, Security, and Buildings and Grounds.

The changes were made partially in anticipation of the new gym, Peck said. In the new facility, entrance will be through Spring Street past a control booth, where students will be required to leave their I.D.'s.

JA's

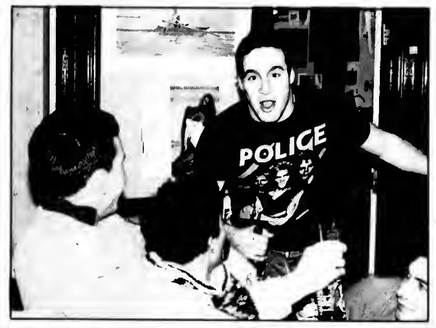
on the Selection Committee should be as high as it is now, nearly 70 percent, Jeffress said.

More than 90 percent of those surveyed felt that candidates to be JA's should be interviewed by the Selection Committee.

The results of the part of the survey dealing with the selection of the Selection Committee itself will not be put into use until next year, according to Jeffress.



Good qualities

According to the survey, the best characteristics for a JA are friendliness, enthusiasm and dedication, while the worst are intolerance, immaturity and unavailability.

Athletes and partyers are over-represented in the JA's, while intellectuals and minorities are under-represented, according to the vast majority of those responding to the survey.

Goodspeed, however, said he feels that no group is unfairly over-represented among the JA's. "I don't believe that athletes or any other group is over-represented. When you consider that more than 50 percent of all Williams students play some type of sports, it's no wonder that there are a lot of athletes in the JA's."

While a balance between male and female JA's is necessary, the exact breakdown of the applications according to sex is still unknown. Goodspeed did say, within certain limits, there is not a fixed number of spots reserved for males or females.

Freshmen socialize in their entry (Silver)

Requirements

Any sophomore was eligible to apply to be a JA. The application consists of a personal statement from the candidate, a peer reference and a reference from a current or former JA.

Now that the applications are completed, the Selection Committee will begin to read through them. Once all the candidates have been discussed, a preliminary, non-binding open vote will be taken.

Next, each member of the committee will take five or six applications and personally read all the material, highlighting the applicants good and bad features. Each member must then make a presentation of their assigned candidates, and then a binding open vote will be taken. An application must receive a two-thirds majority vote to make it to the final ballot.

Final voting takes place in secret, and each committee member must go to the Dean s' Office to select his or her 54 top choices.

Goodspeed said he makes an effort to ensure that each applicant is personally known by someone on the committee. Goodspeed said, "We would never consider anyone on just their paper application. If one of the applicants was not well known by any of the committee members, we would seek out advice on the applicant from other sources."

He said this is an attempt to eliminate any advantage that applicants who are familiar with the committee members might have.

in the same entry will be more likely than other students to discuss aspects of the course outside of the classroom.

The professors teaching the course will also be the freshmen's faculty advisors as part of an effort to bring together intellectual and social life. Gaudino Committee member Ed Stein '87 said, "It is our hope that they (the advisors) will have a greater presence than the normal faculty advisor."

Tauber also plans to have teaching assistants in the courses who will devise a variety of programs relevant to the houses and classes, such as speakers and films open to the public. Junior Advisors will have gone through the regular selection process and will apply to be in the freshman college.

The committee chose freshmen for this experiment because, according to Assistant Professor of English and committee member D.L. Smith, "We wanted to reach students just coming to Williams and influence their attitude towards the educational possibilities at Williams."

'Not Elitist'

The committee is concerned that the experiment not be seen as an elitist or honors type of program, Tauber said. The desired group participating will be a cross-section of the freshman class, so that the experience can be compared to other freshmen in evaluating the experiment, he said.

According to Tauber, "If there is a characterization (of the students in the freshman college), it will be a higher level of risk-taking in the students and in the parents."

The idea for the freshmen college came primarily from a similar program at St. Lawrence University in Canton, NY. "There was an incredible awakening at St. Lawrence ," Stein said. "This program was a catalyst for change."

we can do ... they need the space." Woodard said the House officers would prefer the new entry to go in the Dodd Annex. "It's much more like an entry," said Woodard, citing the Annex's communal bathrooms and Sewall's larger and more isolated rooms.

"Sewall has several senior picks now," he said, warning of some resentment on the part of upperclassmen if the senior room picks were given to freshmen. He also stated that the 11 beds lost would mean 11 fewer freshmen places in the house during the inclusion process.

Provost Neil Grabois, who is directing the new entry's formation, refused comment, saying there will be more discussion before a final decision.

The increased space will mean that the four rooms currently being used in the basement of Lehman will be unoccupied next year. While Sewall and the Dodd Annex are the sites currently under discussion, Grabois has not yet made a decision on the final location of the new entry.

but Dewey and Fix attribute this to the isolation of Williamstown and changes in the publishing industry. According to Dewey, the 25 percent mark-up he charges is almost universal.

Solution?

One solution to the price problem suggested by some members of the bookstore committee is that the Pooh Perplex become even more active and organized so that more books can be recirculated among students.

The faculty-student Bookstore Committee worked with Dewey throughout the first semester to ensure that the second semester ran smoothly. "The cooperation between the bookstore and the campus is just wonderful," Fix said.

did. I guess they've been in the mountains a long time. They walked down the road to where it ends at the river, crossed six at a time in the boats carved from tree trunks, and continued on the other side, walking out into the mountains. As soon as the last game finished, all the kids rushed over and watched in silence as the soldiers walked. We watched too, mesmerized by the sight of so many young men walking out into the mountains to surround the town and protect it from a Christmas Eve attack.

And of course, life goes on. Chanita, Edgar's mother, cooked a huge dinner — rice, beef, salad, and "chica," a fermented (sometimes very fermented!) corn drink that gets served at every celebration. We had the midnight mass at 8:00 p.m., partly because nobody in Paiwas ever stays up until midnight, and partly because everyone has to go home and do vigilance. The people filled the church — kids sitting on the floor, babies sleeping in mother's arms, men standing at the back. Jim Feltz, the parish priest, spoke of Christmas as the gift of peace to all people, a peace that each one of us has to bring to our world. And there we were — Witness for Peace, doing no more than being with the people to celebrate Christmas with them, to share in their fear and their strength. Christmas Eve — peace on earth, good will to all. The contra are seven kilometers out of town.

Bocana de Paiwas, Christmas Day

More food, drink, games, and soldiers. And so many images — traveling on roads that are dangerous, in our ambulance with the white flag often flown by church workers in the war zones. Spending Christmas in this town, safe only because of the young soldiers with their guns. Watching my friends continue to plan their cooperatives, educate their children, live with dignity and generosity. Being part of Witness for Peace, able to do no more than be here. What does it mean to talk of peace in Paiwas, when my country calls for the violent destruction of all their hopes?

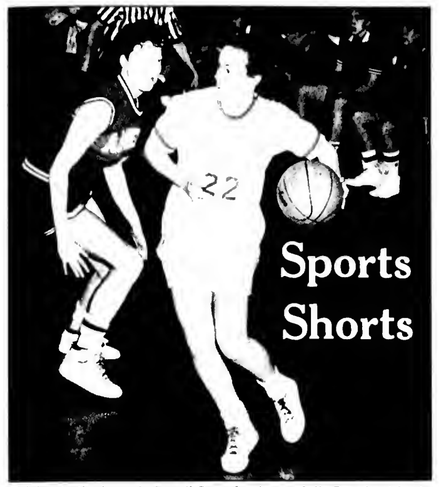
Managua, December 26

Leaving Paiwas was so hard this time. I am scared, knowing more clearly that next time I come someone I know may have died.

Last night, we had another big dinner, this time at Aristina's, the mother of Lucilla and Juan Carlos. Julie and he were playing guitar again, everyone joining in. Five BLI soldiers came in, obviously friends of the family. They joined in the singing, and Aristina told me about Maco, a soldier who became special friends with Juan Carlos and sang with him whenever he passed through town. He was killed in the mountains surrounding Paiwas a few months ago. Now the other five never fail to stop in and visit with Juan Carlos when they pass through. They all knew the Paiwas song, and sang it together. Today we drove back to Managua (with no delays) and the five of them went out to the mountains to reinforce the soldiers that have been there since Christmas Eve. The contra are still there.

Managua, December 28

I've been thinking a lot about what Warren (another Witness for Peace volunteer) said today, about having worked for two years to end U.S. aggression and only having watched it grow worse. The disinformation, the communist scare, the money going to the contras. What is our work in the face of this discouragement? There are few concrete results.



So I think of Bocano de Paiwas. The words of Eduardo, a member of the town council, to the last short term delegation from Witness for Peace that was there — "our people do not want this war, spread the word in your country that we wait for the day of peace." In Paiwas they haven't given up. They work and work to improve their lives, they watch as the compas march out into the hills.

Wrestling

by Scott Mozarsky

The wrestling team finished the regular season on a down note Saturday as it lost to both Wesleyan and Amherst in a Little Three tri-meet. Although the match was disappointing resultwise, Coach Joseph Dailey and the team saw some fine individual performances that provide promise for a strong finish in the New England Championships next weekend at Trinity.

The Amherst match, which Williams lost 24-15, was highlighted by the standout performances of captain Dan MacDonnell '87, junior Mark Tompkins, and freshman Jeff Steele. MacDonnell and Tompkins each outclassed their opponents while, Steele beat two-time All-New England wrestler Roger Normand with a decision.

Veterans Jon Stanley '87 and Evan Zahner '87 and first-year wrestlers Jimmy Walker, John Dillon, and Ben Pearlman lost against Amherst, but wrestled extremely well. According to Tompkins, "the way we wrestled against both teams today, even in losses, shows that we are coming together as a team and it should bode well for the New Englands.

The Wesleyan match, which went to the Cardinals 34-9, was dominated by wins from Stanley and Pearlman, and gritty performances, although in losing efforts, from Dillon, Tompkins, Walker, sophomore Scott Mozarsky, and freshman Marc McDermott. Coach Dailey seemed impressed by the way his wrestlers hung tough while trying to overcome the adversity of many injuries and two forfeits. "I think our superior conditioning is starting to show through and hopefully we are peaking in time for the New Englands," said Stanley.

On the 70th anniversary of the Wesleyan-Williams dual meet series, both the men's and women's squads defeated their Cardinal rivals and earned Little Three Championships, showing the tremendous depth of coach Carl Samuelson's teams.

In closing out a 6-4 season, the women added three more New England championship qualifiers to their ranks. Andrea Raphael '86 sprinted her way to a berth in the 50 breast, and Jean Lemieux '89 qualified in the 100 IM.

Sophomore Janet Wiener also joined a strong Williams diving contingent by surpassing the conference scoring requirement. These three will join the rest of the women qualifiers in their fifth consecutive title defense.

Freshmen dominated the day for the men's team. Doug Northrop '89 turned in blazing times in both the 200 IM and the 100 fly and Darren McSpedon '89 churned his way to a victory in the 50 free and swam well in the 100 back.

The freshmen relay squad of Dave Brown, Mike O'Malley, Will Dudley, and Chris Giglio capped the day's events by setting a freshmen record in the 400 free relay with a time of 3:18.4. Earlier, Giglio, O'Malley, Brown, and Tim Shaw '89 tried to break the freshmen 400 Medley Relay record but fell short.

The men finish the season at 7-1 and remain home next weekend while the women compete at the New England championships. In two weeks the Ephs travel to Springfield to try and recapture the New England crown they lost last year for the first time in seven years.

Women's Basketball

by Al Mottur

Dropping its record to 3-11, the women's basketball team hosted and lost 76-50 to archrival Amherst this past Saturday. The Ephwomen could not contend with the Lady Jeffs' potent combination of strong inside play and deadly outside shooting and as a result found themselves trailing 39-17 at the half.

The Williams offense worked much better in the second half as it found ways to evade Amherst's tough man-to-man defense, freeing guards Julia Beasely '89 and Kim Hatch '88 for short jumpers. In the end, however, the Ephs were stymied by an inability to get the ball inside effectively without turning it over and by the fact that their opponent's lead was simply too great to be overcome.

Earlier in the week, the women defeated the Bantams of Trinity Wednesday night at Laselli in overtime by a score of 71-66. The game was close for most of the first stanza, as Williams emerged with a 32-28 lead at the half.

As the second half wore on, neither team could grab control of the contest as they each held small leads for short periods of time. Williams did lead by seven with 4:40 remaining but succcumbed to the Bantam's tough trapping defense. And with less than ten seconds remaining on the clock, Trinity's Sarah Mayo scored to tie the game at 59 and send it into overtime.

In OT the team was paced by Hatch, who scored five straight points to provide a lead the squad would never relinquish. The Ephs were also led by strong performances from Nancy Hedeman '89 who scored 19 points and grabbed a game high 17 rebounds and Missy Crouchley '89 who tied for the lead in scoring with 24.

This week the team plays three games: tonight at Smith, this Thursday at home against Skidmore at 7:30 and on Saturday at Lasell against Tufts at 2:00.

6th in Nation

Squash loses to Amherst, tops Wesleyan

by Al Mottur

Faced with competition against the top teams in the nation last week, the women's squash team aquitted itself well, emerging with a 6-4 individual match record and the number six ranking in the nation.

Last weekend found the Ephwomen traveling to Amherst to vie for the Little Three Championship. The squad trounced Wesleyan 9-0 but fell to an inspired Amherst team by a 7-2 score. Alison Buckner '89 and Sue O' Brien '86 were the only two players to win against the Lady Jeffs.

Some of the players expressed slight disappointment over the Amherst match but gave their opponents the credit they deserved. "We were surprised we lost to Amherst but they were a good team that played really well," said number two player Carrie Cento '86.

Earlier in the week, the Ephs played host to Trinity—the number three ranked team in the nation—and lost 8-1. Freshman Kathy Paper, playing at number nine, recorded the only victory for the team. Captain and number three player Laura Rogers '86 wasn't too upset over the match, considering the fact that Trinity was one of the top teams in the nation. "We lost, and we couldn't have expected to win. They are a great team," she said.

6th in Howe Cup

Before the Trinity match, the team competed in the A division in the Howe Cup at Yale. The Howe Cup is the effective women's national collegiate squash tournament and the Ephwomen finished sixth, thus making them the sixth ranked team in the nation.

In the tourney, the team fell convincingly to the top three of Harvard, Yale, and Trinity. But that was to be expected. The squad then gave fourth-ranked Brown a tough match and almost upset fifth-ranked Princeton before losing 4-3.

The highlight of the weekend and the season came when the team defeated Dartmouth 4-3 in its third try of the year against the Big Green. With the matches tied at three, number five player Amanda Griggs '86 was the last Ephwomen to take to the courts. Playing what Rogers called "a great match," Griggs outlasted her opponent by a hard-fought 3-2 score, giving Williams the victory and the number six ranking.

"The Cup is what we looked towards all year, as we set ourselves the goal of performing well. And we did," said Rogers. According to an obviously elated coach Renzie Lamb, "It was an outstanding performance by our kids. They played great and have every reason to be ecstatic."

The team will conclude its already successful season when it travels to Smith tonight for a 7:30 contest before returning home for a 2:00 game with Tufts Saturday afternoon.

Hockey

The Ephs played a weak first period, allowing the Continentals to control the puck and the tempo of play. Although Williams came out sluggishly, Hamilton was only able to net one goal, at 3:09 of the first period. Eph goalie Morrison had a fine period of play, turning away 11 shots to keep the Ephs within striking distance.

Williams took control of the game in the second period, managing to outshoot the Continentals by a 2-1 margin. But due to the spectacular play of Hebert in the Hamilton goal, the Ephs couldn't light up the scoreboard.

At 11:06 of the third period, Hamilton scored an insurance goal, giving them a mental edge and changing the momentum of the game. They scored again at 1:05 to wrap up the win.

The Ephs travel to Babson College tonight and play at Westfield State on Saturday.

Runners top Union 119-93

by Stewart Verdery

The women's track team continued to dominate its competition at the Union Invitational last Wednesday, defeating six other squads en route to a 119-93 decision over Union. Williams captured eight of the thirteen events and used superior depth to claim points in back of the first place finishes.

Dawn MacAuley '89 took two events, running the 50m hurdles in 8.5 and the 400 in 1:02.5 to total 20 points for the Ephs. Sue Northen '89 was the only Williams participant to place in the field events, winning the triple jump at 33'3 1/4" and taking second in the long jump with a leap of 15'3 1/2".

Joan Davis '88 also won two events, blazing past the field in both the 200 (27.3) and the 50 (7.1). Becky Conklin '87 ran a personal best to win the 3000 at 10:49.3, and Sarah Pierce '88 claimed the 1500 meters with a time of 5:04.3. The two-mile relay team finished first at 11:01.0, and the mile relay took second.

The meet was relatively close throughout, as Union and Albany both scored well in the field events to take early control. After the first four events, Williams found themselves in third place. However, during the running events, the Ephs slowly caught up to the leaders, taking the lead after the 400. No challenge was made by the other squads, and the meet ended in the hands of Williams.

Northen, Pierce, and Conklin qualified for the ECAC Division 3 championships with their performances. The women host seven other schools this Sunday at the Williams Invitational, a field that may include a very powerful Tufts squad as well as Amherst, Wesleyan and others.

Men go to Maine

In an interesting change of pace, the men's team went to Bates Saturday to compete in a dual meet with Amherst and Wesleyan against Bates, Bowdoin, and Colby. After just having beaten their Little Three rivals last week, the Ephs now joined their efforts with the Jeffs and Cardinals.

Williams had two participants take events. Andre Lopez '87 won the 800 with a personal best of 1:55.77 and Ted Arrowsmith '88 captured the 3000 with a time of 8:44.46. Joe McGinn '88 was the only Eph to finish second, as he threw the weight 44'6 1/4". Third place finishers were John Servin '89 in the 800 at 1:58.12, Ed Tonelli '86 in the 1000 at 2.35.39 and Jeff Etemad '89 in the 400 at 52.48.

Also, four Williams runners competed on the two relay teams which both were victorious. The efforts of the Ephs, however, was not enough to push the Little Three team to victory. Colby, Bates, and Bowdoin garnered 88 points to 48 for the Little Three team.

A number of Ephs have qualified for the Division Three New England Championships at Bates. Lopez, Servin, Tonelli, Arrowsmith, McGinn, Tom Pingree '86, John Fisher '87, Ken Alleyne '88, Mark Gilrain '87 and John Ellison '86 all will compete in this New England-wide invitational.

Skiers win 5th at home Carnival

Williams played host to a top-flight field of Division I skiers this weekend at Brodie Mountain, with the University of Vermont emerging victorious on the men's side while Middlebury topped the women's field. The Williams team placed fifth overall in both men's and women's competition. The weekend proved especially fruitful for the men's alpine team, as they tied UVM for first place in Saturday's slalom event.

Friday's events began with the women's 10K nordic race; the Ephwomen skied well enough to finish fourth. Kathy Wolf '88 led the team with an eighth place finish, followed by captain Beth Schmidt '86 in 13th and Ann Arnason '89 in 29th.

Friday's giant slalom saw freshman Mari Omland grab second place behind UVM's Jana Caldwell. Freshmen Amy Duncombe and Lynda Glass rounded out the scoring with eighth and 25th place finishes, respectively. The women's team ended up placing fourth in the giant slalom team standings.

Schmidt finished the first leg of Saturday's relay tied for third place. She tagged off to Arnason for the second leg. Wolf skied a strong final leg to give the Ephwomen a well-deserved fourth place. In the slalom event, Williams tied Bates for fifth place. Omland finished sixth, while captain Annie Gilbert '87 placed 23rd and Duncombe finished in 24th. In the overall team standings, Williams placed fifth behind Middlebury, UVM, UNH, and Dartmouth.

Mac Nash '88 returned to form in Friday's 15K nordic race, finishing 14th in a deceptively close race. Fredrik Eaton '86 finished 19th in one of his better races this year. Ole Halvorsen '86 placed 27th to round out the scoring, in which the team copped sixth place. In Friday's giant slalom Williams grabbed fourth place, with Helge Weiner '87 finishing fifth and Tim Hill '86 racing to 12th, while Martin Magoun '87 took 20th.

In Saturday's relay, the Ephmen got off to a slow start on Halvorsen's leadoff leg, but Eaton and Nash skied strong races to bring the team to a sixth place finish. In the slalom, Hill placed third, while Magoun grabbed eighth and Weiner 10th. This gave the team their second first-place tie of the season with UVM in a slalom event. In the overall team standings, the Ephmen placed fifth behind UVM, Middlebury, UNH, and Dartmouth.

This weekend, the team travels to Middlebury for the Eastern Championships/Middlebury Carnival for their last carnival race before the NCAA Championships.

Cagers rout Jeffs 66-51, winning another Little 3

by Cliff Peale

Led by the play of freshman Bill Melchionni and senior Tim Walsh, the basketball team ripped the Lord Jeffs of Amherst on Saturday by a 66-51 count, giving coach Harry Sheehy his second outright Little Three title in his three years at Williams.

The win, combined with a convincing 86-65 destruction of RPI on Tuesday, gave the Ephs a 12-8 record and left alive, but slim, their chances for a berth in the ECAC playoffs. Clark and Tufts come to Lasell tonight and Saturday, and the Ephs need at least one win to contend for a playoff spot.

The game Saturday started with both teams feeling each other out, neither able to take a significant lead. Walsh got the Ephs out of the gate well by hitting two jumpers while drawing three fouls on Jeff point guard Bobby Weston. But led by the tough rebounding of big men Jamie Sullivan and Jim Cook, the Jeffs stayed within four points.

The Ephs kept the lead, however, holding off six Amherst chances to tie or take the lead. Free throws by Walsh and junior Brandt Johnson stretched the lead to 22-14 and forced a Jeff timeout with 11:27 on the clock.

Dickens Mathieu of Amherst hit two jumpers and drew a Walsh charge to narrow the lead to four, and with co-captain Greg Lang '87 out with foul trouble, Sullivan and Cook were having their way inside. John Ciulla '87 then stole the ball and hit a three-point play to stretch the lead to four. The half ended with the Ephs up by one at 31-30.

Hitting the boards

The Ephmen came back from the intermission determined to hit the boards hard, and Lang and Johnson obliged, each making layups off offensive boards to set a 36-32 Eph lead at 16:32.

Sheehy later called this improved board work the key to the game. "We've really improved inside," he said. "When we started playing our inside game, we were okay." He also pointed to the fine board work of Melchionni, who dominated the second-half rebounding, collecting 14 in all.

Four points by John Ciulla '87, combined with a Walsh backdoor layup, helped the Ephs to widen the lead. Johnson hit from the lane for a 48-36 advantage with only 10:46 on the clock, and the game was, for all practical purposes, over.

With Williams spreading the court and Walsh driving the lane at will, the Jeffs had no chance. The final score was 66-51, and Sheehy was obviously very pleased. "We had to shoot the ball better than we did in the first half," he said, noting that the Ephs were only 10-for-27 before halftime.

RPI goes down

If there was a sense of the win being routine, it was even stronger on Tuesday night when the Ephs routed RPI 86-65 behind balanced scoring. Walsh collected 29, Ciulla had 24, and Johnson and Melchionni collected 15 and 12, respectively.

Sheehy was especially impressed with Walsh's play. "He's having his best year," he said. The Ephs also relied heavily on Ciulla, who hit five straight jumpers in the second half to break the game open. "John shot the lights out," continued Sheehy.

That kind of hot shooting will be needed this week, because Clark and Tufts are both New England powerhouses. Next week the Ephs will conclude their season at Wesleyan.

Lady Pucksters win two at home

by Michele Barry

The women's hockey team had a victorious week, beating RPI 4-2 on Wednesday and Colgate 4-3 on Saturday.

In the RPI game, the Ephwomen were slow to start, and RPI got the first goal to take a 1-0 lead. However, a centering pass by Lisa Marr '86 set up Sally Hart '86, who scored Williams' first goal, sending the teams into the locker rooms tied at one. The Ephwomen came back on the ice to dominate the second and third periods with goals by Beth Ebel '86, Michele Barry '87, and Catherine Eaton '88.

With a 4-1 lead and seven minutes left in the game, Williams got a double penalty and RPI scored their second goal. Co-captain Ebel commented: "The team really played well together. After we scored our first goal, we took control of the rest of the game and totally dominated RPI."

Physical game against Colgate

The team also satisfied the crowd at the Winter Carnival game against Colgate. The game was physically demanding and evenly matched in play, but the Ephwomen dominated the goal scoring. Marr and Leslie Fernandes '87 both scored in the first period to give Williams a 2-0 lead.

In the second period, Haley Clifford '87 was rewarded for her good play when her long, low shot from the blue line went in to give the Ephs three goals. Fernandes scored a second time. Colgate then scored while Williams had a player in the penalty box to bring the score to 4-1 at the end of the second period.

In the third period, Colgate capitalized on a slight weakening of Williams' defense by scoring two quick goals near the end of the game. The Ephwomen pulled together, and kept Colgate from scoring again, to win the game 4-3. Ebel said she was "pleased with the comeback we are making at the end of the season; we're finally playing as a team." Ebel attributed the victory over the powerful Colgate team to Williams' high level of intensity. She noted the excellent performance of the line of Marr, Hart, and Heidi Wagner '87 and of Fernandes and Clifford.

The next game for the team is at home on Saturday against the University of Connecticut.

Ephs shut out 2-0 by Panthers

by Rick Orluk and Jamey Gallop

Unable to find the back of the opponent's net, the men's hockey team dropped two more games last week, 3-0 to Hamilton and 2-0 to Middlebury, as their record slid to 2-15-3 on the season.

Before a big Winter Carnival crowd on Friday, the Ephs faced a Middlebury squad they had tied earlier in the season. The Panthers opened the scoring at 6:30 of the first period on a freaky goal which found the back of the Eph net after it caromed off the skate of an Eph defenseman.

For the second game in a row, the Ephs outshot their opponents, this time by a 39-27 margin. In the last three games, Williams has found it almost impossible to score, as they have recorded 129 shots resulting in just one Eph goal.

Eph goaltender Mark Morrison '88 continued to turn in fine performances. However, with the lack of offensive punch, he has not recorded a well-deserved win. In the past three games, he has allowed just six goals.

Teammates Will Putnam '89 (14) and Chris Conway '89 (25) look to control the puck during their team's 2-0 loss to Middlebury on Friday night. (Radomisli)

Down 3-0 to Hamilton

On Tuesday evening, the Ephs hosted Hamilton and had the tough luck to face Continental goaltender Guy Hebert, who turned in a perfect performance, shutting out the Eph skaters 3-0.

Theme house decision postponed

by Debbie Snyder
and Virginia Demaree

The selection committee for the proposed theme house decided Friday to defer accepting or rejecting either of the two applications submitted until late March or early April. It did decide, however, that, if a theme house proposal is accepted, it will not take over a co-op, as had been proposed earlier.

Only two applications were submitted by the Feb. 14 deadline, one for a Latin America theme house and the other for a Science and Technology house. One of the applicants for the Latin America theme house, Silvia Hernandez '88, said nobody showed up at a meeting she and Soon Kim '88 held for those interested in the Latin American theme house. "We are thinking about waiting until our senior year," Hernandez said.

The Science and Technology proposal was filed by seven students, including two members of the Gaudino Committee, Ed Stein and Mike Weber '87. Before the decision to defer selection was announced, Stein said he did not want political considerations, which might stem from Gaudino Committee members benefitting from a Gaudino Committee proposal, to limit the theme house's chances for success.

Sara Suchman '86 looks on at Co-op antics. The Deans have said the Gaudino theme house will not take over a Co-op next year. (Silver)

Weber concurred, saying, "What's most important is that Ed and I have no part in the selection process. They're (the committee) only going to accept a good proposal. Personally, not speaking for the group, if there's an objection, I'll withdraw. I'm not certain I should, but I will."

Why deferral?

The reasons for deferring the decision, according to Assistant Dean William Darrow, chairman of the selection committee, were a lack of development in both proposals and a feeling that students have just started to discuss the issue of a theme house. Darrow said he believes more students may wish to apply if the deadline is extended and the results of co-op housing are announced first.

Because the theme house, if there is one, will not occupy a co-op, there are still six co-ops available for seniors next year. The Deans' Office and Housing announced yesterday that 59 students had been placed in co-ops for next year, out of 144 applications.

The committee is considering putting the theme house in a remodeled wing of the Thomp-

CEP open meeting draws small crowd

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The Committee on Educational Policy held an open meeting last week to discuss the role of the major at Williams College. The meeting to gather student opinion was part of the Committee's review of the curriculum, which will continue through next year.

Turnout at the meeting was low, with almost as many CEP members present as students. The main topics for discussion were the possibility of a minor as an alternative for the double major, the difficulties that small departments have attracting majors, the role of advising in students' decision-making, and the problem of overenrollment in many of the more popular majors, which include English, history, political science and economics.

The CEP and students discussed allowing a minor as an alternative to the double major. CEP member Gail Newman acknowledged the advantages of a minor program, but she urged the College to allow a minor without eliminating the double major. She said her concern stems from knowledge that most of the majors in the smaller departments are double majors and elimination of the double major would cut enrollment in these departments even further.

Lisa Leonard '86, a member of Gargoyle Society, said a minor program would allow students to major in a field of interest while opening up career opportunities with a minor.

Grounding vs. intro

Students discussed whether or not the major serves as a serious grounding in a subject or as an introduction to the field. Chris Miller '86, a political science major, said, "The degree is a B.A. Its purpose is not to provide grounding in any one subject. I've only come here to get a liberal arts degree."

When CEP Chairman Thomas Jorling asked Miller whether he trusted his major department to provide this education, Miller responded, "When you enter the department you feel that way. When you leave, not necessarily."

The need for sophomore advising was discussed at the meeting, with students saying they needed advising when choosing a major and deciding whether or not to participate in off-campus study-away programs. Leonard mentioned the founding of the Committee on Academic Advising. "It will be a down and dirty committee.

Once a month

Meatless meal garners College Council assent

by Andrew Mayer

An overwhelming majority of students responding to a College Council survey support a regular meatless meal in student dining halls. After hearing the results of the survey, the Council voted 25-3-1 to endorse a proposal to continue the meatless meal once a month, always on the same day of the week.

Two-hundred and eight-five students said they approve of the meatless meal because they feel it is only a small sacrifice to make, and they also believe the meal is nutritious. The 42 responders who did not approve of the meal said it is an infringement on student rights, that charity is a personal decision and that the trial meal was unimaginative.

Those who are not in favor of an optional program said they believe it is unfair because those who do not want a meatless meal will have to walk to a different dining room.

One-hundred and seventy-nine students answered in favor of a once-a-week meatless meal, 83 responded in favor of a once-a-month program, while only 20 students did not want a meatless meal at all. Suggestions for the meatless meal included pasta, pizza, lasagna, spaghetti, quiche and a Caesar salad.

Once-a-month

The Council endorsed the proposal to continue the meatless meal program, "(to) generate funds and awareness for pre-publicized causes." The proposal calls for a once-a-month, optional meatless meal, to be provided in four of the five dining halls. The dining halls serving the meal will be on a monthly rotation and the number of dining halls serving the meal will be reviewed after a trial period.

In addition, the Council proposed that a committee of Council representatives should meet with Food Service at the beginning of March to work out details of the program.

If the program is implemented, the Council proposal calls for a group of students, chosen by College Council, to be in charge of deciding where the money is sent. It also suggested a letter be sent to parents at the beginning of next year, describing the program.

According to College Council Secretary Eric Vincent '88, the Council decided that a once-a-week meal would "just become a burden on students." He said, "People will avoid the meal more if it is on a once-a-week basis."

Vincent added that, when the meatless meal program begins, the dining hall serving a meal with meat is likely to be one of the larger halls (Baxter, Greylock or Mission Park) in order to accomodate those who choose not to eat the meatless meal. He also said that when College Council representatives meet with Food Service they will pass along student suggestions for meatless meal menus.

Student Activities Council

Spring concert canned for lack of funds

by Tom Ewing

There will not be a spring concert this year according to Student Activities Council chairman Hans Humes '87.

"The SAC does not have enough money to put on a good concert," Humes said, adding that such a concert would cost the SAC about $10,000. The SAC inherited a $16,000 debt from last year's operation, which has hampered activities this year, according to Humes. In addition, the College Council cut the SAC's budget this year by $4,000, as it will next year also, to begin repayment on the debt.

Humes explained that events which have already taken place, such as the concert by The Band last fall, have accounted for a large share of the SAC budget, which totalled $22,700 this year.

College Council Treasurer David Applebaum said that while the SAC had not come to the Council for more money, the Council would not be able to provide enough money for a spring concert since it could not take money away from other groups.

Because of events in the past, there was nothing the SAC could do this year, Applebaum said. "Unfortunately, the spring concert is something we're not going to have this year," he said.

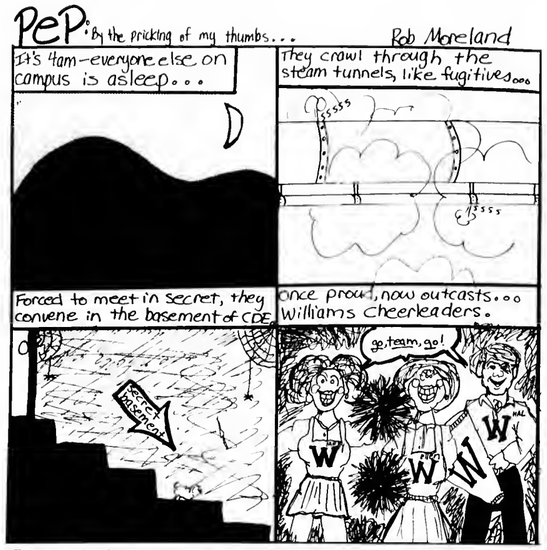
Humes said the SAC plans several events for later in the spring. During March, several comedians from outside the campus will perform in a comedy show. He said the event will be held in Driscoll dining hall, as it was last year.

Michael Stipe, lead singer of REM, sings at last year's spring concert. There will not be a spring concert this year, according to Student Activities Council President Hans Humes '87.

In addition, Humes hopes to attract a famous comedian to Chapin Hall for a performance some time late in the spring. This kind of event has never been put on in Chapin, Humes said.

Finally, Humes said that he was hoping to arrange an outdoor concert involving several student bands and, perhaps, a band from outside the College. The outdoor concert may be coordinated with an event being considered for the Berkshire Quad later this spring.

Wrong time? Wrong idea.



The decision to extend the application deadline for theme houses and not to put it in a co-op clearly demonstrates that there are problems in the concept and implementation of this proposal. Various student representative organizations have protested that the decision was made without adequate student input.

There also remain questions about the implementation of the proposal. The Gaudino Committee and the Deans did not specify the details of the selection process, nor did they provide sufficient time for students to generate proposals for next year. They also did not consider adequately student reaction to changes in the housing system.

The fact that there were only two applications for theme houses demonstrates student ambivalence, and even hostility, to the proposal. And even these applications have problems. The Latin America theme house proposal should be ineligible, according to the criteria set by the Deans. There are only two students, less than the required minimum of seven, and both are sophomores, who are only allowed to apply in a group with juniors.

Therefore, only the application for a Science and Technology theme house is eligible, and it was returned by the selection committee with a request for specific plans. Of the seven applicants, two are members of the Gaudino Committee, the originators of the proposal. In light of overwhelming student opposition, this is suspect. If only seven people outside the Gaudino Committee cared enough to apply, the Committee may have been overly responsive to its members' interests in its attempts to bridge the perceived gap between intellectual and social life.

In addition, this proposal reflects a change in the direction of the housing system, away from the diversity that is the goal of the random selection process.

Encouraging intellectual discussion is laudable, but the theme house is not the best approach.

In light of these objections, the selection committee should defer any decision on the theme house until next year, thus providing an opportunity for real student input. The theme house may prove to be a viable proposal, but this is the wrong time to try it.

Funding

To the Editor:

The recent efforts by MASSPIRG to obtain funding have left us dismayed. We have no reservations about their goals or planned activites. However, we object strongly to their attempt to utilize the term bill for collecting these funds.

By allowing MASSPIRG to solicit contributions via the term bill, we set a dangerous precedent. What is to stop other organizations (i.e., Cross, Ethiopian Relief Fund, political parties) from getting their names on the Williams term bill? The term bill should not be used as a medium for outside organizations to garner funds from the college community.

We fully appreciate the fact that an organization such as MASSPIRG cannot obtain funds from the Student Activities Tax. The College Council Funding Guidelines do not permit financing organizations whose financing of organizations whose activities are focused outside of the collge. Other efforts, such as direct student donations, house funds, or departmental contributions, would be a more appropriate source of income.

Offensive

To the Editor:

I was very surprised to read in last week's Record that the winning snow sculpture was one of a Roman vomitorium. It was alarming not only that the sculpture was constructed, but also that it was chosen as the winner, and furthermore the enthusiasm with which the Record reported it. Willful vomiting is not a Roman tradition that we should so humorously laud. Eating disorders, such as bulemia, are a great problem for many people — especially women — at Williams and on many other campuses.

A great lack of sensitivity and awareness was expressed by those who depicted a figure vomiting in front of Chapin Hall. The Record seemed to reflect this attitude by describing the sculpture as paying "tribute to a respected—and much imitated—Roman tradition." Although I understand that the sculpture was intended to mock the Romans and ourselves for overindulgence at parties, its presence and the praise it has received reflects a widespread insensivity to the problems of those with eating disorders. These problems merit a more direct and compassionate approach. Those who built the sculpture, those who awarded it first prize, and those who so eagerly reported it should have looked more carefully at the modern implications of the act depicted.

Consultation

To the Editor:

In view of recent developments concerning the Gaudino Committee proposals, we, the College Council, as elected representatives of the student body, express our wish that the Administration consult the College Council on matters affecting the student community, as part of the process of implementation.

Passed 28-0-0 (February 20, 1986)

The above College Council statement clarifies our reaction to the recent debate over the Gaudino proposals. We have not taken a stand on the merits of the "Theme House" proposal; the issue we are taking up is not the proposal itself but the way it is being implemented. We believe that College Council consultation would have added legitimacy and increased student support to this proposal. The College Council, as a representative of the student body, is an open forum where all campus issues can be discussed. We hope that the administration and the students will both recognize this role.

Greek Letters

To the Editor:

The Gaudino Committee's theme house idea is great. We really don't need co-ops, or for that matter, row houses. Why don't we create a lot more of these new theme houses instead? To alleviate confusion, we could call them by Greek letters and let them choose their own members too.

Gaudino

To the Editor:

Offhand, all the buzz around campus in the last couple of weeks has been missing the real issue. I fear things are worse than most of us imagine. First it was the theme house gobbling up a co-op in the name of diversity, and the next it was the freshman "college within a college." On both occasions I heard little, if any, student support voiced for the proposal in question, but plenty of complaint centered around attempts to achieve intellectual diversity through geographical sequestering. In the end, there were two complaints lodged against the actions of the Gaudino Committee. These complaints are, I feel, misplaced.

Please, let me explain. The issue, as I see it, is not whether the actions of the Gaudino Committee are fair, feasible, or effective. The real question we should be asking is more procedural, but, in the end, much more important:

•Who is it that is listening to the Gaudino Committee?

Obviously, (and some of the fault lies with us) the students are not. As I understand it, the purpose of the Gaudino Committee is to make recommendations to better integrate intellectual life into life at Williams College. As Professor Tauber asserted in his letter to the editor last week, the Gaudino Committee consulted the students on the Committe on Undergraduate Life and the Committee on Educational Policy had held an open forum regarding its theme house proposal. Yet, I have spoken to no one who knew of this proposal before they read about its approval in the Record. Similarily, the freshman college recommendation was past the students and only awaiting faculty approval by the time anyone to whom I spoke had heard of it.

Why didn't anyone on the CUL ask, "Can we get an opportunity to really find out what the students think?" Why didn't anybody on the CEP ask? Or anyone in the Dean's Office? Or at Housing? Or the President? Or the Trustees? For whose benefit are all these actions planned, anyway?

Quite honestly, I feel that complaints lodged against the Gaudino Committee are misplaced. The Gaudino Committee is in place, as Professor Tauber intimated, to help "bring together the social, intellectual, cultural, and academic spheres of Williams life." A laudable goal, in my opinion. In this way, it is acting on behalf of the students. In no way, however, is the Gaudino Committee representative of the students. The students of the Gaudino Committee are a hand-picked, self-selected group representing only a segment of the student body. This specialization is fine for a strictly advisory committee. It is, on the other hand, intolerable for a committee of such orientation and composition to be given de facto enacting power, as is the current case with the Gaudino Committee.

Students must take the lead in reforming housing policy

by Dean C. Papadopoulos '86 and R. Ryan Reynolds '87

The recent proposal for the creation of a "theme" house has been criticized on various pragmatic grounds, and in most cases justifiably so. The proposal should also be criticized because it represents one more step toward the increasing administrative regimentation of the student's living arrangements and social life.

The plan assumes that the college's intellectual life is lacking. The Gaudino Committee must have asked itself why this is the case, and their answer can be deduced from their proposals without too much trouble. Apparently, they see the source of the problem as the residential house system, for why else would they wish to bypass it? The theme of the proposal is to create a selective residential community of individuals with similar interests. Perhaps the committee feels that enough time has passed since the little debate in 1962 for the student body to forget the arguments advanced against just that selective form of social organization, commonly called a fraternity.

The Gaudino committee has taken it into its hands to set things right, decreasing the randomness of the housing selection process through the fiat of a committee of "students, faculty, and administration." Unfortunately, a look at the Gaudino Committee's history gives little doubt about who will serve on the selection board or who will actually be making the decision. That the college, instead of the students, is doing the selecting in no way blunts the basic arguments that have been advanced against fraternities for years.

However, the committee should be credited with recognizing a serious problem on campus, or at least part of one. It has defined the problem as a lack of intellectual spirit caused by the random selection process. That it is, from a faculty viewpoint. But the student view should be more general — intellectual spirit is not all that is lacking. But perhaps we have become so used to our housing system that we have become blind to its overwhelming blandness and inability to create any house loyalty or competitive spirit; we may not like it, but our criticism is muted. But the failure of the house system that the committee implies is not surprising when you consider that the selection process resembles nothing more than a Tsarist resettlement program, dispersing freshmen entries at random, and usurping a large percentage of what should in fact be the student's choice of where and with whom to live. Such is the curse of a "fair" selection process.

The committee's recommendation is a first step, because it addresses the basic problem of the present system, but the problem will not be solved by appointing Professor Tauber as rush chairman of an intellectual fraternity or by allowing the College to define, limit and then "solve" it for us. His letter mentioned that "purely social and non-intellectual groupings would not be acceptable." It is unfortunate that this bias toward "intellectual problems" seems to grip the administration. The view that the only "real" problems are academic in nature, nothing else really matters, but we'll de damned if we let you change anything on your own is hardly conducive to constructive change.

At this point, the student body should be tired of hearing about social problems in college guidebooks; it should be ready to solve them before they become embedded forever in a school's reputation. A school-sponsored intellectual fraternity is not the solution, though this is not to say that fraternities or sororities are bad in some absolute sense; in fact, an argument could be made that a general reorganization of the campus social system on such a line would solve many of the stereotypical "Williams" social problems.

In fact, one way in which Williams fraternities competed and were judged was by their success in doing just what the theme house is supposed to do: organizing events and lectures and involving the community in formerly unavailable activities. Most likely, a present day version, perhaps some type of social club, would be more sensitive to the needs and interests of its members and of students in general; certainly it would not be committed to tailor its activities toward impressing a faculty committee. Gargoyle Society seeks new student leaders for '86–87

The Gargoyle Society was established in 1895 to work for the betterment of Williams College. With a membership of campus leaders and other students distinguished by their commitment to the College, Gargoyle identifies questions and issues of current importance to the whole community and advises the Administration about them. With no legislative or enactive power, Gargoyle serves in a strictly advisory capacity; it is essentially a think-tank, whose ideas and suggestions are taken under serious consideration by various College administrative bodies. Gargoyle provides an essential link between the past and the present at Williams, and maintains a forum for the discussion of both contemporary and long-range issues.

Gargoyle's activities vary from year to year according to what it identifies as the College's most important concerns and interests. This year, among other projects, Gargoyle has initiated a Teaching Assistants program for the freshmen Winter Study seminars; made proposals to the Deans for the improvement of academic advising; raised and discussed questions about the grading system and the major; and coordinated orientation programs for freshmen.

Gargoyle will soon be accepting nominations for next year's membership. We are seeking a diverse groups of students with a sincere interest in the future of Williams College. We highly encourage nominations, including self-nominations, from all interested members of the Classes of 1987 and 1988. Nomination forms will be placed in S.U. boxes next week. There are no prerequisites, save a genuine desire to play a role in the development of the College. In considering your candidacy, please feel free to question any of Gargoyle's current members.

Is our generation selling out? a student reflects on the '80s

by John Canty '88

Not too long ago I went with a friend to see St. Elmo's Fire, a film that proved very popular this past summer. Forewarned by friends, I went prepared to dislike the film, and in this feeling the movie did not fail me. Not only was the performing truly awful throughout, but the spirit of it almost celebrated the act of "selling-out", of compromising one's own individuality to the demand of advancement in the world.

This piece is intended as no film review (The author lacks the competence!). If movies such as St Elmo's Fire and that classic, The Big Chill, render any value, it lies in calling into question what values we have today, especially as we come into the period of independence and our own challenge ahead.

The period of the late 1960s and the early 1970s, a rich background of time against which we can measure ourselves, marked an era of intense student commitment. College students sought an increased measure of control over their own lives, they played a critical role in the Civil Rights Revolution, they worked to bring down a President. In these causes, students drew strength from a passionate moralism, which, if it did wreak havoc on the lives of college administrators, also attempted to put American institutions more in line with students' own idealism. A generation declared itself ready to take on what seemed to them an impersonal System, and in showing that activism can make a difference in change, paid that System its greatest tribute.

Perhaps most refreshing in this time was how receptive its youth proved to prizing individuality, to cherishing those sparks of light in all of its people. Diversity claimed a real power. In the tolerance with which a student weighed his peer's future, a real freedom of ideals, and a commitment to them, stood out.

It is possible to make romantic this period and forget that people who had come to value doubt so would give way to students who then espoused indifference; the System was so morally bankrupt, ran the argument, that it lay outside the realm of hope for reform. A chic cynicism took root. Student activists became objects of derision as latter-day "Dudley Do-Rights", naive believers who simply didn't know any better. The mood reflected not conservatism but apathy. Most alarmingly, the concern for individuality that lay so much at the heart of the old activism passed into a time of conformity (Welcome to St. Elmo's Fire!).

We have moved away from that state, I think. Of course, you still see some of it. You see it in the true anger you have as you see in the weekend parties the glimpses of glibness in others, and, of course, in yourself ("Hey, how are you doing? Great, just great."). You see it in the times you yourself do not think of what it is to be different in a homogenous, ethnocentric environment. Some of this conformity persists.

Yet there is more, too. You see large turnouts for such deeply moving experiences as American Pictures, you find a formerly latent passion now ascendant on such issues as South African divestment (as our Trustees have discovered in this past year). In late January, there was a large attendance for the Martin Luther King, Jr. service, and who can deny the power of at least the symbol of a varied congregation uniting to sing "We Shall Overcome"? What stirred a people

Carter thefts

Last Wednesday in Northern Berkshire Trial Court in North Adams, Leonard W.Harwood Jr., 18, of Williamstown, was convicted of five counts of receiving stolen property in connection with the Nov. 9 thefts from Carter House.

Harwood was fined $500 in court costs, sentenced to 100 hours of community service work and ordered to pay restitution for all the stolen goods, amounting to approximately $1,000. If the amount of restitution cannot be agreed upon, another trial will be held. In addition, the court placed Harwood on probation until Feb. 19, 1988. The thefts took place on Homecoming weekend, during the second half of the Williams-Amherst football game. Primarily small electronic devices such as radios and calculators were taken but a total of $300 in cash was also reported missing. Director of Security Ransom Jenks said, "They (the thieves) were taking advantage of the fact that students don't lock their rooms."

Both Robert Derosier III and James P. Donlan of Williamstown, each charged on Nov. 15 with two counts of larceny in connection with the thefts and arraigned in Northern Berkshire Trial Court on Nov. 20, have yet to be tried.

Choir to sing

Next Sunday at 10 a.m., The Seminary Singers from The Boston University School of Theology will present the Sunday worship service at the United Methodist Church in Williamstown. The program, "Songs of the Kingdon " will include anthems by C .ndlyn, Lassus, J.S. Bach, Po ell and Rutter, in addition to folk songs and black spirituals.

The final part of Ralph Vaughan Williams's "Dona Nobis Pacem" will be featured in the service.

The Seminary Singers, a coed choir with 28 voices, has been touring throughout the country for 50 years. Linda Clark, assistant professor of sacred music at The B.U. School of Theology, directs the choir. The Rev. Mark Fowler, pastor of the host church, is an alumnus of The B.U. School of Theology and toured with the group for two seasons.

The public is invited to attend this service of music, hymns and scripture. The Methodist church is located on the corner of Water and Main Streets in Williamstown.

Faculty lectures

Sheafe Satterthwaite, lecturer in art and planning associate in environmental studies at Williams, will give a talk titled "In Search of the American Yard." The talk, part of the faculty lecture series, will take place Thursday at 4:30 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

Satterthwaite's presentation will focus on the historical evolution of yards in middle-class, rural, suburban and urban America. His lecture will cover both a discussion of yards themselves and an explanation of the process used to study them.

Satterthwaite plans to present a chronology of the landscape evolution through which the contemporary American yard has passed and the various functions which yards have served throughout American history.

To supplement his discussion, Satterthwaite will show photographic examples of yards from the United States, drawn from his slide collection of about 60,000 slides related to North American and European landscape history.

The series will continue with lectures by Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong on "Feminism, Pornography and the Law," on March 6, and Associate Professor of Political Science Richard Krouse on "The Logic and Limits of the Liberal Welfare State," on March 13.

Bush aide Gregg lectures about US-Soviet rivalry in third world

by Lanny Lim

"Regional conflicts form the cutting edge of U.S.-Soviet relations," Donald Gregg '51 said last week in a lecture to members of the Williams community. Gregg, assistant for national security affairs to Vice President George Bush, talked about Vietnam, Korea and Central America in addition to recent United States-Soviet interaction.

Gregg, whose lecture was titled "Regional Conflicts in U.S.-Soviet Relations," worked for the Central Intelligence Agency for 30 years and was a member of the National Security Council during the Carter Administration. He has been an adviser to Bush since 1982.

Gregg spent 18 years in Asia working for the C.I.A. and, based on this experience, explained why he believes Asia became a great economic model. According to Gregg, Asia's boom stemmed from three U.S. investments in the area. The first was the reconstruction of Japan. Gregg said, "This undertaking was a total success since Japan became the economic engine for the rest of Asia."

Secondly, the U.S.' intervention in Korea prevented that country from hindering Japan's budding economy, and South Korea thus was able to get its own economy in order. The third investment, the United

Atlanta activist conducts seminar on racist attitude

by Anne O'Malley

Dr. Charles King, founder and president of the Urban Crisis Center in Atlanta, appeared in Chapin Hall last Saturday to present a racism workshop as a follow-up to the recent American Pictures presentation.

King, a former staff member of the President's Commission on Civil Disorders, has participated in a number of other civil rights groups. His seminar was featured on the Phil Donahue Show for several days.

King condensed his usual two-day program to a few hours to present it as part of the Williams Black Student Union's "Black Students — Returning From the Ivory Towers" weekend. About 200 students attended at least part of the workshop, including a number from other colleges who were visiting for the BSU weekend.

Throughout the course of the three and one-half hour workshop, he encouraged students to discuss and react to the issue of black and white interaction in urban America.

Aggressive reaction

King's seminar intended to help participants understand the problem of racism by recreating many of the tensions that exist in the outside world. While conducting his seminar, King reacted aggressively to many of the participants' comments and cut people off, not allowing them to express an opinion.

Many of the students became angry with King during parts of the program. However, many later said they realized his style of presentation attempted to enable white students to experience what it is like to be oppressed.

When white students defended each other against his verbal attacks, Dr. King said, "White people feel compelled to stick together in the face of black people." He said both races tend to evade the issue of race in order to get along, but added, "We (blacks) are the victims of the problem, not the cause of it."

Dr. King said any oppressed people will stick together because "If ever you are oppressed, you understand what oppression is."

'Powerful'

Student reaction to the seminar was positive. Amy Heald '89 said it gave her a feeling of identification she didn't have before. "I had always known that that feeling (oppression) existed," she said, "but experiencing it made it so much clearer."

Rob Chase '88 had a similar reaction, and noted "like American Pictures, it made you feel oppressed, and I think that's valuable."

Andrea Cousins '89 said the best adjective she could use to describe the experience is powerful. She said she wished her whole entry could have been there. "It would have cleared up so many things about how they interact with me," she explained.

Junior Ken Jones said he believes the program was very educational for the majority of the people, both blacks and whites, because it created "a better understanding about the races and how they interact."

Isolation

Maric Paquin, a junior at Middlebury, attended the workshop at Williams because she hopes to bring King to Middlebury. She said she thinks black students feel particularly isolated because there are less than 50 black students enrolled and there is no black community in the Vermont area.

She said being a black student in an institution like Williams or Middlebury can be like a double-edged sword. "You want people to know about the problem and yet you don't want to be under a microscope," she said.

Williams Black Student Union member Martin White '87 said, "(I hope the seminar) leaves people talking and discussing the issue as honestly as they were (on Saturday)." He said he believes the program makes it easier for black students to express their anger towards racism. "It makes it less a thing of politeness, and more something you can deal with."

son Infirmary, which has seven bedrooms, a common room and a kitchen.

The committee, selected by Dean of the College Stephen Fix, consisted of Darrow, Assistant Professor of Economics David Ross, Daniel Peris '86, and Gaudino Committee members Associate Professor of Classics Meredith Hoppin and Melissa Perkins '86. Peris said he was asked to serve on the committee by Fix.

CC declines

Fix also asked College Council President Anza Mammen '86 to serve on the committee. Mammen declined to involve the College Council in the selection process, noting that the Council had passed a resolution two weeks ago criticizing the Gaudino Committee for not adequately soliciting student opinion on the theme house idea.

Fix approached the College Council officers at his weekly meeting with them, trying to convince Mammen to participate in the committee. "Dean Fix was frustrated," said Amy Jeffress, College Council vice president. "The four officers said it would not be right for Anza or anyone else on College Council to sit on the Committee because College Council had voted against it (the theme house proposal)," she explained. "We thought it would be a conflict of interests."

Darrow said both proposals will still be considered in the spring. "Both were promising," he said, "but we didn't feel that either one was sufficiently advanced for us to approve it."

Seniors enjoy life in a co-op. (Silver)

Co-ops not issue

Perkins said the committee realized that people who applied for co-op housing and did not get proposals in might want to apply to the theme house. She also noted that students who were reluctant to apply to the theme house because the idea came under criticism for reducing the number of co-ops would no longer face such a reaction. "Now the co-op issue isn't an issue," she said.

The committee also felt that people needed more time to discuss themes and to react to the idea of a theme house. Hoppin said, while she felt the Gaudino Committee gave plenty of opportunity for discussion of the idea when it was presented last year, students have just started to react to it. She said, "We'd like to give it (the theme house) a better chance to work."

Students who applied for the theme house agreed that there had not been enough time to write a good proposal. Hernandez said that her group needed more time to find people and to organize its proposal. Stein said his group could also use more time to write a more specific proposal.

Weber said, "We hope someone else will submit a valid application. We'd like to see it (the program) get going."

Professor Robert Suderburg

by Jennifer Sills

Professor Robert Suderburg may soon become the newest addition to the Williams Department of Music. He has recently been nominated for a permanent position on the faculty by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions following recommendation by the music department. The final decision will be made by the Board of Trustees at their spring meeting.

Suderburg was invited to teach at Williams as a visiting professor for the academic year 1985-86. For the past ten years he has been the head of the North Carolina School of the Arts, one of the most prestigious schools for performing arts in the nation. According to the doctrine by which the school was established, it is run by an actual creative artist rather than an administrator, a concept in which Suderburg strongly believes.

Suderburg received his undergraduate education at the University of Minnesota, performed graduate work at Yale, then continued on to receive a Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. Since then he has taught in various educational institutions including Bryn Mawr College, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia College of the Performing Arts, Brooklyn College/CUNY and the University of Washington.

At present, he is professionally a pianist, conductor, and composer, although he has played trumpet professionally in the past. He has been the recipient of many grants and awards, including two Guggenheim and NEA (National Endowment for the Arts) Fellowships. As a composer, performer (conductor and pianist), and producer, he has made numerous recordings, one of which was chosen by the New York Times as one of the ten recordings of the decade representing avant garde music.

Varied composition

His compositions include orchestral music, cantatas for voice and chamber orchestra, chamber music, and pieces for piano, band, and choir. Many of these have been performed by prominent orchestras in major cities in the U.S., Canada, Europe, Australia and India. His music, although modern, has enough romantic charactistics that it is enjoyable even to those who are unaccustomed to the more dissonant sonorities of modern music.

After working ten years at the North Carolina School of Arts, a year and a half ago Suderburg decided to take a leave of absence. "I wanted to have more time to compose and perform," he explained. He has since been doing residencies at various colleges and universities. "You can't make a living from recordings and performances," he remarked. "Although you get royalties and awards on performances, it only amounts to about a third of a family income." So, in the tradition of Beethoven, Bach, Mozart and many others, Suderburg continues to teach.

When asked how he heard of Williams, he said that he had worked out west with some very talented graduate composition students who had gone here. In this way he became acquainted with Williams. With respect to working at Williams, he said, "I was already familiar with the area through performing and teaching at Tanglewood, and

Young artists produce with an authentic style

by Mark Canuel

The Williams College Department of Music presented its final Young Artist Series Concert Friday night at Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. "Tafelmusik" — a quartet comprising Lauren Weiss, flute, Virginia Brewer, oboe, Christine Gummere, cello, and Linda Kobler, harpsichord — played a concert of music spanning over two centuries. Performing an incongruous mix of composers such as Bach and Bela Bartok requires a considerable amount of sensitivity and skill: "Tafelmusik" seemed comfortable in the repetoire of both Baroque and modern composers.

The first half of the program consisted of Baroque music of three contemporaries born in the same decade of the seventeenth century. The sequence led to interesting contrasts among the broad, flowing melodies of Telemann, the virtuosic dazzle of Marcello, and the passionate animation of Rameau.

The ensemble opened its program with the selection from which it took its name — the Trio Sonata in E Minor from Telemann's "Tafelmusik." Although the languidly-played first movement occasionally suffered from imprecise phrasing and unclear ornamentation in the oboe passages, the following movements, most notably the fourth, demonstrated warmth, vitality and scintillating counterpoint — the unmistakable qualities of Telemann.

The cello, which plays only a subdued accompaniment in the Trio Sonata, came to the forefront in Marcello's Sonata in G Minor for cello. The sonata, accompanied by the harpsichord, presents formidable technical challenges. Gummere, in both the second and fourth movements, experienced difficulties in the articulation of notes in the more virtuosic passages.

Nonetheless, she was joined by Weiss and Kobler for some of the finest playing of the evening in Rameau's Premier Concert. Rameau, who was a brilliant harpsichordist himself, clearly relished in writing a dazzling role for his instrument in the piece. Kobler's playing in the extensive role for the harpsichord was superb. The three musicians as a whole captured the dramatic contrasts in rhythm and dynamics of the first movement and the lively exchanges between instruments in the third.

Two contemporary works followed. Both Alberto Ginastera and Bartok were interested in the native folk music of their countries — an influence apparent in Ginastera's Duo for Honors projects allow intense investigations

by Martin Hildebrand

Some seniors, in addition to working on post-Commencement plans, are exploring a variety of fields in various Honors Projects. "Thesing" seniors can be found in a variety of places and tend to frequent the depths of Sawyer Library, the computers in Jesup Hall, and the labs in Bronfman Science Center.

Ninety-eight members of the class of '85 received honors in some department. Chemistry awarded Honors to 16 of these students, the largest number awarded by any department. The English and history departments also awarded large numbers of Honors degrees.

The procedures for honors projects vary between departments. Often there is a choice between a thesis and a specialization route. In some departments, the thesis lasts a semester and a Winter Study period. In other departments, the thesis lasts a full academic year. Dean of the College Stephen Fix feels, "It's a good thing that we have more than one route." Dan Peris '86,however, disagrees. "The concept in several departments of Honors specialization is an insult to those who write theses," he said.

Countless topics

There are many potential subjects for honors projects. In a few departments, such as English, art, music, and theatre, there are opportunities for students to work on creative projects or performances to fulfill the project requirements.

In the sciences, many honors projects involve lab work. Margaret Nelson '86, a biology major, is working on a DNA sequencing project. "The actual subject is finding the sequence for a specific gene," explained Nelson. "To this point, it's been mostly lab work and trying to produce data."

This year's projects cover a wide range of fields. Beth Ebel '86, who is writing a physics thesis, is working on a theoretical project involving relativity and quantum mechanics. Pippin Strieby '86, an English major, wrote on the interplay of Christianity and Paganism in Old English poetry. Tristyn Patrick '86, another English major, treated a particular subgenre of parody. Senior Chris McGuire, a political science major, wrote about the committee system in the U.S. Senate.

The educational opportunities provided by honors projects are different from those offered by regular courses. According to Nelson, "Doing research is so different from doing labs for a course. Now you're doing some specific project that probably no one has done before." Jon Riecke '86, who is working on a thesis in computer science, said, "In computer science, your thesis adviser takes you up to the level where you can do research, and that takes awhile. After the initial hump, it's really neat because you're actually doing things that no one else has done before."

Students undertaking honors projects must give a certain subject deep inquiry, which can at times become frustrating. "In a thesis," explained Fix, "you select a subject which is rich enough and

Berkshire rock: it's really rolling

by Meredith Miller

Although rock music might not immediately spring to one's mind at the mention of Williams College, this year's party-goers would have to agree that live music is alive and well in the Berkshires. Testament to the vitality of the current campus band scene is the fact that a majority of this year's Winter Carnival parties sported live bands, many of which were comprised entirely of Williams students.

At Spencer House, the veteran campus band Joe Band was greeted by an enthusiastic crowd in a performance that members agreed was musically tight and one of their best to date. This achievement was gratifying for bassist Steve Page '86 who, along with guitarist Ken Richardson '86 and vocalist Scott Koenig '86, is one of the original members of the band. In past years, Page has often been discouraged by the lack of support for live music on campus.

Koenig believes that a turning point came last fall, when with newly-added drummer Scott Bender '87 and Mike Coyne '89 on saxophone, the band convinced skeptical Mission Park house presidents to hire them for an all-campus party, which surprised many of its sponsors by making money. This event set a precedent for a number of successful live band parties throughout the school year. Since then they have been invited to play "officially sanctioned" events such as Homecoming and Winter Carnival, and, according to Coyne, could probably get more gigs if they had the time.

The band's members are especially pleased to have incorporated a number of original songs, such as "All-Nighter" and "The Problem is You," into an act which would ordinarily include only familiar dance tunes. According to Coyne, the best part of being in the band is having the opportunity to make up one's own parts for the originals. Page agreed, remarking "It's always more fun to do something you've created yourself and see people get used to it."

After jokingly referring to the band's songwriting as a "synthetic-dynamic-dialectical process," Page was quick to point out, "You can't take this band too seriously." The very name of the band itself pokes fun at the idea of the generic college dance band, playing mostly other artists' songs.

Page has confidence in his ability to eventually do something more serious but takes a practical approach to a musical career. "MTV is not my personal ambition," he asserted, "but I have something to say musically." Koenig also sees music in his future ("As a hobby, or something for real if I could"), and the two hope to form some sort of new group after graduation. The members of Joe Band speak highly of their "rival" campus band, the Rhythm Method, which evolved out of last year's group So What. The Method's members, believe Jeff Perrott '88, Robert Pucciariello '88, Chris Gascon '88 and Adam Schlesinger '89 are "a tight group of people who can perform" according to drummer Perrott, who also believes "we've established ourselves as a good band" at events such as the Perry House Homecoming and Dodd Winter Carnival.

The group, which has a repertoire of over 70 songs, differs complex enough to deserve extended inquiry." Peris found that "What is most important in writing a thesis is learning how to organize your thoughts on a large scale project."

Honors projects

"I started out with a broader topic, and my adviser and I narrowed it down," recalled McGuire. "That is important because it is easy to pick a subject that is too large." Strieby also found the scope of her project to be somewhat troublesome, noting that "Most of the frustration is information overload."

These projects require a large time commitment. Peris found that "During the semester, it's a lot more than a quarter of the total course commitment." Nelson commented, "It seems like a lot of work. Usually it doesn't bother me that I'm spending a lot of time [on the project]." McGuire concurred, insisting that "Writing a thesis is like at least three course loads in one."

Most students work on honors projects because they have a strong initial interest in a particular area that they want to pursue in depth. According to Riecke, "There is an incredible amount of time involved in an honors project. The key to staying sane in such a project is to pick an area that really interests you. Then it becomes a fun activity and a break from other work." Echoing a common sentiment, Patrick advises, "Only do it [a thesis] if you absolutely love what you're writing about."

On the other hand, some people view honors projects as a chance to explore a certain area in order to discover whether or not they are interested in a particular kind of work. Ballard Pierce, chairman of the physics and astronomy department, commented, "It's an excellent way for students to discover whether or not they want to do research. For many, their undergraduate thesis turns them on to research." Fix agreed, pointing out "It's also a good means of testing out whether students are interested in scholarly work."

Honors projects require primarily individual work. "You have to go out and do things," said Patrick. "No one is telling you that you've got a midterm at this time and a final at this time." McGuire agreed, pointing out, "It's a much more satisfying situation than a classroom setting in terms of getting to know the professor and getting to know the material."

Becoming well acquainted with a professor is an attractive feature of honors projects. "Getting to know a professor well is fun," said Riecke. "You get to know your professor as a friend." Fix added, "One of the things that is really nice is that it is a moment that you form a colleague relationship with a faculty member."

Some departments require students to give an oral presentation at the end of the project. For Nelson, this presentation will be a 10-minute talk summarizing her results. Some departments, such as mathematics or physics, require presentations of a longer duration. Ebel favors this policy. "I think the talk enables you to pull all your ideas together and present them in a coherent manner," she said. "The plusses of being a Division III major are that it helps you develop analytical thought; a thesis should help you communicate that thought and work to others in your field." Fix also spoke in praise of the final presentations. "It's very good intellectually and psychologically for that moment of defense. You test the strength of your belief and the validity of your argument. I think it's important that that kind of moment happens."

Middlebury

One of the main suppliers of cocaine to Middlebury students was arrested last week, according to an article in the Sunday New York Times. John A. Zaccaro Jr., 22, pleaded not guilty last Friday to possession of a regulated drug. Zaccaro, a senior at Middlebury, is the son of Geraldine Ferraro, 1984 Democratic vice-presidential nominee.

Ronald Nief, director of public affairs at Middlebury, admitted that drug abuse exists on campus but said the problem was no greater than at other schools.

"The papers have been painting us as a druggie school, which I think is hilarious," Heather McConnell, the editor of Middlebury's weekly newspaper, The Campus, told the Record.

Police Sgt. David Wemette told the Times that Zaccaro was arrested after he sold a quarter gram of cocaine to an undercover officer. McConnell said that Zaccaro had been arrested outside Mr. Up's, a local bar in which he worked.

Nief said in the Times that the college would not take any action against Zaccaro, pending the outcome of the case. According to McConnell, authorities said that they will not try Zaccaro until June.

"He will probably graduate," McConnell said. "Had he been on campus at the time [of the arrest], he probably wouldn't have gotten in so much trouble."

Ferraro, Walter Mondale's running mate in 1984, was in Hawaii when her son was arrested, but she said in a statement issued in New York, "Our son John has had some legal difficulty. We have hired an attorney to represent him. We love him and have confidence in him and will be standing beside him."

Elsewhere in this Ivory Tower, The Board of Trustees of Middlebury recently voted to moderately alter their policy on investment in South Africa. Middlebury will now divest itself of any company that sells weapons or makes loans to the South African government, or has not signed the Sullivan Principles. The change, according to President Olin Robison, "does not represent a very serious divestment [in terms of percentage of stock]". The President said that the trustees were guided by the idea that the continued presence of American corporations in South Africa "constitutes a force for constructive change."

The vote by the trustees came after repeated actions by Middlebury students and faculty planned to draw attention to the problem. On the day of the Trustee vote, a vigil was held by a group of about 70 outside the chapel of the school. Pro-divestment groups also made presentations to the Trustees during their meeting.

Swarthmore

The Student Council of Swarthmore College has decided to abolish the election of a president of the student body. The authority of the presidency will be taken up by a "central co-ordinator" who will be selected in the first meeting from the newly-elected Student Council. The only power that will not transfer will be that of facilitatorship which will be the responsibility of the member who initially presents an issue.

The Student Council claimed that replacing the president with a co-ordinator will make the Council function more efficiently. Rajen Naido, a current co-president of the Council, stated in the meeting in which the proposition was voted through that the administration would prefer dealing with an individual who will "clearly represent the group" and not just his personal beliefs. Others expressed the concern that "too much responsibility accumulates in one person" and believe that a co-ordinator would "distribute the work among people who will be working equally hard." Overall, it was felt that the difference would not be great but, as one Council member said, "at least the new head will not be the product of a popularity contest."

North Adams State

On February 6, eight North Adams State College students were released by members of the city fire department from a stalled elevator in one of the student dormitories. According to Dianne Manning, the school's assistant director of residence life, the students were stranded when the inside door of the elevator came off the track.

Once the students realized that they were stuck, they attempted to open the door themselves. Unable to budge it, they hit the alarm button. Campus police, student security and finally the fire department responded to the call. The firemen first tried unsuccessfully to break down the elevator with sledgehammers, then wedged a jack between the door and the adjacent wall. The jack forced the door open just wide enough for the students to squeeze through.

"It was really hot," said Debbie Caro, one of the trapped students. "We didn't get scared until they [the firemen] started banging." Another student spoke of her fear of leaving the elevator when the eight were finally rescued. "I was afraid it might shut while I was crawling out," she recalled. The trapped students can be grateful for one thing: they need not worry about the repairs, expected to cost between four and six thousand dollars. "The students will not be billed," assured Manning.

Hamilton

As reported on the front page of the Hamilton Spectator, Chuck the Dog was recently put to sleep. Chuck, an Irish setter, was a fixture of the Hamilton college community, having wandered the campus for some twelve years. "Roaming the campus was really his life," said his bereaved owner Mrs. Elihu Root, "He came home just to eat and sleep." Root also put to rest rumors that Chuck, or, as she called him, "Charles," had frozen to death, saying that he had actually succumbed to liver cancer.

Members of the college remembered the dog in different ways. "A disgusting beast," was one student's description. Another reminisced about how Chuck would "put his face right on the dining table and watch you eat." A secretary in the Dean's Office remarked that the dog did indeed go into the dining halls, "which is of course against the health code."

Chuck's departure was nonetheless mourned by many. "I'm going to miss playing soccer without Chuck slobbering on the ball," said one sophomore. A member of the freshman class summed up many students' feelings when he stated, "I think we'll all miss Chuck a lot."

Root consoled the students, pointing out that one cannot be surprised when a dog dies at age 12. "I think he had a good life," she concluded.

In Other Ivory Towers is compiled by Record reporter Hans Humes from material printed in other campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

Flute and Oboe as well as the four selections from Bartok's Mikrokosmos. Particularly memorable selections included the Duo, the Pastorale, with its quiet, expressive dialogue between instruments, and the Fuga, which starts with a Baroque-sounding fugue and lapses into unexpected dissonances. Although it is uncommon to hear Bartok's Mikrokosmos played on the harpsichord, Kobler offered an interesting interpretation and a fiery delivery in its execution.

Any concert of Baroque music would be incomplete without a work by its great master, J.S. Bach. The quartet joined together to perform his Trio Sonata in C Major. This sonata, compared to the somewhat ragged Trio Sonata opening the program, was beautifully played, especially in the expansive stately "Largo" and the echoing melodies in the closing "Gigue." In this piece, "Tafelmusik" demonstrated a musical intelligence and technical skill that prevailed through most of the concert.

The next music department concert will feature pianist Selma Epstein on Tuesday, March 4 at 8 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Epstein will perform works by modern Polish women composers.

when Williams offered me the residency, I felt it would be a wonderful opportunity." Although some might consider Williamstown to be in a remote area, far from any large city, Suderburg remarked that "for a composer and performer, Williams is in fact, very conveniently located. It is close to New York, where the record producers are, not terribly far from Philadelphia where my publisher is, and near Boston, which is musically an extremely active city."

Suderburg feels he would enjoy staying in one location rather than moving around from place to place, and he is also fond of the Williams community. He commented, "I like the students a lot, and feel that the combination of the humanistic base with a professional emphasis can be very good."

The Record recently asked Williams professors "What would you change about the College?"

"I'd move it somewhere five miles outside of Boston." — Prof. Thomas Kohut, History.

"I would have the class sizes moved closer to the ideal size, which is smaller and allows more personal contact. Then I would have him [Prof. Kohut] moved somewhere else ... far away." — Prof. William Wagner, History.

"The weather, the weather ... I'd like it to be warm and sunny." — Prof. Lynda Bundtzen, English.

"I'm very positive about this institution. I've been here 25 years and I don't think there's a lot wrong with it. There are minor things, of course. I would, for instance, like to move it to the sea without losing the mountains." — Prof. James Skinner, Natural Sciences.

"In weather like this, my tendency would be to say to move Williams closer to the equator." — Prof. Michael Brown — Anthropology.

"Several things, really, such as taking Winter Study more seriously, on the part of both students and faculty. It's pretty much a holiday now. And then, of course, the accuracy of Record reporting ...." — Prof. Donald Beaver, History of Science.

My point is this: right or wrong one can hardly fault the Committee for its own successful efforts to enact its proposals. The crux of the matter is the method by which this was allowed to be done. The blame lies with the real and rightful enacting power on campus: the administration. The theme house and enacting college actions, I fear, signal a newfound attitude of unaccountability by an administration which has for so long been so careful in listening to the students while considering our best interests.

Malcolm Smith '87

Prof. Tauber

To the Editor:

Who is Kurt Tauber? As of late, he has made a great showing as perhaps the most powerful autocrat since Louis XIV of France. Perhaps the word autocrat is a bit strong? ... After all, he is supported by the college by an all college representative forum—a group of hand-picked puppet rulers, code named Gaudino.

Sound incredible? Wish it were! But the facts seem to point another way: in the past three weeks, Tauber and Team Gaudino have reportedly ultured away one of our co-ops for a "theme house" without telling us of it until it had happened. Now don't get me wrong—the idea behind a theme house seems good, but three major factors behind it are very bothersome, and perhaps even unacceptable.

First, they have done away with a co-op. Why not use a Dodd Satellite, or part of a Row House, or even a couple of linked up suites in the same building? Surely if the theme group is always pre-occupied with cooking and cleaning, they will not have time to do their "thinking" (organized B.S.ing?) twenty-four hours a day!

Secondly, I would be willing to bet nearly anything that a geology or math or astronomy (and many other departments) theme house, if proposed, would not have a snowball's chance in hell of passing. Surely, the Autonomy of the Faculty, or Team Gaudino, or King Kurt would not be impartial to proposals offered.

Thirdly, and most bothersome of all, Team Gaudino passed this thing without our consent or without ever asking us. This is unacceptable.

What else has our "Stun King" done? Now he is very close to passing a "college within a college" for 45 freshmen. I will predict that pamphlets will go out to these prospectives, with a beautiful description of the college within a college. Well and good. But most prospectives don't really know what college life, good and bad, is like—athletics, movies, parties, academics, community service—until having been a part of it for a year. To isolate them in their first year is to deny them a full view of college life. How do I mean isolate? Socially, other entries will look at the "college" as the "geek entry." Whether it is the geek entry, or the elite entry, or not does not matter. It will, mark my word, be seen that way by many, and this could severely isolate those in it.

If Gaudino wants to try this thing, why not try it with sophomores, who will have a basis to make a choice, rather than blindly picking something that sounds good? And Gaudino should elicit opinions from the student body before acting....

Who is Kurt Tauber? Some say a professor. But there's a rumor that Team Gaudino has appointed him as dictator of the college. That would not surprise me. They'll tell us after it has been done.

very least, it would spend no college money on its projects.

Whatever the ultimate solution, to start, students must refuse to be limited by the ideas and initiatives proposed by administrators that insist on taking an extraordinarily restrictive view on what is proper and what is not in housing. After all, we live in the system; they do not.

once retains a captivating hold on our thought. To these distant echoes we find ourselves persistently returning.

I do not mean to soothe troubled consciences by this — especially not my own — for there stand in our midst problems that, despite our efforts, remain with us still. In that we are troubled by consanguinity, though, in that we do not take on the concerns of others as being also our own, I think we can praise Williams as a place which so cherishes the light of individuality in its residents that it tries to draw upon them all.

We have not been marching, for we have had no traumas such as were these; the challenging of our idealism, the depth of our commitment to others, remain before us, here at Williams — and beyond.

We'll be trying to get potential advisors to articulate why they're teaching English or biology," she said.

The problem of overenrollment in many of the more popular major courses was another prime topic of discussion. Several students suggested that professors have the authority to set limits on the enrollment in larger classes.

States involvement in Vietnam, led to what Gregg called spin-off economies. Gregg pointed out that during the Vietnam War, as Asians watched U.S. actions, they used the time to build up their economies.

Vietnam influence

Gregg also said U.S. intervention in Vietnam might have changed Chinese thinking. Before Vietnam, Chinese policy was considered radical, but, by the time Americans moved out of Vietnam in 1972, China had changed some of its policies.

For example, it had developed self-sufficiency in grain and was seeking technological advance. Gregg said he sees Vietnam as a trigger that enabled Asians to build up their communities.

Gregg also commented on what the future U.S. role in regional conflicts should be. He said he believes the United States must support democracy in Central American countries surrounding Nicaragua and the contras. Gregg asserted, "Nicaragua betrayed its own revolution ... and is moving toward a repressive Marxist society."

Trend to democracy

However, the trend toward democracy, according to Gregg, is evident in Africa and Latin America, especially in Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras, which all have held presidential elections. Gregg said these countries feel comfortable with the presence of American troops.

Because Nicaragua is becoming increasingly more isolated and militarily dangerous, said Gregg, America plans to protect these surrounding countries and help them build stable countries. The United States is also trying to convince Canada and Japan to help support these nations.

Gregg said the United States will let neighboring countries handle the Libyan situation and apply pressure on Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi. Gregg surmised that one or more neighboring countries will eventually support the ouster of Qaddafi and a situation similar to what happened to Idi Amin in Uganda will occur.

Bush feels that Gorbachev is a strong, intelligent leader, according to Gregg. "There is hope for arms control agreements because we share certain perceptions but not with regards to regional conflicts," Gregg said.

from most college bands in that it employs a professional sound mixer, complete with state-of-the-art equipment, for most of its performances. This accounts for the clarity of their vocals and their distinct clean sound, two qualities of their music that help account for the band's rising popularity.

Five different houses approached the band members with propositions to have them play for the recent Winter Carnival. Yet their popularity is not confined to the Williams campus. In response to several offers from visiting students who witnessed the group in concert and wanted them to perform at their schools, they are planning what Schlesinger called a "World Tour of New England," which will begin as soon as they make arrangements for transportation and equipment. The high-energy band has tentative plans to play at Dartmouth, Middlebury, and M.I.T., and is also currently negotiating with Amherst.

The next thing the Method would like to accomplish is to start playing some of its own material. Although each member has been working on his own original compositions, the band has played only copy songs thus far. Perrott would like for the band to start playing more original material. "It would make me very happy if we could put originals in our repertoire and still get the same reception we've been getting so far ... It's great to get a good reaction from copy songs, but there's nothing like the satisfaction you get from playing your own material."

Bass and keyboard man Schlesinger, who describes his influences as "Motley Crue and Brahms," has played occasionally with another, very different band known as The Pigs, who are a fixture at Bacchus club events with their traditional, older party music. According to drummer John Edie '88, The Pigs feel no pressure to conform to the pop dance-tune format followed by most party bands. "We play old 60's and 70's rock," said Edie, "just straight rock 'n' roll, fast and loud."

Edie began playing with band guitarist Tom Newhall '88 when they were both still in high school. Newhall began to jokingly refer to them as The Pigs, which seemed to fit, recalled Edie. "Now we can't change it, it's what we are," he proclaimed. The members, who also include Sean Brennan '87 on guitar and bassist Bill Brown '87, take a casual approach to rehearsals; they manage to get by just practicing "once in a while," and, Edie stressed, do not always try to get every song down perfectly.

Members admit that their choice of music is not for everybody, but they insist that they are not in the business to please everybody. "We're not doing it to make money," insisted Edie, "we just want to have a good time, and the people who like us to have a good time."

Kirmayer, Anthony, Raymond, and Katie Bacon 'Ex finished the day with a second-place finish in the 800 free relay. Williams left the natatorium that night in third place, behind Tufts and surprising Bowdoin.

Saturday, the foursome of Bacon, Horgan, Skidd, and Kirmayer won the 200 free relay to start the evening's events. Raymond captured third in the grueling 400 IM and co-captain Alicia Murphy '86 finished eleventh.

Another NE record

Searfoss swam to a seventh-place finish in the 100 breast and Horgan, Skidd, and Anthony blitzed the competition with first, second, and seventh place finishes in the 100 back. Horgan's time earned her another New England record.

Kirmayer followed with a school and New England record of her own in blazing to a 1:56.5 in the 200 free. Skidd, Searfoss, Raymond, and Anthony closed the evening with a third-place in the 400 medley relay as the Ephs climbed into second place.

Eight women have advanced to the Division III National Championships to be held in two weeks in Canton, Ohio. Divers Campbell and Parker will join Kirmayer, Horgan, Searfoss, Raymond, Anthony, and Skidd in trying to improve on their fifth-place finish last year.

Ski team 5th, 6th at Middlebury

The men's and women's ski teams traveled to Middlebury College last weekend to compete in the Eastern Championship ski meet. The women finished fifth in a field of 17 teams, while the men placed sixth. Head coach Bud Fisher was pleased with the overall performance of the teams and especially pleased with several individual results.

Friday's giant slalom and individual nordic races got underway in a blinding snowstorm that got the better of the men's alpine team. In these conditions, the squad could finish no better than a disappointing seventh place, after only two of five Eph skiers, Helge Weiner '87 and Tim Hill '86, managed to finish both runs.

Poor visibility and slow, sloppy snow conditions marked the idividual nordic races. In the women's 10K, captain Beth Schmidt '86 raced to her best career finish with an eighth place. She was followed by Kathy Wolf '88 in 10th and Ann Arnason '89 in 26th. In the men's 15K, Macdara Nash '88 finished in 18th, followed by senior Fredrik Eaton in 20th and Tod Niedeck '89 in 31st. The women grabbed fifth place in the nordic team standings, while the men finished sixth.

Saturday, in contrast to the previous day's conditions, the sun shone; the men's alpine team approached the slalom courses with renewed vigor to place second. Hill placed fifth, Martin Magoun '87 seventh, and Weiner 10th.

Coach Fisher was extremely pleased with the consistent performance of the slalom trio, which managed two first-place finishes and two seconds in carnival action this winter. Meanwhile, the women's alpine team took fifth in the slalom. Kopp finished ninth, while Omland finished 15th and Duncombe 17th.

The women's relay team of Schmidt, Arnason,and Wolf raced to fifth place, while the men's team of Eaton, Neideck and Nash finish sixth.

Freshman Omland and senior Hill were named to the EISA All-East second team for their consistent results throughout the season. The Middlebury carnival is the last stop on the circuit, but from March 5-8, seven Ephs will compete in the Division I NCAA National Championships in Stowe, Vt. Omland, Duncombe, Hill, Weiner, and Magoun will compete in the alpine events, while Wolf and Schmidt will race in the women's 10K nordic event.

These point-winners accounted for Williams' total of 31 points, placing the Ephs ahead of Bowdoin, Amherst, and Wesleyan in the 18-team field. MIT nipped Brandeis for the title with 76 points.

Coach Richard Farley was surprised by the high finish of his team, noting that pre-meet times would have had Williams in a much lower position. For example, neither relay team was seeded going into the meet, but both placed third ahead of favored opposition. The team finished a solid season in this invitational, and now looks to the spring season for continued success.

Wright hit the back of the Babson net in the second period to tie the score, but Babson pulled away to the 5-2 final. McCormick lauded the play of junior Cheevers, especially in killing penalties. Mark Morrison '88 also drew his coach's eye; "he did a good job, making lots of tough saves," he said. "He gets stronger and stronger each time out."

The squad ends its season tonight when they face Salem State in Lansing Chapman rink.

Ephmen place 5th in NE, women outclass tourney

by Stewart Verdery

Domination is the only word to describe the performance of the women's track team at the Williams Invitational on Sunday. Partly because strong teams such as Tufts did not compete as expected, the Ephs took victories in almost every event. No team scores were kept, but Williams won nine of the thirteen events.

Sue Northen '89, Dawn MacAuley '89, and Joan Davis '88 continued to pace the Ephs, each taking two events. Northen won the long jump with a leap of 15'2" and took the triple jump at 33'5". All of the true speed races were won by MacAuley and Davis, the former capturing the 55 meter hurdles (9.46) and the 400 (1:01.65), and the latter winning the 55 (7.95) and the 200 (27.2).

Jenny Garret '89 was the only other individual winner for Williams, outlasting the pack in the 3000 with a time of 11:03.62. Both relay teams were also victorious, the one-mile at 4:22.96 and the two-mile at 10:47.3.

Becky Conklin '87 was runner-up in the 1500, as was Lauris Wren '88 in the 1000. Finishing third in the 1000 was Mary Montgomery '88. Beth Schaefer 'Ex nailed down third in the 400 and Anne Thompson '89 was third in the 800. Fourth place finishers were Noriko Honda '89 in the 55m hurdles and Julie Silverman 'Ex in the shot put.

Many of the women head to Maine in two weeks for the ECAC Divsion III Championships. Based on the outstanding, undefeated performance of the team this season, there is little doubt that Eph tracksters will make an impact on these championships.

Men fifth in NE

The men's squad concluded their season by sending their top performers to the New England Division III Championships last Saturday. Williams turned in an unexpectedly high finish, totalling 31 points to tie Tufts for fifth place.

John Servin '89 stunned the field at Bates by winning the 800 in a time of 1:56.95. After barely qualifying for the race, the freshman ended a season of marked improvement with the win. Andre Lopez '87 captured second in the 400 at 50.05, trailing only a Division I-caliber opponent.

Ed Tonelli '86 took sixth in the 1000 with a time of 2:40.54. The 1600 relay team of Jeff Etemad '89, Tom Pingree '86, Servin, and Lopez took third at 3:27.57, as did the distance medley relay foursome of Fisher, Ian Brzezinski '86, John Ellison '86, and Mark Gilrain '87 at 10:38.21.

Racquetmen top Little 3 rivals

by Jim Goodwin

The men's squash team finished its season this week, crushing both Wesleyan and Amherst to win its twelfth consecutive Little Three title.

The Ephmen handed the Lord Jeffs a devastating 8-1 defeat before a packed Lasell Gym crowd. Captain Doug Robie '86 closed in on his opponent, winning 15-5, 15-11, 15-13. The rest of the squad performed as expected, rarely taking more than the minimum three games to defeat their opponents.

Matt McCall '87 blinded his Jeff counterpart with scores of 15-3, 15-5, and 15-3, taking under twelve minutes to complete the match. Freshman racquet sensation Lewis Fisher performed well in his Little Three debut, responding to the pressure with a convincing 15-6, 15-11, 15-6 victory.

Wesleyan fell in even more spectacular fashion as the Ephs shut them out, amassing a total game score of 27-0. The onslaught was led by sophomore Rob Hallagan, dispatching his opponent with scores of 15-4, 15-1, 15-2 in under ten minutes. Seniors Robie, Sam Fortenbaugh, and Dave Applebaum finished their intercollegiate squash careers with solid 3-0 victories over their Cardinal opponents.

A recovered Pier Friend '88 and Rick Hedeman '87 demonstrated the vaunted Eph depth, wasting little time sealing the Eph victory. The Williams top six travels this weekend to UPenn to compete in the Intecollegiate Championships.

7 wrestlers go to NE championships

Sending seven people to the New England Championships, the wrestling team ended its season this week with high hopes for next year. Captain Dan MacDonnell '87 fared the best, finishing sixth in the 190 lb. weight class.

"Last year Dan finished third; I think his shoulder problems hampered him this time around," said coach Joe Dailey. The three top teams in the tournament were Coast Guard, WPI, and Rhode Island College. "I think the level of competition was good for us," Dailey continued.

Junior Mark Tompkins wrestles in earlier action. Tompkins accompanied six other Eph grapplers to the New England Championships last week.

Six other wrestlers accompanied MacDonnell to the tournament, with three freshmen among them. John Dillon, Jeff Steele, and Ben Pearlman competed in the 126, 134, and 142 lb. weight classes. Juniors Mark Tompkins, Jon Stanley, and Evan Zahner completed the contingent in the 150, 167, and 177 lbs. classes, respectively.

Dailey remains optimistic about next year. Everybody will return, and several wrestlers will come back from a year of studying abroad.

Williams proceeded to go up again; by 7:54, Walsh and Johnson had each scored four points to set a 26-16 Eph advantage. They kept that lead for several minutes, but offensive fouls and four Davis points enabled the Jumbos to pull within 38-33 at half.

The seeond half started just like the first. Walsh hit a 20-footer before Davis uttered some choice words and got hit with a teehnical. As late as 15:02, Walsh hit freshman Mike Masters for an easy hoop and the Ephs were up by seven at 46-39.

But the Jumbo comeback was just getting started. Darrell Brunson collected a three-point play inside to pull them to within five. Then, with the Ephs up by five at 53-48, Tufts proceeded to score ten straight points. "That stretch was the ball game," said Sheehy.

The Jumbos' Steve Siegel hit two jumpers. Following a Ciulla travel, Reich turned in the lane and buried a jumper. The Eph offense seemed unorganized, unable to get the ball in Walsh's hands. Davis hit a 20-footer. Reich bombed from 18 and hit nothing but net. Finally Walsh hit a jumper at 8:24 to end the cold spell and trim the Tufts lead to three at 58-55.

The Ephs would get no closer than that, however, as Brunson twice broke away from the pack and hit easy layups. Walsh connected for three more hoops, but with Davis and Reich dominating the boards, the Jumbos spread the floor and coasted to the 81-71 final.

"I thought we showed an inability to react to their pressure," said Sheehy. "They're an excellent team, but I was really disappointed in the way we lost the game."

Thirty-seven percent

The game against Clark on Tuesday was simply a matter of the Ephs' shooting the ball poorly. "If we shoot fifty percent, we win that game," said Sheehy. But the shooting percentage ended up at only 37%.

In the first half, the Ephmen stuck close behind 12 points from Walsh and good board work from Rob Stubblebine '88. Clark led 34-30 at half, but the lead could have been much bigger if not for three late jumpers from Ciulla.

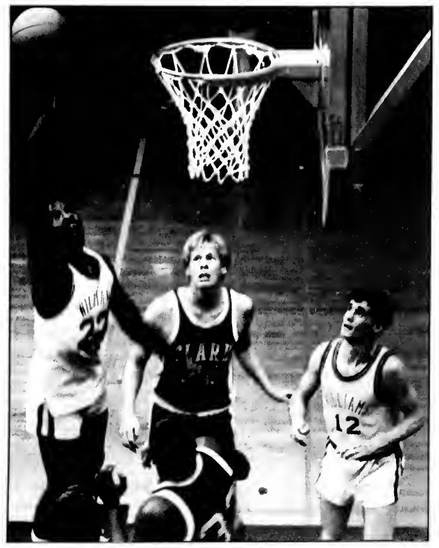
Clark broke early in the second half, scoring the first five points to go up 39-30 with 17:29 left. The Ephs would not score until 15:20, when Ciulla banked one in from the left side. By that time, Clark was up by 13, and the Ephs had a long road ahead.

The squad would come within six on three occasions, the last at 2:48 when sophomore Henry Jones hit a jumper from the right wing. But the cold spell hit Williams once more, as they missed six straight shots as Clark went up by 10, and ended up winning by nine at 71-62.

Swim team 3rd in NE, Kirmayer, Horgan star

by Kurt Oeler

After a six-year reign as New England champions, the women's swim team fell to Tufts at the New England championship meet last weekend. Co-captain Kathy Kirmayer '86, Joan Horgan '87, and Jen Raymond '87 led the Ephs in their title defense.



The Sunday results could not be received before press time, but events scheduled to be held included the 400 Free relay, the 100 Free, the 200 Butterfly, the 3 m diving, and the 200 Breaststroke.

The three-day meet began on Friday. Juniors Katie Anthony, Loni Searfoss and Horgan and sophomore Jodie Skidd began the scoring with a third-place finish in the 200 medley relay. Raymond followed with a win in the 500 free, finishing in a quick 5:18.72.

Kirmayer began her hot streak by exploding for a second place finish in the 50 free, and Horgan won her second event of the day in the 200 IM. Jen Campbell '87 and Emily Parker '86 dove well on the low board, finishing second and fifth.

Cagers lose to Clark by 9, then fall to Jumbos 81-71

by Cliff Peale

Falling victim to cold shooting in one game and wilting before a second-half spurt in another, the men's basketball team dropped a pair this week in Lasell Gym, a 71-62 loss to Clark (ranked number one in New England) on Tuesday and an 81-71 loss to Tufts on Saturday.

The losses dropped the Ephs' record to 12-10 and ended any chances they had for an ECAC playoff bid. The team will try to avoid ending the season with three straight losses on Saturday when they travel to Middletown to take on the Cardinals of Wesleyan.

The game against Tufts featured a duel between two players almost certain to make All-New England: Eph senior Tim Walsh and Jumbo senior forward Greg Davis. They each played up to his reputation, with Walsh scoring 24 while Davis collected 28.

One of the features of star players is that they pick up their team when they most need them, and Davis provided just that for Tufts early in the game. After four minutes, the Ephs were threatening to blow the game open as they forged a 6-0 lead on baskets by three juniors: a Greg Lang layup, a jumper by John Ciulla, and a Brandt Johnson follow shot. Meanwhile, the Ephs' tight man-to-man was shutting the Jumbo offense down.

But Davis fed senior Randy Reich inside before scoring five points in four seconds himself to tie the score at eight with 14:17 on the clock.

Squash tops Tufts 9-0, Smith 8-1

by Al Mottur

Concluding its season in excellent fashion, the women's squash team, ranked sixth in the country, ran its record to 8-4 with a pair of convincing victories over Tufts and Smith this week.

Last Saturday in the friendly confines of the Lasell squash courts, the team delivered an overmatched Tufts squad a thorough 9-0 whitewashing in a match which saw number one player Jean Cloppse '88 run her season record to an impressive 14-8.

Coach Renzie Lamb was clearly pleased with his team's performance, and thought that Tufts played very well: "We were very satisfied with the win as Tufts played a good hard match. It was just that our kids were more experienced and more talented."

Before the Tufts rout, the squad traveled to Smith where it orchestrated another easy victory, defeating its opponents 8-1, again playing "very well," according to Lamb.

With the regular portion of its schedule completed and only the nationals to look forward to, team members and coach alike feel thoroughly satisfied about the season: "We achieved every single goal we set for ourselves and our season was a complete and outstanding success," said Lamb.

This week, four members of the team will visit the campus of Princeton University to compete in the National Championships. Those players are Cloppse, Carrie Cento '86, Laura Rogers '86, and Alison Buekner '89. Although Lamb doesn't expect any of the four to win the tournament, he did see the potential for some success: "Depending on the draw, Jean (Cloppse) could possible get to the final 16 if she's playing well. And that would be a great accomplishment."

Ephwomen drop a pair, get 4th win

by Mark Via

Continuing to experience problems when faced with taller, stronger opponents, the women's basketball team dropped two of three games this past week and watched its record fall to 4-13.

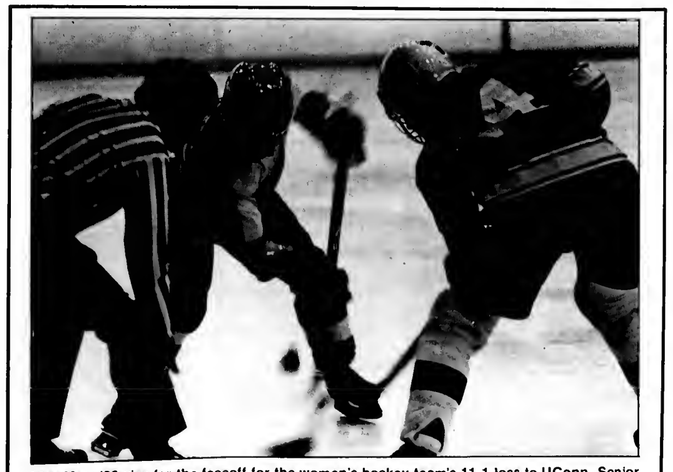
In its most recent contest, the team was routed at home by a talented Tufts squad 56-33. The Jumbos slowly edged out to a 14-8 first-half lead before embarking on an awesome 18-0 streak in which they went inside time and time again for high-percentage shots. The Tufts' offensive spree effectively put Williams out of the game, giving them a 34-12 halftime lead.

Earlier in the week, the team edged a smaller, less talented Skidmore squad 69-66, in a game which was not as close as the score indicated. Playing at home, the Ephwomen struggled to a 35-34 halftime lead made possible by a 10-2 Williams run in the waning moments of the half.

On fire

As has been their tendency all season, the players came out of the intermission on fire, quickly building its lead up to 10 points. Sophomore point guard Kim Hatch, who finished the night with 12 points, five assists, and two steals, controlled the tempo of the game, hitting short jumpers or feeding to Missy Crouchley '89 (17 points) and Nancy Hedeman '89 (21 points, eight rebounds).

With eight minutes left, the Lady Ephs were up by 14, but Skidmore slowly climbed back into contention on the strength of co-captain Tracy Jackson's outside shooting. With two minutes left, the Williams lead had been narrowed to three.



Continually fouled by the scrappy Skidmore defense, the Ephwomen made several clutch free throws down the stretch, thereby icing the victory.

The week started off on a sour note for the team as it were trounced by a sharpshooting Smith team by a 79-53 score. The Ephs fell behind from the start and could never get back into the game, as an early 10-0 Smith run led to an insurmountable 44-22 halftime lead. The team played better in the second half, but could not reduce the deficit, and instead watch Smith roll on to an easy victory.

The team will conclude its season this week as takes on the Owls of Westfield State on the road tonight and hosts the Wesleyan Cardinals this Saturday at 2:00.

Ephs top Westfield 6-3 and lose by 3 at Babson

The men's hockey team won its third game of the year on Saturday night by ripping Westfield State 6-3 behind fine performances by freshman Will Putnam and junior Craig Cheevers. The squad also lost to Babson on Tuesday by a 5-2 count, running their season record to 3-16-3.

On Saturday night, the team fell behind 2-0 quickly, but steadily came back. "We started off slow, but didn't get rattled," said coach Bill McCormick. Junior Guy Kurtz notched the first Eph goal late in that period.

Freshman Mike Swenson tallied for the second Williams score, and McCormick later praised the entire all-freshman line of Swenson, Putnam, and Chris Conway. Chris Traggio '87 later scored to pull the Ephs even.

It was at 5:22 of the second period before the Ephs pulled ahead behind a score by junior Mike O'Connell. Putnam later scored two goals to ice the win, and added an assist to lead the Eph scoring for the night. McCormick also praised the play of freshman Tim Frechette and senior Dave Fritz on defense, as well as lauding the play of junior winger Denny Wright.

"We've played well all year; we just can't seem to put the puck in the net," noted McCormick. "Tonight we did that; it feels great to get six goals in a game."

Panel talks of gay life

by Jocelyn Shadforth

An open panel discussion on homosexual life at Williams, sponsored in part by the Gay and Lesbian Union, drew more than 100 students last Tuesday night. The panel answered prewritten questions from Eric Rosenbaum '86, the panel's moderator and president of the GLU, and responded to questions from the audience.

Rosenbaum began the discussion by asking panel members when they first realized they were homosexual. Robert Lee '87 said he first became aware of his homosexuality at age 5. "I've always found men more interesting to me sexually than women. I still have close women friends. I don't know what that means except that I'm gay," Lee said.

John Malcolm '87 described his experiences in "coming out" at Williams. He said he became aware of his sexuality at age 12 or 13 and told of going to an all-male school where he said he felt repressed about expressing his attraction to males. "I immediately came out at Williams. I mean, I called the hotline and everything," Malcolm said.

CC to vote on MASSPIRG funding fee

by John Canty

A proposal to include a waivable fee on students' term bills to fund a Williams chapter of MASSPIRG (Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group) came under fire at the College Council meeting last Thursday.

In February, as part of efforts to institute a MASSPIRG chapter at Williams, members of the MASSPIRG Organizing Committee launched a petition drive seeking student support. MASSPIRG, a non-partisan research and lobbying group begun in 1972, concentrates on civic and environmental issues.

The state MASSPIRG organization, located in Boston, requires its student chapters to have both majority campus support and a stable funding system with each individual college administration acting as the collecting agent. Accordingly, MASSPIRG organizers here have requested student support for a waivable fee system.

If approved, the College will include a three-dollar MASSPIRG fee on the term bill to every student, with the option of waiving payment by checking a box.

Vote next week

The Council will vote next week on a tentative resolution offered by Council Representatives Bill Takis '86 and Bill Leininger '86 expressing the Council's disapproval of the funding system.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix said that, should such a resolution pass, the administration would continue to support MASSPIRG. "While one always takes note of what the College Council says," Fix said, "we have to look in this case at the clear support as shown by the students in the petitions. In effect, the administration has already agreed to the institution of a MASSPIRG."

Fix confirmed that the wording of the petition came at the request of administration officials, who made approval of MASSPIRG efforts contingent upon the wording. "We required a clear and sweeping affirmation of student support, not only for a Williams MASSPIRG, but also for the waivable fee," Fix said.

Last year, a MASSPIRG organizing effort here failed after the administration rejected the refundable fee plan submitted.

Procedure outlined

Speaking for the MASSPIRG Organizing Committee, Kirsten Swope '88 outlined MASSPIRG and the proposed waivable fee, citing similar procedures for MASSPIRG chapters at Smith and Amherst. She said the Williams chapter would subject itself to a student-body referendum every two years.

MASSPIRG Coordinator Eve Weinbaum said, "MASSPIRG rests on the idea of the student body as a responsible community. If a majority wants MASSPIRG with this system, it deserves acceptance. At the same time, through the waivable fee, we are allowing for the rights of the minority who don't want to pay."

However, at the College Council meeting, critics questioned the activism demonstrated by a waivable fee system, objecting to Swope's claim that, "With all our other statewide tasks, MASSPIRG cannot be endlessly soliciting individual students."

Council Representative Jeff Smith '87 said, "If you have the support for this, you do have this responsibility. I think this waivable fee system is a circultous way of avoiding your duties as a volunteer group."

Heated debate

In a heated exchange, Hopkins House Representative Ian Brzezinski '86 said, "By putting it (the waivable fee) on our term bill, you're saying that people are being apathetic. If you feel you have the support of students, you should be going straight to them."

Council Representative Gail Henderson '87 voiced similar opposition. "The funds that you need to get should not just be passed off by default to our parents," she said. "They should be solicited from students, who know what's going on."

Mark Tompkins '87 defended the fee procedure. He said, "It's not as though MASSPIRG is pulling wool over anyone's eyes. In the petitions, the students have

CEP debates freshmen college idea

by Jim Hartnett

This week, the Committee on Educational Policy evaluated a draft of the Gaudino Committee's proposal to form a 44-student "college within a College" in the class of 1990.

The proposal, which was submitted by the Gaudino Committee as a first draft of the notice to be sent to next year's freshmen, received heavy criticism from the CEP members, but in the end they seemed ready to approve it.

Most of the committee agreed, at least in principle, to the idea of a freshman college but said they objected to both the tone and the details of the Gaudino Committee's proposal.

The proposal itself, as outlined by Professor of environmental studies Thomas Jorling, chairman of the CEP, involves the selection of approximately 44 members of the freshman class to participate in a "Living and Learning Center." These selected freshmen would live together in the same entry and take one in-common interdisciplinary course each term.

The Gaudino Committee hopes the sharing of both housing and classroom activities will promote greater intellectual discussion and debate, according to the proposal, thus bringing the social and intellectual elements of college life closer together.

Courses team-taught

The courses have already been designed. The proposed first semester course, "The Uses of Evidence," would be taught by Professor of physics David Park and Assistant Professor of English Stephen Tifft. The second semester couse would be "Public and Private Morality," taught by Associate Professor of political science Richard Krouse and Assistant Professor of philosophy Rosemarie Tong.

The CEP expressed general approval of both the courses and of the curricular innovation the "Living and Learning Center" would provide. However, many of the details of the Gaudino plan came under severe criticism.

Jorling said, "The idea that this proposal is merely an experiment is not emphasized enough by the Gaudino Committee's draft." He also said the draft overemphasizes the extent of the intellectual crisis it is trying to repair.

Most of the committee members said the proposal was written in too negative a tone and that the Center should be described as refreshing intellectual life, rather than repairing or revolutionizing it. Assistant Professor of German Gail Newman questioned the need for such a center. "Things are changing on their own," she said. "Intellectual enthusiasm and passion are coming back by themselves, and I'm not sure that you can legislate enthusiasm."

Not honors program

Most of the committee members were concerned with, in Dean of the College Stephen Fix's words, "emphasizing the modesty of the proposal." Fix said, "(The experiment) should not in any way be considered an honors program."

In order to prevent such an honors program image and get 44 freshmen who mirror the diversity of the entire freshman class, the CEP favored selecting the 44 freshmen randomly out of all those who apply.

Random selection would hopefully eliminate a prestige factor in the program and also prevent any abnormal grouping of students by personality type, according to committee members.

In debating the issue, members of the CEP recalled that the idea of freshmen taking common classes together is not new. In past years, a Freshman Ancient and Medieval Studies Program existed, in which participants took six classes together. Although students did not share living quarters, the program reportedly met with success.

Despite the criticism, it appears the CEP will approve the Gaudino proposal. Questions, however, such as the student selection process, the location of the housing and which divisional requirement the courses will satisfy remain unanswered.

Louise Glück receives national poetry award

Louise Glück, lecturer in English at Williams, has been awarded the 1985 National Book Critics Circle award for poetry for her most recent book of poetry, The Triumph of Achilles, published last year.

Glück is the author of three other collections of poetry, Firstborn, The House on Marshland and Descending Figure (1980).

Her poems have appeared in a number of anthologies including The Morrow Anthology of Younger American Poets, The Harvard Book of Contemporary American Poetry and The Norton Anthology of American Literature.

Among Glück's previous awards are two grants from the National Endowment for the Arts, a Guggenheim Fellowship and a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation. In 1981, she received an award in literature from the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters.

Glück first came to Williams in 1983 as a Margaret Bundy Scott Visiting Professor.

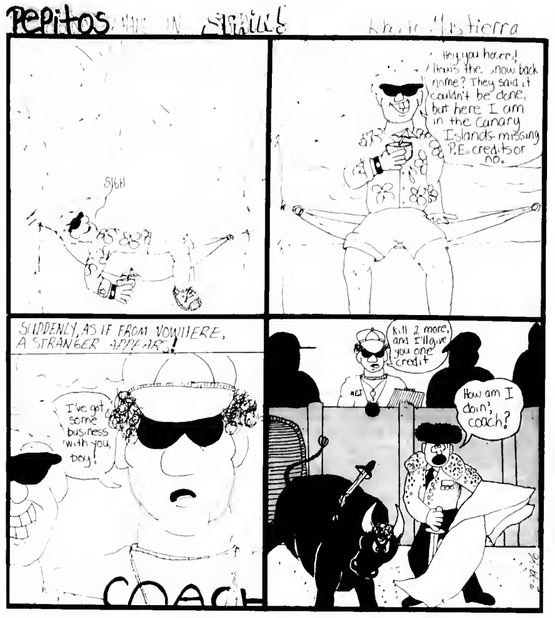
Peter Berek, chairman of the English department, said, "I am very pleased and very proud. I admire her very much as a person and as a teacher. I am very happy she won the award."

Louise Glück

The National Book Critics Circle is an organization of 500 book critics and editors. Selection of the award winners was made by the group's board of directors.

A formal awards presentation for Glück and other award winners will be held at New York University on Thursday. The other winners are Anne Tyler, author of The Accidental Tourist for fiction; Leon Edel for biography; J. Anthony Lukas for general nonfiction; and William H. Gass for criticism.

Keep the term bill off limits



The volunteers who are pushing so hard for a chapter of MASSPIRG here at Williams are to be applauded. By resting on the worthy goals of the organization and aggressively pursuing students around the dining halls, they are approaching enough support to force us to check off a box on our term bills if we do not wish to support the cause.

This proposed funding system is odd to say the least. Despite the argument that Smith and Amherst have such a system, there has been no legitimate reason stated as to why students must go out of their way not to support MASSPIRG. Checking a box is certainly not an encumbrance, but assuming people will support you unless they state otherwise is warped logic. Imagine a magazine solicitation saying, "Unless you check the box and mail back the enclosed form, we will send you our magazine."

Fortunately, at least one reason for establishing an assumed-support system is obvious. All of those who read merely the bottom line of the bill, and all of those parents who do not bother calling their son or daughter to find out if the student wishes to support MASSPIRG will contribute to the organization by default. This provides the stability of the MASSPIRG funding pool, but it is the wrong approach for a volunteer organization to take to solicit funds.

MASSPIRG volunteers claim that there is so much for them to do that a system should be set up to do the work of solicitation for them. This argument is weak. Could the Record editors claim that we have too much else to do and therefore the administration and College Council must provide a stable source of money so we can produce a newspaper every week?

Volunteers who do not have time to solicit funds are not volunteering very much. They are avoiding what those who spend hours gathering signatures for the MASSPIRG petition can attest is the hardest part of working for such an organization. Regardless of the noble intentions of MASSPIRG, the volunteers, like the those of any advocacy group, should have to ask for every dollar they receive.

"Distortions"

To the Editor:

I must point out some gross inaccuracies and distortions in the Record's coverage of the theme house proposal.

First of all, last week, the Record published an incorrect statement. What they called the "Science and Technology" theme house proposal is, in fact, "Technology and Culture." There is a big difference. This can only be attributed to sloppy journalism; the reporters and editors are obviously unwilling to expend the effort to get the facts straight.

Also, the front page article last week unnecessarily stressed the fact that two of the seven people involved in the "Technology and Culture" proposal are Gaudino Committee members. The reporters only chose to interview the two Gaudino Committee members in the group; they did not speak to any of the other five. Besides, if no Gaudino members were willing to live in a theme house, wouldn't the campus have more cause to be suspicious of the sincerity of the proposal?

Thirdly, the Record has consistently clouded the theme house concept with other issues. The campus is also guilty of this. The theme house is one, single, independent concern. While it does raise other issues, it is completely seperate from them. In its Feb. 11 edition, the Record linked the theme house proposal to the co-op issue by putting the originally proposed location in the lead paragraph of what should have been an objective article. Even after the Dean's Office decided not to put the theme house in a co-op, the record clung tenaciously to the co-op issue by inappropriately including two paragaraphs of co-op life in its article on the theme house.

Last week, there was a new topic to skirt the real one. The Record welded the theme house issue to questions about the validity and character of the Gaudino Committee. Many arguments can be made on both sides. All that the Gaudino Committee did was to think of the proposal, but if students think that the Dean's Office was too quick to implement it, we certainly should discuss that. If the campus is worried about the methods by which members of the Gaudino Committe are chosen, then they should certainly bring that up. But both the Record and the campus need to divorce these issues from the theme house issue, and consider them seperately.

We are both part of the "Technology and Culture" proposal. Like all the members of the group, we are anxious for an examination of the theme house proposal on its own merits. We have thoughtfully considered our own proposal, and we are convinced that we have a great deal to offer to the campus. Mostly, we vigorously support the idea of the theme house of any subject, and we hope that, with all the extraneous issues swept away, people will be free to appreciate and support this new and exciting experiment.

Bryant

To the Editor:

We of the Bryant House Sculpture Committee (B.H.S.C.) are disappointed. After a banner year for letters uncovering such scandals as who is facing which way on the telephone book, the proper form for announcing a party in the Daily Advisor ("Naked Women" will not do), and the relationship between ice sculptures and female eating disorders, we were surprised that our sculpture did not incite public outcry.

Where are our morals? There are women and children wandering this campus — someone should be offended by a 30 foot ice phallus. Frankly, we were. We applaud the moral beacon who had the courage, as well as the stamina, to destroy the abomination.

MASSPIRG

To the Editor:

All who have been involved with MASSPIRG's organizing efforts this semester would like to thank the Williams community for its enthusisatic support. After only one week of petitioning, 60 percent of the student body has endorsed the establishment of a MASSPIRG chapter, and many faculty members have expressed their support.

If we are successful at bringing MASSPIRG to Williams, we will join a network of 24 other campuses across the state in working on public interest issues that affect us all. Most of these schools, including Amherst, Smith, and UMass, are funded by waivable fees which appear on the term bills. In each case, no other organization has attempted the difficult and time-consuming process necessary for placement on the term bill.

A non-partisan, student-directed organization, MASSPIRG must be democratically endorsed directly by the students—by means of a campuswide petition of referendum conducted at least every two years—thus distinguishing itself from every other camps organization.

We are asking that the Williams community grant us a two-year trial period so that we can have an impact on issues of common concern to all—acid rain, hazardous waste cleanup, the national Student Campaign Against Hunger, voter registration—and prove ourselves worthy of continued community support.

Having Fun?

To the Editor:

It is sad that some people, like Michelle Bates, have to warp the meaning of something to make it appear insensitive and incompassionate. Michelle complained of the Roman vomitorium snow sculpture saying it was insensitive to people who have eating disorders. I'm sure that people who built the sculpture were not trying to offend anyone. It was just some comic relief, and Lord knows we could use some more at Williams.

In fact, most comedy, if taken to an extreme, could offend anyone. So, we have a dilemma. Do we outlaw comedy or do we disagree with Michelle Bates and say it's okay to have some fun. Sometimes people take life too seriously. Sometimes people at this college take everything too seriously. If you take life too seriously, well, then agree with Michelle. I'd rather have some fun and not die of hypertension at age 22.

MASSPIRG funding: a closer look creates serious questions

by Paul Mahoney '87, Bill Leininger '86 and Bill Takis '86

As many Williams students have noticed, organizers of MASSPIRG have presented a petition to place a $3 waivable fee on the term bill in order to fund their organization. They have done a credible job of explaining their position honestly and fairly. They did not, of course, present the other side of the issue.

We feel that many students signed this petition without full cognizance of the issues involved. By explaining this, we do not wish to judge the aims of the group, per se, nor do we in any way question the sincerity of the Williams students here on campus. We do strongly question the mechanics of funding as proposed.

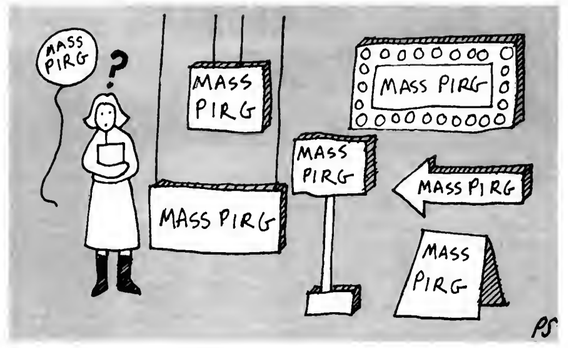
First, no organization is funded directly through the term bill. Organizations either accept the requirement that Student Activity Tax money essentially remains on campus, or raise seperate funds, or some combination of the two. There are many worthy groups, some currently operating on campus, and it creates a bad precedent to allow one group to buck the funding system.

Does MASSPIRG have any more validity than Peer Health or Lehman Service? Are we to allow the Red Cross and Save the Children to fund through the bill? What happens when other well-organized groups such as Accuracy in Academia or Greenpeace apply? These groups like MASSPIRG get students involved in causes of concern for themselves and the community/world around them. Is our term bill to become a shopping list for groups around and about campus? It seems to elevate group funding to a status that it does not warrant. The SAT money is governed by strict guidelines and reflects a universality and commonality of interests that a seperate line item on the term bill does not.

There are darker overtones as well. It was asserted by the organizers at the Feb. 27 College Council meeting that according to the state organization, the term bill funding was to ensure "stable funding" and that was the only way to achieve it. Yet, they repeatedly stressed that the system, due to the ability to void the fee, was voluntarily. How will a voluntary system, in and of itself, provide stable funding? If it is optional, is it not just as open to caprice as any other system? Would not a seperate letter get just as effective a response? After all, if people are concerned enough to support the group, they would give their $3 regardless of whether they had to write a seperate check. It does not seem that the stability argument really holds.

The answer is an implicit assumption that placing this on the term bill gives MASSPIRG a greater validity than other groups, and most especially, that people (read: Mom and Dad) will not really care that much about $3 when they are already writing out the check for $14,000. Some may call that careless spending; we call it human nature and believe that someone at MASSPIRG wishes to capitalize on that. They seem to be making up for apathy by an end-run around the obstaces posed by funding guidelines. (MASSPIRG points out that parents benefit from their work as well. We point out that this applies specifically only to Massachusetts parents.)

The answer given by the group is that the nature of the group does not give them the time to collect all these separate payments. Time spent on administrative work would be better used working for their goals. To this, we can only respond, "Some 75 other groups do!"



Accordingly, we question whether the MASSPIRG petition, which received a majority of student signatures, was really understood by those students. True, people should know what they are signing. Yet, when such a petition is to have the force of administrative law behind it, it is the responsibility of student representatives to see that the Williams student body is informed. That is the real purpose of this piece.

What further information is there other than the points raised? All MASSPIRG funds go to a state-wide coordinating group, and then are reallocated back to the campus in a fashion determined by the PIRG. The Williams organizers claim that the campus will get more back than they put in. Is there any guarantee, however? By agreeing to this measure, we put our funds under the charter of a seperate organization, and unlike conventionally funded groups, there is no way of making sure this money is spent wisely.

As one College Council member succinctly put it, the petition basically asks three questions: Do you believe in the public service aims of MASSPIRG? Would you grant them the right to operate on campus? Would you facilitate this right by making it a totally voluntary item on the term bill? The tendency is to say "Yes, Yes, No," but you feel you must sign so that the two parts you agree with go right ahead. You do not think of the implications and alternatives because they are not self-evident.

In short, we feel that the signatures on the MASSPIRG petitions were gotten very cheaply indeed. As students concerned with the legitimacy and effective functioning of student organizations, which must be protected from unfair practice by one of their group , we ask Williams students to reconsider their positions, and to let College Council representatives know how you feel.

Dartmouth and the shanties: Could it happen at Williams?

by Hans Humes '87

Throughout history, political disagreements have broken into violence. One faction will tire of merely expressing its beliefs with words and gestures and will attempt to intimidate those with opposing views by force. Usually this happens on a national or international scale.

On January 21, however, the day after Martin Luther King Day, twelve students armed with pick axes and sledgehammers attacked the shanty town built on the green of Dartmouth College to protest investment in South Africa. The conservative students were not merely tearing down shacks that cluttered the field, they were bullying those who tried to express their views on a situation they wished to change.

The occurence has implications for all of academia, Williams included. For although we have avoided a situation as serious as that which happened at Dartmouth, similar intolerance has manifested itself and has the potential to provoke something equally as ugly. Those who are satisfied with the status quo and who wish to actively defend it should recognize that those who wish to change it are in an inherently weaker position and deserve the opportunity to express their views.

"The intent of demolishing the shanties was just to get rid of them," said one of the leaders of the attack, "It was not a political attack." The attitude is common but fallacious. The act was political. A sincere desire to provoke thought on the issue of apartheid and the college's role in the situation had motivated the builders. "These are the conditions under which blacks in South Africa live," said one Dartmouth professor.

Reacting to such an obviously political act is hard to justify as being solely for aesthetic reasons. The twelve students who attacked the shanty town to "beautify" the Green probably would not have volunteered to clean up after a rally for the Dartmouth hockey team. The identities of the attackers also makes it difficult to take the act as non-political. Although one man involved in the destruction is black, ten of the twelve who wielded an axe are staff members of the controversial right-wing student newspaper, the Dartmouth Review.

The violence of the act was what aroused the most concern, both at Dartmouth and for the rest of the country. Rather than circulate a petition or counter the shanty town with an equally creative gesture, the attackers used force to express their anger. In contrast, the shanty builders had avoided confrontation. Although they disobeyed college orders to remove the shacks, they did move them from the center of the Green to make room for a snow sculpture.

The attack divided Dartmouth. "For the last month this campus has operated like an armed camp. Warring factions have positioned themselves, and, for the time being, peaceful coexistence or mutual understanding seems a distant possibility," said an article in the Dartmouth, the student newspaper.

We should consider ourselves here at Williams lucky that we have a unified campus that has experienced protests with no serious retaliations. Perhaps

> There are signs, however, that Williams has the potential to have the same kind of confrontation . . .

Williams has the ability to have reasonable interchanges and expressions of opinion. There are signs, however, that Williams has the potential to have the same kind of confrontation that split Dartmouth.

Recently, however, such pointed retaliations to politically liberal statements or gestures have occurred here. This past December, a candlelight vigil gathered in front of the President's house to demonstrate against South African apartheid and political repression. While speeches were being made, Bruce Springsteen's "Born in the U.S.A." blasted out of West College, and drowned out the speakers. At the Women's Party during Winter Study, drunk men tried to barge their way in and only left after repeated requests.

Both times, those responsible denied a political motive for the attack. Their attitude seemed to be that they were only having fun. It was only the scale of the action they took and the lack of real, as opposed to potential, violence (drunk guys can get mean) that differentiated these episodes from the demolition of the shanty town. Luckily, there was not enough animosity inspired to divide the campus along the lines that mark the Dartmouth schism.

The Williams students involved in blasting music from West College and the trespassing to the Women's Party are just as guilty of attempting to suppress a group's opinion as are the attackers at Dartmouth. They are acting from a socially secure position even is their actions are not socially acceptable. Those they are retaliating against have to take the initiative to call into question these things that happen in our society. Their gestures have to be dramatic, otherwise they would not arouse enough interest to be effective.

If protestors comfort themselves non-confrontationally and civilly, they have the right to be heard. Usually they do. Just a couple of weeks ago, the Trustees of Middlebury College adjusted their policy on investments in South Africa in the face of vigils by students and faculty marked by restraint on the part of both the protesters and those that disagreed. Let us hope that those of conservative attitudes here at Williams can act as responsibly as those at Middlebury and respect the sincerity of those who see a way to improve our world. We should not wait for something as traumatic as what happened in Dartmouth to be our edification.

Smith grant

Assistant Professor of biology David C. Smith has been awarded a $144,051 grant from the National Science Foundation to study frog-population controls.

The grant enables Smith to continue a research program on the chorus frog he has worked on since 1978, supporting his research for the next three summers. Smith, who has taught at Williams since 1979, will examine the effects of habitat and fitness on the survival and development of the chorus frog larva. Through this, he hopes to learn more about how the numbers and distribution of the chorus frog population are controlled and better understand what controls vertebrate populations in nature.

The study of frogs, Smith says, "has contributed considerably to our understanding of predation and competition in nature." Smith carries out his fieldwork at the Isle Royale National Park, a wilderness park in Michigan.

The grant is part of the NSF's Research in Undergraduate Institutions Program and is designed to contribute to undergraduate education in ecology. For each of the next two summers, Smith will have two undergraduate field assistants who will learn about designing and carrying out experiments in ecology.

Star Wars

There will be a panel discussion on the Strategic Defense Initiative, better known as "Star Wars," at 8:00 p.m. Thursday in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. The panel will be moderated by James MacGregor Burns '39, professor of political science.

Kim Bruce, associate professor of mathematical sciences, will present "'Star Wars' Software is Beyond Our Reach." William G. Wagner, assistant professor of history will discuss Russian Reaction to "Star Wars;" and Rosy Nimrody, project director of the Council on Economic Priorities in New York City, will talk about the social and economic costs of "Star Wars."

The formal presentations will be followed by discussion and questions. The talks are sponsored by the Williams College Lecture Committee, the department of political economy, the Disarmament Forum, the Williamstown Nuclear Weapons Education Center and the S.D.I. Forum. They are free and open to the public.

Two other lectures relating to S.D.I. will follow the panel discussion. Freeman Dyson, from the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton University, will discuss weapons in space April 10, and Vera Kistiakowsky, professor of physics at M.I.T., will present "S.D.I. and the Scientists: Why the Controversy?" April 15.

Women's Week

As part of the celebration of International Women's Week, the Feminist Alliance is sponsoring Williams Women's Week, a week-long series of events, which began yesterday with a creative reading and an art show.

Tonight will be women's open mike night at the Log, beginning at 10:00, with entertainment by Ephoria and other Williams women. Wednesday, a women's coffee hour will be held at 4:00 p.m. in Baxter Lounge.

Thursday, as part of the faculty lecture series, Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong will present "Feminism, Pornography and the Law" at 4:30 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

A slide lecture by Mary Caroline Hopkins, an expert on feminist symbols and images through 30,000 years of western culture, will be shown Friday. "Revisioning Feminism" will be presented at 4:00 p.m. in Lawrence Hall, room 231.

The week-long celebration will conclude Saturday with a day-long symposium called "Visualizing Women's Lives." Participants in the interdisciplinary symposium, which will begin at 10:00 a.m. in Lawrence 231, will include historians, a poet, a photographer and a playwright. It is sponsored by the Robert Sterling Clark Visiting Professorship.

Charity Run

Williams students, faculty and staff will participate in the 15th annual Charity Relay for the College Chest Fund this Saturday in the Towne Field House.

This year's event will be a six-hour relay, from 11:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., with members of each team running miles alternately in an attempt to achieve the highest team total. Teams can draw an unlimited number of runners, with co-ed participation especially encouraged, according to Peter Farwell '73, Williams cross country coach.

The charity event will benefit local charities, including Mt. Greylock ABC, Help Line, the hospices of Northern Berkshire, Northern Berkshire Community Action, Reading for the Blind and the Williamstown Youth Center.

Farwell said he hopes every student will at least make a nominal donation. Food Service will provide cake and lemonade at 3:00 p.m. For more information, call Mrs. Dean at Jenness House at 597-2344.

Log video airs tonight

A video about the Log, filmed by a group of Williams students, will air tonight at 8:00 on local cable channel 7. The documentary explored the effects of stricter state drinking laws and college policies on attendance at and student opinion about the Log.

The filming was done during Winter Study, and the production is the first documentary by the group, although they did participate in the filming of President Francis Oakley's inauguration last fall.

The students borrowed the equipment from local Channel 7, the Berkshire Cablevision. A repeat telecast is scheduled for Thursday at 8 p.m., also on channel 7.

Freshmen hear pitch for houses

by Debbie Snyder

Representatives from each of the five upperclass housing categories cited advantages such as a juke boxes and computer terminals as incentives for choosing a house in a presentation to freshmen last Wednesday.

The Housing Committee sponsored the presentation to inform freshmen about the personalities and features of each of the housing groups to help them with their freshmen inclusion decisions, due next Wednesday, March 12.

Chauncey Lennon '88, president of Tyler House, showed a videotape titled "Living with Tyler." The tape featured a student walking up Park Street towards Tyler to the Beatles' song Long and Winding Road. "Many Tylerites have thought out their entire lives while walking home," the tape's narrator claimed, making light of Tyler's distance from the rest of the College.

Show and tell

"We'll show you our rooms," offered Matt Lapointe '88, a vice president of Dodd House. He said Dodd will be accepting 35 to 40 freshmen, who will be able to participate in such delightful activities as stair-diving and "zing." Lapointe also noted the dining hall and large rooms with fireplaces and private bathrooms as advantages to Dodd.

The row houses were represented by Coleman Yeaw '87, president of A-Gar-Wood, and Ken Jones '87, vice president of Perry-Bascom. House libraries and the quality of the furniture were cited as some of the benefits of the row houses. "The furniture is good in Dodd," Yeaw said, "but it gets moved around too much.

Yeaw reassured freshmen concern about the small size of the row houses. "You like 95 percent of the people. Of course, there's the five percent you really hate," he added.

Profile: Professor Paula Ennis-Dwyer

by Eric Hanson and Joe Thorndike

Paula Ennis-Dwyer didn't start her piano study the way many children do; her parents never forced her to take lessons. Rather, she actually pushed for the opportunity. "I started out asking them for a piano," she recalled. Such ambition has helped lead her to a life of professional performance and teaching.

Ennis-Dwyer, an assistant professor, has been a member of the Williams music department since the fall of 1980. She plays in the Williams Trio, performs regularly as a soloist on campus, and teaches courses in music theory and music history.

Her musical interest can be traced to elements of her upbringing, according to Ennis-Dwyer. Her father was a professional jazz trumpet player and had his own band at the University of Idaho. "There was a lot of music going on in my home," she remembered. This constant exposure to music manifested itself in her desire to play the piano. She received the piano she wanted from her parents and began studying at the age of six.

She and the piano have been a perfect pair from the start. "At first, it's just something fun to do," she explained, "... if your fingers work right. It's sort of like doing puzzles or something." She began private study at the age of seven and remained with the same teacher until she went to college.

Ennis-Dwyer dedicated her high school years to music. A career in the field really began to seem attractive when, at age 16, she attended the Aspen Music Festival. "I got tremendous inspiration (from the Festival). It was extremely exciting; I think I was one of the younger people there."

She enrolled at Indiana University because it was renowned for both music and medicine, a field she thought she might also pursue. At Indiana, her music study was supervised by Menahem Pressler, pianist for the Beaux Arts Trio. Ennis-Dwyer studied under Pressler and eventually became his assistant while pursuing her degrees (a bacheiors, masters and Ph.D.) at Indiana.

After receiving her masters degree, Ennis-Dwyer won a Fulbright Scholarship to study in Germany. She recails her foreign study as a valuable learning experience. "For personal growth, it was just incredibie," she said.

It was in Europe that Ennis-Dwyer said she learned to appreciate the quailty of her American education. "It made me feel so lucky to have been able to study at a piace like Indiana," she observed. Nonetheless, studying in Europe was, in her view, quite worthwhile. "When you have teachers you don't like, you find out more of what you do like. You can learn from that too," she said.

After returning to Indiana to pursue her doctorate, Ennis-Dwyer went to the State University of New York to begin teaching. "It was a fine place to be except that I didn't have the opportunity to play chamber music, so I was persuaded to come here."

Music at Williams

Ennis-Dwyer said she found the students at Williams particularly eager to learn about music. "Here the student is very intelligent and will do just about anything you ask them to do," she commented, "and I find their interest real."

She acknowledged the difficulty that students at the College must have juggling other academic responsibilities with musical studies. "Music is the type of a thing which, to get good at" she explained, "you've just got to spend hours. You can't hurry up that process. There is no substitute for the time spent learning the art."

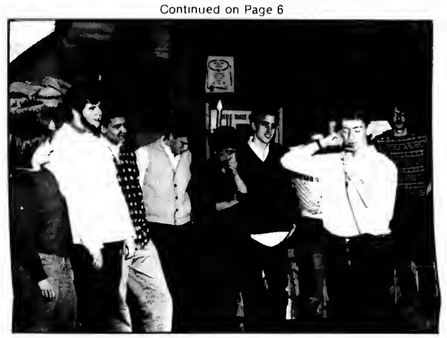
The double-duty of performing and teaching in a collegiate atmosphere has been stimulating, according to Ennis-Dwyer. She said that the opportunity to play with the Williams Trio has fit in well with her interests. "One of my favorite things to do is to play in a piano trio," she said. "The repetoire for the piano trio is just the best. You get to play Beethoven, you get to play Brahms, Ravel ... some great, great literature."

In addition to performing regularly with the Williams Trio in concerts on campus and at other area schools, Ennis-Dwyer made her New York Carnegie Recital Hall debut in 1981, a year after she began teaching at Williams.

Combo 'Za: It isn't just for breakfast anymore

by Bill O'Brien

The ten minutes before going on stage seem to be the most difficult. The noise coming from the practice room upstairs in the Log is even greater than the buzz from the capacity filled room below. Members of the comedy group are talking nervously ... not talking to each other as much as just talking.



Co-Leader Brian Carpenter '86 (who directs the group with Melanie Daglian '86) enters the room saying that the show is about to begin, although the female singing group sharing the bill tonight, the Smith Notabies, has yet to arrive.

The less-than-funny informal rehearsal is over and the show is about to begin, minus any Notabies.

Combination Pizza was started last year by David Weiner '85, now a professional comedian. The interest in the group has been steadily increasing ever since. Eighty people were actually turned away from last Saturday night's performance which featured Weiner's return to Williams. The show in the first semester was "under the evil influence of the two-drink limit and not nearly as successful," according to member Dan O'Connor '89.

Combination Pizza is primarily an improvisational group with an occasional stand-up routine thrown in. Much of the material for the shows are classic improvisational pieces borrowed by the group, according to Daglian and Carpenter. The stand-up routines are written and performed by individual group members.

Eph jazzers cruise into new level of musicality

by Mike Costantino

One of the newest musical traditions at Williams is entering its prime. There is no luck involved with this evolution; it is solely the product of hard work, strong direction, talent, and a generous funding program recently established by the music department. Now recognized as one of the three major departmental performing groups (along with the Berkshire Symphony and the Choral Society), the Williams Jazz Ensemble takes its position seriously, especially when it comes to concert presentations. The next performance will be this Sunday at 8 p.m. in Chapin Hall.

The Ensemble's tradition is not long-lived, but nonetheless is very lively. In recent years it had been led by Dan Gutwein, a former faculty member under whom the band was founded, but with his departure the music department sought out new directing talent. The slot was filled by Brian Norcross, a recent graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music and current director of instrumental music at Mt. Greylock Regional High School. His musical knowledge and insistence upon meticulous articulation and tight ensemble playing has led the ensemble to a new sound.

Student leader and bassist Paul Rardin '87 works closely with Norcross in choosing selections and establishing the band's musical direction. The characteristic voice of the group is leaner and tighter, yet undeniably cool and jazzy. This is a difficult musical balance to achieve with 17 young, hot-blooded jazz musicians, but it is the students and their commitment that ultimately make the ensemble effective.

Jazz talk

Much of the group's character lies in the members of the Ensemble who communicate with their fellow "jazzers" as they can with no others. Perhaps this ability is due to a strange language mutation with causes them to say "cat" and "dude" in every other sentence. More likely, it is the unique rehearsal and performance atmosphere of jazz itself.

As far as the upcoming concert is concerned, many hours of rehearsal time have been invested already, and many more remain before the product is worked up to its desired level. The variety of the program makes this a challenging task. The program will feature selections ranging from classic swing charts such as Duke Ellington's "Don't Get Around Much Anymore" to modern funk charts such as Herbie Hancock's "Chameleon." Rounding out the concert will be selections such as George Gershwin's "It Ain't Necessar-

'Exiles' cast excels despite sluggish script

by Elizabeth Skorcz

Director Michael Knight took a risk in choosing James Joyce's Exiles for the latest Williamstheatre event, but his strong and experienced cast made the production a muted success. The epigraph on the program, a quote by critic Stanley Kauffmann, describes Exiles accurately: "Hardly a perfect work, but a deep work and a major challenge for our actors, an exciting and tense drama."

One of the main flaws is that Joyce could not decide exactly what his play should be about. He worked an impressive array of themes into it and all are developed into intriguing issues. Their interrelationship, however, is never resolved.

Something positive came out of the plethora of thematic material, however. It required Joyce to create complex and interesting characters. All of the actors in the current production met the challenge of making their characters believable while conveying their peculiarities.

Exiles centers around the troubled relationship between Richard Rowan (portrayed by Cameron Smith '86), a renowned Irish writer just returned from nine years of self-imposed exile on the continent, and his wife Bertha (Su Wrench '86). Inferior to Richard in intellect, Bertha cannot understand his writings, a fact which causes her pain. Nonetheless, she is rich in perception and a gut-level sense of selfworth and she refuses to let her husband humble her.

Robert Hand (Jon Moscone '86) is both Richard's close friend and his rival for Bertha's love. Robert offers Bertha warm, if melodramatic, affection that she does not receive from the aloof and sometimes heartless Richard. Further complicating matters is Beatrice Justice (Martha Hughes '86), Robert's Protestant cousin, a woman with a fine mind but without the capacity to give herself completely to anyone. Richard maintains an intimate correspondance during his exile, sending her chapters of his book and consequently setting up tension between her and Bertha.

Not much action

Exiles is not a play of action. It works instead as protracted emotional parrying, with thrust followed by a counterthrust. Gradually, the audience realizes that no decisive hit is coming; the relationships are too charged with pain for resolution to be possible. The lack of action is a problem in a three-hour play. Call it sacrilege, but perhaps Knight should have made some cuts in Joyce's script. At times, especially in the first act, the pace is too slow and makes the audience feel that the play was meant to be read rather than acted.

Exiles does not lend itself to unforgettable performances, but the cast worked well together, developing an emotional involvement in the audience that partially offset the play's unnecessary length. Smith preserved Richard's fundamental coldness and at the same time conveyed his inner doubts, especially about Bertha's fidelity. Smith used the space on stage skillfully, speaking to people from a deliberate distance to emphasize visually the idea of exile.

Wrench captured Bertha's simple side and her involuntary dependence on Richard while making her a sympathetic character with her ability to assert herself and remind him of all that she had given him. Moscone added comic relief without becoming a flat comic character. He was alternately the dandified ladies-man, the conniver, and the sincere friend. Playing a smaller role than the three above, Hughes delivered a polished performance, showing Beatrice's simultaneous desire and reticence.

Exiles needs to be viewed several times to be properly understood. The current production is worth seeing once, but because of its problems, it does not inspire a second round.

The final performances will be held March 6, 7, and 8 at the AMT MainStage. Tickets are $2 for the general public and $1 with a Williams ID.

Combination Pizza

Anyone who was at Friday night's performance knows how funny it was and anyone who wasn't should have been. Combination Pizza got all the laughs they could squeeze out of the improv pieces. A sterling example was a skit in which Daglian and Sherman Wolcott '88 changed "emotions" on command, from "horny" to "premenstrual syndrome," while checking out groceries. No attempt should be made to transfer the improv comedy to print since those of you who went to "Road Warrior" on Friday night don't deserve a free laugh and it probably wouldn't come out too funny anyway.

One particular stand-up joke, however, does bear repeating and should be preserved for future use. The joke was part of Ray Yau's ('88) stand-out stand-up routine, in which he gave us "S.H.W.A.T" (S-- head wearing a tie), an acronym which may be used in reference to a member of the Williams Octet. The joke may have garnered the biggest laugh of the night.

It was hard to judge, however, as the laughs rolled on.Dirck Fuller '88 gave a marvelous stand-up routine. Every improv piece was rewarded with much deserved laughter. Carpenter and Daglian should be singled out; it is fitting that they are the leaders as they are the cream of a very talented crop.

The Smith Notables should also be mentioned with much praise for their performance, if not for their sense of direction. (They finally showed up). They kept the music, and the fun, at a consistently high level.

March's Eph of the Month award goes to Mike Clinchot '87, Carolyn O'Brien '88, and Anne O'Keeffe '88, the three organizers of the MS fundraising concerts that featured Joe Band and The Rhythm Method. For raising over $1,000, these three outstanding Ephs will receive a gift certificate from Goff's.

The group has been blessed with an outstanding crop of newcomers this year, an especially fortunate situation considering that less than half of the current members are veterans. The upcoming performance will be the band's second Chapin Hall concert this school year. The Ensemble also played a November swing dance in Baxter Hall and was featured at a Valentine's Day party in the Greylock Dining Hall last month.

Costantino, a member of the class of 1985, is an alumnus of the Williams Jazz Ensemble.

Springfield bolted to a 7-0 lead. Once again, the Ephs rose to the occassion. This time, Clarey took uncontested control of the net play as his kills found the floor often

After leading 9-4, Springfield began to squirm as the Ephs tallied point after point off digs from the back row. Several well-placed dumps by Beltran broke Springfield's back as the Ephs raced towards 15.

Following a roll shot by Andren at 13-13 for a side-out and a service winner by Ahn, Connick put down a middle one in front of the Springfield defense for the final point.

The win, combined with a sweep of the tri-match at Middlebury this past weekend, brings the Ephs' record to 14-5, 6-2 in league play. An all-important match with UMass-Amherst comes tonight at 7:00 in Lasell Gym.

The row-house presentation concluded with a film of Perry House's bizarre Medieval Banquet and a video of I Fought the Law, in which students try to elude security after stealing a computer from Jesup.

No Lemmings

"Do you know what a lemming is?" asked J.B. Bird '86, speaking for Fitch-Currier/Prospect. "One runs over a cliff, and the rest follow. There are no lemmings in the Berkshire Quad."

Bird showed slides which featured the quad's proximity to the planetarium, rooms with lofts and large quantities of alcohol. Bird also claimed that each closet in Prospect is the size of a Mission Park single, that the quad will have the only juke box on campus next year, and glibly lied,"There's at least one fireplace in every room."

Speaking for Mission Park were House Presidents Tom Fitzgibbon '87 of Armstrong, Doug Troob '88 of Mills and Mark Gilrain '87 of Pratt. They noted the word-processing terminal and the dining hall in the building.

"All the rooms are the same, so you don't have to spend a lot of time looking at all the rooms, like in Dodd," Gilrain said. He also claimed, "You can find time to study in the Park, if you really feel like it."

The Greylock Quad was represented by House Presidents Greg Stanger '86 of Bryant, David Mason '88 of Carter, Cole Thompson '86 of Gladden and George Clemens '86 of Mark Hopkins. They said that some of the advantages of living in Greylock are that everyone is assured a nice room and that there are ping-pong and pool tables.

Housing President Debbie Semel '86 concluded the presentation by advising freshmen, "It's more important who you live with, not where you live."

spoken." Council Vice President Amy Jeffress '87 pointed to the long hassle through which MASSPIRG had gone, saying, "If a group is willing to go through with this, they deserve our support."

Swope agreed with Jeffress. She said, "I don't understand what's so bad about other groups that are willing to go through the whole process getting similar status."

Opponents of the waivable fee said the term bill is not the relevant forum for such organizations as MASSPIRG to gain funds. "I think that the core issue is whether we want to turn the term bill into a shopping list for good causes," Council Representative Paul Mahoney '86 said.

"Why don't we have similar boxes for deserving causes like cancer research, (or) multiple sclerosis, and while we're at it, why don't we have one to find out what went wrong with the space shuttle?" he added.

GLU panel

Antje Lewis '87 said she did not accept her sexuality during her freshman year but became more accepting the following summer when she developed a crush on a female roommate. She said, "Initially, I had a lot of trouble with just the word lesbian."

Telling families

When asked how their friends and family dealt with their sexuality, the panel members had very different experiences to recount. Rosenbaum said he had expected his parents to handle the situation well. "I thought my parents were liberal. I mean, rebellion in my house was saying that I hated Bob Dylan. They didn't have the Woodstock reaction I expected."

Bill Hollands '87 said he demanded too much too soon from his parents and that his mother denied his homosexuality for three years. Hollands said the final outcome was a strengthening of family relationships. He said,"I feel like a part of the world again."

When asked about their Williams experience, the panel members seemed to agree there is a conflict between honesty and the natural need to protect one's self. Rosenbaum said, "When somebody says hello over the salad bar with 'Hey, faggot, how's it going?' it's sort of difficult to come out and say that you're gay."

Counseling assistance

The value of counseling services on campus was also praised. John Tyler '88 pointed out the helpfulness of his junior advisers, 10 to 1 and the GLU. Rosenbaum said, "It takes that initial step. When you ask for the help it comes rushing in. I've had a very positive experience."

During the question and answer session, Martin White '87, a junior adviser in Williams A, asked how JA's could make entry life easier for homosexuals.

Rosenbaum said he had a positive experience with his four JA's. "They did all the right things," he said. "They never allowed jokes that put down a group. Comments about Jews or blacks would have been addressed immediately."

The panel's reasons for participating in the discussion were summed up by Rosenbaum, who said, "There are a lot of places I'd rather be. One reason we're doing this is so that one day we won't have to." He also affirmed, "Life is easier and better after you come out. Life is hell before."

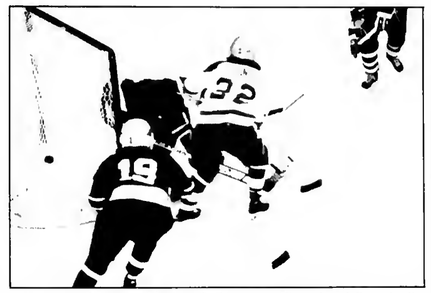
Pucksters trounce Cards by 4-1



by Michele Barry

The women's hockey team ended their season on a victorious note on Saturday, beating Wesleyan 4-1 after a disappointing 11-1 loss to UConn, the previous weekend. The team's final record was 6-8-1.

In the game gainst UConn., senior co-captain Beth Ebel scored the only Eph goal. Co-captain Sue Klein '86 said that the game was particularly disappointing because the team had played so well during practice that week.

Ebel, who had 13 goals and 3 assists for the season, opened the scoring for Williams against Wesleyan when she slipped the puck past the fallen Cardinal goalie. Lisa Marr '86, who had a season total of 9 goals and 8 assists, followed suit with her goal, and Ebel put in another shot to give Williams a 3-0 lead at the end of the first period.

Sally Hart '86 put in Williams' final goal in the second period, following up on a Jenny Ause '88 shot that hit the post. Hart tallied 5 goals and 5 assists this season. The second period ended with Williams in the lead 4-0. Wesleyan's only goal came in the third period to end the game 4-1.

Tedie Jones '86 gives the Wesleyan goalie a hard time in the Ephwomen's 4-1 victory over their Little Three rivals on Saturday. (Khakee)

Ebel commented that "The team really came together; everyone worked well with each other."

Klein agreed, adding that the Ephwomen outshot and outskated Wesleyan, allowing only a few breakaways which goalie Debbie Bernheimer '86 handled with her usual skill. Bernheimer played in goal for eight of the Ephwomen's games, allowing 31 goals out of 164 shots. Her game record was 4-3-1. Daisy Hagey '88, who took over while Bernheimer was in Russia, played in seven games and allowed 37 goals out of 220 shots to bring her record to 2-5.

The Ephwomen were happy to get this last victory for their seven seniors: Ebel, Klein, Marr, Hart, Bernheimer, Sarah Montgomery, and Tedie Jones.

Both Ebel and Klein also noted the enormous contribution that assistant coaches Dave Scheibe '86 and Dave O'Keefe '86 have given to the team in the past three years, attributing much of the team's success to their hard work and dedication.

Volleyball beats Springfield

Last Tuesday, the men's volleyball team came from behind to complete a stunning upset of league leading Springfield College. The victory was the first over Springfield in nearly two years and established the Ephs as solid contenders for the New England crown.

The first game saw Williams come out strong, led by co-captains Sam Beltran '87 and Chris Clarey '86. Springfield, normally a slow-starting team, fell in the first game as Beltran set the tempo with quick sets to middle hitters Clarey and Bill Connick '88. The offense was balanced out with rising star Eric Andren '86 hitting away from the strong side. Williams rode Springfield's lackadaisical first game play to a 15-10 win.

The second and third games brought about a Springfield awakening as their more aggressive offense dominated. The Ephs' poor outside blocking and passing opened the door for Springfield's comeback.

Ephs come alive

With the crowd filing out and the Springfield bench celebrating, the Ephs fell behind 11-4 in the fourth game and faced elimination. But the Ephs came alive. The key to the comeback began with the spirited defense in the back row of juniors John Ahn, Bruce Pohlman, and Steve Skavlem. The tough defense sparked the offense as Beltran turned picture-perfect passing into points via quick kicks from the middle or outside hitters.

With Pohlman serving, the Ephs reeled off six points to cut the deficit. Springfield was confused as spikes by Connick and Clarey were sprinkled around outside hits from Andren and Winston Chang '89. The defense and passing had returned as the Ephs forced a fifth game by winning 15-13.

The fifth game started off inauspiciously for the Ephs, as

On the other side of the ice, Salem State's goalie stopped 18 Williams shots, many coming in power-play situations.

Salem State beat Williams to the scoreboard just 4:58 into the third period. The goal came on a well-placed Andy Marcone slapshot that beat Collins to his left side. That goal proved to be enough, but late in the game, Salem State increased their margin to two goals and insured the victory.

ished thirty seconds back in 10th place. In the senior ladies 5K event, former Eph All-American Ellen Chandler '83 finished fifth, while Niedeck placed 10th and Nash 12th in the men's 15K event.

This week Schmidt and Wolf, along with alpine skiers Tim Hill '86, Helge Weiner '87, Martin Magoun '87, Amy Duncombe '89, and Mari Omland '89 will represent Williams in the NCAA Championships to be hosted by UVM in Stowe, Vermont. Later in the month Wolf, Seemann, Bates, Chandler, and Eaton will compete in the United States Senior National Championships in Royal Gorge, California.

The final was 91-84.

"I'm pleased that we came back in the second half," said Sheehy. "Our limitations defensively in terms of quickness, really hurt us. They're just superior to us on the boards."

Sophomore Jim Duquette led the junior varsity team to a 71-64 win over Wesleyan in other action, including breaking away from a press to hit the key layup with under a minute to go. The win set their record at 13-6.

Ephmen finish year, lose 2-0 to Salem St.

by Jamey Gallop

Last Tuesday the men's hockey team dropped another close match, this one by a 2-0 score to the number four seed of Division II East, the Salem State Vikings. The loss was indicative of the frustrations suffered all season as the Ephs skated hard, played solid defense, and had ample scoring opportunities, but could not generate enough offense to get the victory.

The tempo of the game was determined before the opening faceoff, as a scuffle occurred during the warm-ups. It seemed that neither team was willing to forget the incident during the game; 17 penalties were served, seven by the Ephmen.

During the first two periods, the Ephs and Vikings skated remarkably evenly, both teams concentrating more than a fair share of their respective games on contact. Eph netminder Marty Collins '86, playing his last game, thwarted Viking hopes of an easy victory by turning away nine shots in the first period and eight in the second.

Racquetmen finish 8th in nation

Placing two people on the All-America team and finishing eighth in the country, the men's squash team completed their season last weekend at the Nationals in Philadelphia.

Seniors Doug Roble and Sam Fortenbaugh, both playing in the A bracket as the top two players, led the team in the tournament. Captain Roble, playing number one, got to the third round in his final National effort. He ended up falling to Jeff Stanley of Princeton in that third round in a close five-game match, 15-11 in the fifth and final game. Fortenbaugh had a tougher time of it, however. He went to the second round before losing to another Princeton All-American, Fazal Sheikh.

The next four Eph players also fell in the early rounds to the toughest competition they would face all year. Juniors Matt McCall and Keith Goldfeld, playing numbers three and four, respectively, each lost in the second round, Goldfeld to Yale All-American Tom Clayton.

Wendell Chestnut '88 provided some highlights for the Ephs at the number five slot. Although losing in the first round to the Harvard captain, he shot through the consolation bracket, beating two Stony Brook players 3-0 in the semis and finals. Senior Dave Applebaum finished out the Eph lineup by losing in the second round to Yalie John Chiltenden.

But the high point of the weekend came when Roble and Fortenbaugh were named to the second-team All-America squad. Only 21 players were selected. The team's eighth place national ranking matches last year's and sets the stage for some solid squash in the future.

Hoopsters lose to Wesleyan 91-84

by Cliff Peale

Ending the year with a 12-11 record and the Little Three title, the men's basketball team fell to Wesleyan 91-84 on Saturday in Middletown. Junior Brandt Johnson led the Eph effort with 25 points and 10 rebounds, while senior point guard Tim Walsh added to his all-time scoring record with 18 points.

Williams only caught up with the Cardinals once all night after the home team went up 8-2 early. Mike Arcieri drained two early jumpers and the Ephs turned the ball over twice to dig an early hole they could never quite climb out of.

A pair of Johnson inside hoops and a jumper by John Ciulla '87 kept the Ephs close, and when Walsh hit his first hoop of the game at 14:34, Williams was within two at 14-12.

Both teams stayed in zone defenses most of the half, which placed a premium on outside shooting. Arcieri obliged for the Cardinals, while Ciulla, Walsh, and Bill Melchionni '89 shouldered the burden for the Ephs.

Can't shut down Arcieri

Coach Harry Sheehy rotated 11 players in the first half, but none of them could shut down Arcieri, who hit three straight buckets before Johnson and Melchionni led an Eph charge that produced the game's only tie at 24 with 7:30 showing on the clock.

The Cardinals answered, as they would all night long, by going inside. They scored six points in a row, climaxing when Robert James buried a turnaround for a 30-24 advantage. The Ephs again came back, as Walsh hit senior Mike Meadows on the break with four minutes left to cut the lead to one at 32-31.

But at this point the game got out of hand for the Ephs. James, having his way inside, led another Cardinal run, scoring four points as Wesleyan closed out the half with eight straight to set the halftime score at 42-31 in favor of the Cardinals.

At the start of the second stanza, the Ephs came out strong, trying to rally and protect their spotless Little Three record. Melchionni, playing his best offensive game of the year, found Johnson inside to narrow the lead to seven. At this point, there were three runs left in the Ephmen, and the Cardinals answered every one of them.

Coming within five

With fifteen minutes to go, Walsh twice drew the Ephs to within five, but James scored twice to repel that threat. Johnson then hit six straight free throws to pull the Williams to within four at 66-62. After Arcieri misfired, Ciulla bombed from 24 feet and hit nothing but net to come within 66-64. But Arcieri then hit two buckets from similar range and the Cardinals were up 70-64.

The third Eph rally was the most serious. No less than three times they came within two, and each time they were prevented from tying the game. At 7:54 Ciulla hit to come within 70-68, but a traveling violation wiped out the Ephs' chance to tie.

At 6:29, Melchionni stole the ball at midcourt and roared in for the layup while being fouled. But he missed the free throw and a chance to come within one, and Wesleyan's Chris James hit to repel that threat.

At 4:34, the final Eph chance came and went. Johnson hit the glass and sank a layup off the offensive board to pull the Ephs to within 78-76, but the Cardinals got a jumper and a three-point play from Brown to go up 83-76 at 2:40 and effectively sew the game up, as the Ephs could never come closer than five.

Lady Ephs drop a pair to go 4-15

by Al Mottur
and Mark Via

The women's basketba'' team lost its final game of the season to Little Three rival Wesleyan last Saturday by 71-51. The loss sets their season record at 4-15.

The Cardinals started quickly, jumping out to a 19-6 lead with 13:52 remaining in the first half. As the period wore on, the Ephwomen crept back into the game. Their trapping defense forced many turnovers, enabling them to pull to within 32-23 at the half.

When the second half opened, the momentum swung back in the favor of Wesleyan; the Cardinals jumped out to a 48-27 lead after six minutes of play. The Ephwomen, paced by freshman Nancy Hedeman's 17 points, seven rebounds, and four steals, were too far down to stage a comeback.

Point guard Kim Hatch '88 also played well, collecting eight points, three rebounds, three steals, and two assists. The loss concluded what has been a disappointing season for the Ephwomen as they finished with just two wins more than were recorded by last year's 2-19 squad.

Earlier in the week the team traveled to Westfield, Mass. to take on a talented Westfield State squad. The game was never close, as State led 35-17 at the half and ended up winning by 39 points at 75-36. The contest was controlled by Kelly Lachance, Westfield's 6'2" center, who poured in 25 points to lead her team's attack.

Swimmers take NE title

The men's swimming team regained the title they lost last year this weekend, outdistancing UMass to take the New England championships in Springfield.

The first day found the Ephs in good shape. Mike O'Malley '89 opened up with a 10th place in the 500 Free. In the same race, junior Scott Robinson placed seventh to qualify for the Nationals.

Senior Bill Couch and junior Chris Kirwan took second and third in the 200 IM, both times good enough to send them to the Nationals. Will Andrew '86 raced to fourth in the 50 Free, and then the 400 Medley relay of Beau Everett '87, Scott Healy '88, Dominic Kulik '86, and Chris Giglio '89 took fourth in their race to end the first day.

Sweep of 400 IM

Couch and Kirwan started off the Saturday's competition in fine form, taking the top two spots in the 400 IM. Kulik took third in the 100 Fly, and Robinson followed with fourth in the 200 Free. Kulik and Everett then each qualified for Nationals, with Kulik finishing fifth in the 100 Breast and Everett winning the 100 Back.

The second day ended with Andrew, Couch, OMalley, and Kirwan finishing third in the 800 Free relay. The score after two days was Williams 540, UMass 457, and Southern Connecticut 400.

Results of the third and final day of the competition were not available at press time.

Schmidt, Nash place

The nordic ski team competed in the Bay State games and the New England Championships this weekend. In the Bay State games, Beth Schmidt '86 and Mac Nash '88 finished second overall in the 5K and 7.5K races, respectively.

Schmidt jumped out to the lead in Saturday's 5K mass start race. She was passed by the eventual winner, former UNH standout Muzzy Smith, at the midway point. Schmidt held on for second, while her former teammate Sarah Bates '85 finished fourth.

In the men's 7.5K race, Tod Niedeck '89 came out of the mass start in third place. Niedeck held on for fifth, while Nash raced to a second place finish behind Tim Crane.

Kathy Wolf '88 and Kristin Scemann '89 tied for fifth place in the junior 5K in Sunday's New England Junior Olympic Qualifier, while Ann Arnason '89 fin-

Three jailed for quad thefts

by R.P. DeMott

Three Union College students are being held in the Schenectady County Jail on charges stemming from thefts on Feb. 22 at Williams. They have been arraigned in New York on the charge of criminal possession of stolen property in the second degree and could be charged with two counts each of forgery and one count each of attempted forgery.

In addition, the three face charges in Massachusetts of larceny from a building, breaking and entering, and possession of stolen property.

Dean Flanagan, Joseph Guerrieri and John Hazelton, all Union freshmen, were arrested on March 4 and remain in jail as bail has not been set, according to Lieutenant Frank Ranucci of the Schenectady Police Department. The arrests were the result of a joint investigation by the Williams College Security Department, the security department at Union and the police departments of Williamstown and Schenectady.

Sage F was the site of an attempted robbery foiled by Williams freshman Gemma Burgos, who surprised two Union College students trying to steal her roommate's stereo. The two succeeded in stealing a stereo from Williams A.

At 12:45 a.m. on Feb. 22, Mark Reid '89 reported to campus security that a stereo system and television were missing from his living room in Williams A. The missing items were valued at $1,200 by the owners, Reid and his suitemates

Role of leaders highlights CC presidential campaign

by John R. Schafer

The election for College Council president and vice president has boiled down to the issue of the effectiveness of the student government as an advocacy group for students' interests.

The two presidential candidates from outside the Council leadership, Mark Tompkins '87 and Martin White '87, charge that the current leaders have not represented student interest successfully, but Vice President and presidential hopeful Amy Jeffress '87 denies those accusations.

"We are a part of the College Council but not a part of the status quo," White said. "We want to transform the College Council to be more responsive to students and issues. In that sense, we are changing the self-enclosed bounds in which the College Council deals with issues."

Tompkins charged, "The College Council hasn't spoken for students." Citing the deans' approval of Gaudino Committee's theme house proposal without submitting it to the representative student forum, Tompkins said, "The lines of power have been running around the College Council."

Jeffress defended the Council against such charges. "I think presently the administration does respect the College Council and thinks it is a legitimate organization and it represents the student body."

Lackey for administration

White, a junior advisor and at-large member to the Council, is running with Steve Ames '87, the Dodd-Tyler representative. On WCFM's "Community Affairs," Ames said the College Council has been a "lackey for the administration." White said, "The administration

CC elections to run tomorrow thru Fri.

by Allison Wertheim

Voting for the 1986-87 College Council begins this Wednesday with primary elections. Aside from the spots open for four Council officers, students will also elect Council at-large members and housing category representatives, as well as members of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, the Committee on Honorary Degrees and the Honor and Discipline Committee.

This year there are three candidates for secretary of the Council, Henry Jones '88, Nancy Shore '89 and Wendell Chestnut '88. In order to be nominated to run for treasurer, a student must be one of seven members of the College Council's Finance Committee. The three candidates for treasurer are Paul Mahoney '87, Alec Dawson '87 and Sue Ann Mervine '87. (See page 7 for statements by the candidates for secretary and treasurer).

Also included in the election ballot is a proposal concerning the role of minority representatives on the College Council. After the formation of the Black Student Union in 1969, two positions were created on the Council for minority students. When they were created, it was specified that the two representatives would not have voting privileges. The posts are self-nominated and chosen by members of the Elections Committee.

50 percent required

This year, if the proposal passes, the positions will be changed from appointed to elected posts, and the representatives will have voting privileges. As a part of the College Council Constitution, this proposal must receive two-thirds of the student vote to pass, and, in addition, 50 percent of the student body must vote in the election.

Gail Henderson '87, one of this year's minority representatives to the Council, said there was a misunderstanding last year, when the proposal was also on the ballot. "Students didn't realize they had to vote separately for the proposal," she said. They therefore neglected to check the appropriate space on the ballot to vote for the proposal. Yet, student turnout for the election did not reach 50 percent, so the proposal could not pass.

This year, students are being informed about the proposal through notes in their student union boxes, Henderson said. If the change passes in the primary, then the actual vote will take place in the run-off election. "It has been extremely frustrating not having the vote on the Council, and we hope that by informing the entire student body, there will be more support this year," Henderson said.

Anza Mammen '86, president of the College Council, stressed the time commitment involved in holding an office as the explanation for the small number of candidates running for office. Only a very few students, he explained, are willing to devote the time and energy in addition to their regular course load. "(It's) adding an extra course or two to one's schedule," Mammen said.

The candidates must be well informed on numerous campus issues and must be ready to devote a significant amount of time to College affairs, according to Mammen. "(There's) a greater awareness of College Council this year," Mammen said, because it is seen as "a much more credible organization."

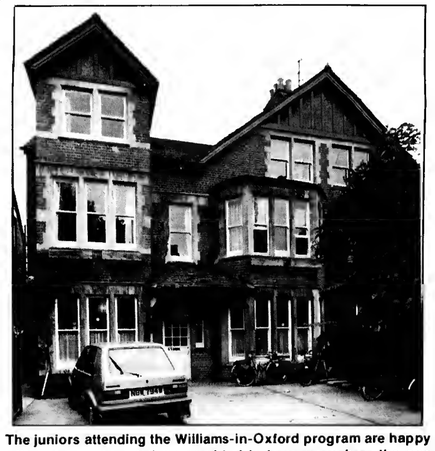
Voting will take place in the dining halls.

Oxford program takes all applicants

by Anne O'Malley

All 31 students who applied to the Williams-in-Oxford program this year were accepted. They have until after spring break to decide whether or not to go.

Professor of Philosophy and Director of the Williams-in-Oxford Program Daniel O'Connor said he believes some people will decline the offer in order to become JA's or go abroad elsewhere. If so, a few more spaces will be available after spring break, allowing four or five students who missed the March 4 deadline to apply.



The academic year at Oxford is divided into three eight-week terms, with six-week vacations in between. Each term the Williams students take one tutorial course, which involves meeting with a tutor and presenting an essay once a week. They also take one Williams seminar course, which runs through the first two terms.

"I think basically everyone is loving it," O'Connor said, while noting there was some anxiety at the beginning of the first term about the tutorial format. He said, however, students have found their classes involve a workload similar to what they would have had at Williams, and they seem to like the rhythm of an academic term with a paper due every week because there is no crunch at the end of the term.

Outside activities

O'Connor emphasized that the Williams students have been able to take advantage of many non-academic opportunites. "People are into every conceivable activity," he said, adding that four women and two men are rowing in the second boats of Exeter College's crew teams, and that Williams students have also participated in rugby, soccer, field hockey, theater, chapel choir and a poetry reading group.

The Williams students have gone on a number of excursions, including plays in London, a play in Stratford and field trips to Bath and Stonehenge. The students also traveled during their six-week Christmas vacation.

The juniors attending the Williams-in-Oxford program are happy with the accommodations provided in houses such as the one pictured above, according to Daniel O'Connor, director of the program, which is in its first year.

O'Connor said the Williams students are enjoying a good mix with Exeter students although they have encountered some anti-Americanism. Three Exeter College students are living in the Ephraim Williams House, all of whom brought Williams students home with them at Christmas time. According to O'Connor, more Exeter students will live in the Williams house next year if less than 31 Williams students go on the program.

Williams students eat in the Exeter College dining hall once a week and are able to visit the college's common room, which O'Connor described as a miniature Log. In order to help bridge the culture gap, the Williams students have thrown three big parties: a Halloween costume party, a beach party and a Madonna/Rambo party. O'Connor said each of the parties was attended by about 200 people and that the British students enjoyed the themes.

O'Connor said he believes the small number of applications to the program can be attributed to several things, including student fear that the program will be too academically demanding. He also cited that fact that grades, which appear on a student's Williams transcript, are counted in the Williams grade point average unlike other study abroad programs, and the perception that the Williams students at Oxford are living in an American ghetto.

O'Connor said, "(The workload) is certainly not more work than Williams, probably less." He indicated that the grades for the first term were similar to the students' Williams grades.

Vote for a stronger CC

Student participation in decisions which directly affect the College community has been effectively stifled. Some charge this is a result of student apathy, seemingly a perennial campus issue, but the recent outburst of opinion against the theme house and its implementation flies in the face of that accusation.

Regardless, College Council had no say in the theme house decision and was only offered a chance to put a representative on the selection committee to lend credibility to the idea. The Council apparently plans to vote on a proposal Thursday night, weeks after the theme house proposal received an administration go-ahead.

The simple fact is that the College Council, and by extension the student body, have been reduced to responding to administration decisions, not taking the lead. The theme house decision is only one example. The MASSPIRG funding system was all but implemented before the Council considered the issue. And a satellite house has been taken away from Dodd, a decision which affects the freshmen who have to live there and the upperclass house which loses a number of beds, and the College Council has yet to speak on the issue or the larger one of a possible increase in the freshman class size that necessitates this move.

The Council elections this week provide an opportunity to make the jump to more active representation. All of the candidates for president have made clear their desire to do more than respond to other's initiatives. This is a positive trend.

A burden and responsibility rests with those who are elected. College Council should know what issues are on the agenda of the CUL, the CEP and other decision-making groups. Even more important, the Council should be abreast of student concerns so that they can set that agenda — the students' agenda.

Williams students have opinions. Their representative body must step forward to present these opinions and make sure they are taken into account.

Letters

Germinal

To the Editor:

Perhaps I am speaking of saving only nickels and dimes, but I've found a basically expendable item on the College Council's budget which it could probably do away with without much difficulty.

The idea behind "Germinal" seems good—the free volcing of liberal opinions with the purpose of perhaps improving the world around us. The reality of the "Germinal" falls leagues short of this goal, however. What the "Germinal" presents the Williams campus with instead is immature, one sided, blind and irresponsible rhetoric which is just as bad as the old "Garfield Republican" of a few years ago. But maybe I am being too harsh? I wish it were so, but...

On the second page of the "Germinal" of March 5, 1986, we find a cartoon of the Space Shuttle exploding. Bill Stahl seems to get a bang (Ha!) out of the whole thing. He says that the "Challenger" equals "Star Wars" and one can infer from the cartoon that he sees the mishap as a good thing. Stahl probably threw a party when the 256 Americans were murdered in Lebanon. There must have been intense joy and celebration!

Now no matter what one's political beliefs are, a tragedy such as that which befell the Space Shuttle should, at least to responsible human beings, cause people to momentarily put their political views aside, and, perhaps, at least think about the deaths, if not mourn them. Stahl instead decides to poke fun of the whole thing. There's no way that student tax dollars should pay for the proliferation of such a one-sided, if not demented, position.

But this is not all. Nico Van Aelstyne takes a wondeful pot-shot at Christianity in this same issue of "Germinal." Instead of offering an objective standpoint on Christianity, he decides to argue from an almost paranoid beginning. His "we do not need to wait for a fickle God to let his preferences on this or that issue be revealed to us" is very similar in nature to the paranoia that burnt witches in the 1600's, or that caused Reagan to denounce the Russians as the "focus of evil in the modern world." He also denounces God as a human creation, so it seems. If God is in existence, I can't wait to see the thunder cloud over Van Aelstyn at Graduation.

"Doctor Darwin" is another etude in perfection. Never before have we seen so many historical misperceptions crammed into a single article as in this Mark Averitt special. Amazing! He even proves himself by citing the Boston Globe and the New York Times as his only sources! How little a pool of information! It is fun to imagine what history would be like if it were all written with newspapers as the primary source! Not that Averitt says things that are all wrong, but to say that America dropped the bomb only for fear of Communism is absolutely silly. Only irresponsible writing could possibly pigeon hole such a complex issue into a "fear of communism" solution!

I could go on — the "Adolf Coors" argument of Steve Shapiro is another brilliant showcase of moral masturbation in this "Germinal" newspaper. I would guess that in 1933, the KKK was rallying on about a thousand business' lawns — not just Coors! But this is a trait of poor and irresponsible writers: show the reader one side of an argument, and leave it at that.

The "Germinal" should be simply named the "Hey, Let's Rat on the United States" Quarterly, or something like that. The bothersome thing of it is that its writers have, for the most part, not undergone a minute of oppression in their lives. But yet, they stand on a platform and are self proclaimed experts! There is no way that our student tax dollars should have to pay for the public exposition of such one-sided and irresponsible moral masturbation. "Germinal," like the "Garfield Republican" should either objectify and grow-up, or they should be phased out.

Misquoted

To the Editor:

Your article on MASSPIRG In last week's issue misquotes me. I did not tell your reporter that "the administration has already agreed to the institution of a MASSPIRG." I said, rather, that if students clearly express both their desire to institute a chapter of MASSPIRG and their willingness to have a waivable fee appear on or with their term bills, then the College will agree to collect this fee.

The "Great Sadness": male perceptions and ignorance

by David Vann '89

Upon my first day of arrival here at Williams, I was told of the Three Point Adjustment Scale. The guy who told me had a grin on his face, but he really did believe in the scale, and he felt personally afflicted by its existence.

According to the scale, Williams women are ugly enough as a group so that the "normal" 1 to 10 rating scale of women must be altered by three points. Therefore, a woman who might be a 7 elsewhere becomes a 10 at Williams.

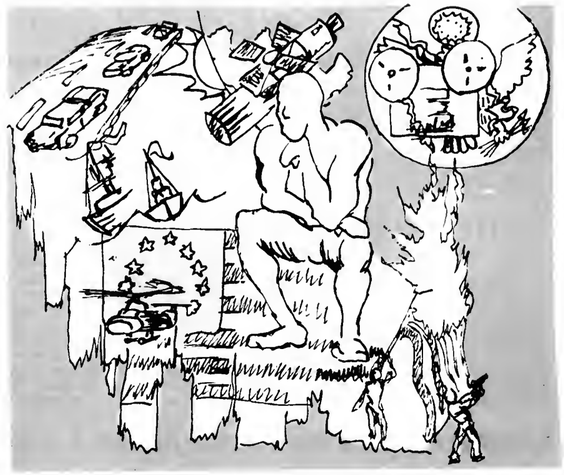
On my first day here, I was told of this "Great Sadness." I was also reassured, however, that my tastes would adjust with time and that I would find the women here attractive.

For starters, I want to say that there is no need for an adjustment scale at Williams. There are beautiful women here, and to deny this is ridiculous. The adjustment scale, presented as a model "of" Williams women, actually serves to perpetuate itself by becoming a model "for" how men then view women. Williams men expect to find Williams women unattractive, and therefore really do "see" these women as unattractive. (Members of tribe who have always lived in round houses with round doors actually cannot "see" square corners when they are placed in a modern environment. They simply "see" the square corners as round.)

The most important point, however, is that no scale — adjusted or otherwise —should exist at all.

As a male, if I glance down at a women's behind as she passes or if I look at her while wondering "are you good enough?" then not only do I kill the smile on her face if she sees me (because women know when they are being "scoped", and many really do feel hurt by the "scoping") but also I am blinded to her beauty as a person. All I see is an unnamed body.

While "checking her out," I am unable to see a person with hopes, dreams, fears and pains. Her struggles or refreshing moments, her loneliness or fulness, don't exist for me. My life is made empty by this, and in the moment of "scoping," her life is discounted and burdened so that it cannot be freely lived, empty or otherwise.



"Scoping" behavior puts limits around a woman's expression. She is not allowed the opportunity to be fully herself around others. Therefore, this daily repeated ritual of "checking her out" becomes the limiting burden of women as well as the "one-track-mindedness" of men.

Once a male sees this oppression and learns how honestly painful and dehumanizing it is to women, I hope that he will try to change his perceptions and daily habits. I certainly hope that he will no longer unfairly and cruelly label Williams women as generally "ugly."

I think it is true that women who feel burdened could help in alleviating their problem. Perhaps they could more consistently confront men who hurt or insult them. They could also refuse to participate in dehumanizing roles. But isn't this an example of "blaming the victim"? Men hold the dominant role in creating rating scales and other evaluations of sexual attractiveness. (A representation of this is the fact that women wear makeup and shave their legs, while men don't). Because of their dominance, men are most responsible for enacting positive change. (One should tell the master to stop whipping the slave, rather than tell the slave to toughen the skin on his back.)

I don't think that the male who "scopes" is necessarily a "bad" person. Social roles are deeply ingrained, and in my own life, even with an awareness of what I am doing, I often have a hard time changing my perceptions. However, this is no excuse for not actively trying to change. Someone who "scopes" is displaying ignorance at least in the moment of "scoping." This ignorance traps both men and women in roles which are potentially painful and alienating.

"Scoping" behavior puts limits around a woman's expression. She is not allowed the opportunity to be fully herself around others.

The scars of the seventies can explain why our generation is Watergate. The Arab Oil Embargo. Patti Hearst and the SLA. The fall of Saigon. Double digit inflation. SALT II unratified. The Iranian Revolution. Fifty-two Americans held hostage in Tehran. Jimmy Carter hiding in the Rose Garden. Interest rates at 19%. Unemployment and poverty levels as high as they've been since a depression of which no one born after 1948 can conceive. The arms race spiralling uncontrollably.

1972-1982: the decade during which most of us at Williams became aware of the world around us.

If we are like the rest of the country, then our parents saw their standard of living decline. Maybe Dad took a paycut or was "between jobs" for a while. Maybe Mom had to go to work. Maybe, had everything to gain. We, it seems, have everything to lose. Thus we become pre-nascent yuppies. If you don't get given, you learn how to take. We're ready to take.

In a nation crushed by uncertainty and insecurity, values get twisted. Compassion for the poor and the unfortunate get suspended in the name of self-preservation. Rashness becomes courage, viciousness becomes strength, vengeance becomes justice, bigotry becomes honor, and intolerance becomes order when a nation grows weak politically, economically and socially. Greed is a virtue in a world of fear and loss.

In many ways we are a miserable lot, but then we should not kid ourselves into believing that the generations before us were the most loving, the most noble, late at night, you overheard your parents fighting over money the way they never had before and never have since.
